I am not aware of any difference in the value of pencil and of ink. There are no doubt greater risks of obliteration in the one case than in the other; but otherwise, I see no difference. Here it is admitted that an agreement in pencil was followed by possession. Now, however informal or invalid the agreement may have been, if followed by possession that would make it good. So that the only question is, Does the pencil agreement, as we now have it, contain what was originally written? or does it not contain something which was not there originally? The sub-tenant, when pursued for the rent, alleged that this was not a case where the writing could receive effect, as it had been entirely obliterated, with the exception of the date and the signature.

Now, it is not quite clear on his evidence whether he means to assert a full or a partial obliteration. But, at all events, I think Sheriff Napier said quite rightly, that this was a very serious case; indeed, one that could only be taken up on such evidence as would warrant conviction for forgery; for although the signature is genuine, there can be no doubt that, if the writing which originally preceded it has been obliterated, and a new writing superinduced, that amounts to the crime of forgery. So the Sheriff says, "you must improve this writing." A minute was then given in, and then a condescendence, and truly a more vague or general one I never saw; it is not clear whether the defender adheres to the original statement made by him or not. The condescendence should have been much more distinct, and should, above all, have contained a specific statement of what words they were that he improved.

* "NOTE.—The kind of contradictory proof as to the gross fraud alleged by the defender in this case (and the whole of which proof on either side is little more than expressions of opinion), arises not so much from the missives in question having been written with a pencil instead of with pen and ink, as from having been so written in a small jotting-book of every-day use, and obviously of a nature to be written and rewritten upon with pencil, and to be constantly thumbed, and having pencil jottings on the opposite page, shutting upon the pencil writing in question. The Sheriff thinks it would be perfectly preposterous to hold (especially in the face of very ample contradictory evidence from various microscopic observers) from expressions of opinion as to rubbing, and previous pencil writing rubbed out, that the gross and criminal fraud alleged has been established under the defender's very imperfect improbatory record. And if the defender is now put to any disadvantage or difficulty in proving such an allegation, by reason of the unusual materials adopted in putting their bargain into writing, he has himself to blame; for, by his own admission, the note-book, with the pencil writing, was put into his own hand, and he signed it in pencil. The evidence of casual witnesses (not called to witness what was written) as to what they heard of the previous communings between the parties, is nothing to the purpose of what was written and signed by both parties. The alleged fraud and forgery not having been established, the missive as it stands signed by both parties, and possession having followed on the missive, is the proper evidence of the terms of the bargain."

As it is, the case is reduced to this issue,—Is that a false and fabricated entry? The burden of proof lies on the defender. I do not enter into whether there has been rei interventus or not. A disputed and improbative writing may be set up by that. But the burden is properly put upon the defender to improve the writing. I cannot enter into the parole evidence as to what passed at the making of the bargain. Is this document genuine? That is the only question, because, if so, we cannot take into account the recollection, a year after, of parties who had no interest in the matter, to fix in their memories what was passing. Besides, none of the parties present heard the document read over, therefore their evidence would not be testimony as to the contents of the document, even if it were competent,—but as to what they understood was passing between the parties.

Now, as to the evidence regarding this improbative writing, that upon one side seems to be just as good as that on the other. The question can be determined only on the same evidence which would be sufficient to obtain a criminal conviction, but the evidence we have is quite insufficient for this purpose, and most unsatisfactory. Why, what is stated against it? that this which has been in the man's pocket these two years is rubbed—there is evidence that the fibre of the paper would be disturbed by the use of India rubber or bread; but I do not see anything more than that the glaze is off the paper. But even if it be disturbed, what evidence is there that it was rubbed for the purpose of obliteration? There the word "south" is not touched at all, on the defender's own evidence. Neither is there any evidence pointing to its having been rubbed and put wrong. He sends his shepherds to take possession, and Williamson's servants seem to have got distinct information, and they said, "You must not come across to the north side, but must confine your sheep to the south alone." Well, does the defender at once say, "This is not my bargain, I repudiate it?" It is very true that something seems to have been said at the time the bargain was made as to the number of sheep the ground would carry; but that is to be treated as a mere piece of exaggeration. But the defender neither writes, nor sends any message to Williamson upon the subject. He says he called, but did not find him at home, and when he does see him afterwards, he acquiesces, and sends away part of his stock, and no objection, apparently, was stated till defences were lodged. So far thus is the real evidence from helping the defence, that I hold that it shews that he was aware of the existence of the restriction alleged by the pursuer.

LORD MURRAY.—I concur. Here, as always where persons of skill are examined, the evidence is most unsatisfactory and contradictory. It is always so in forgery cases in the criminal court. I feel here very little the wiser for the evidence as to the writing, but see that of the defender's shepherds, who say, "the pursuer had sheep on the north side,"—that is pointed evidence at the time, and the defender acquiesced.

LORD COWAN.—The proof seems to me to place this case on the same footing as if there had been a formal written contract between the parties. The writing shelled is in pencil, and improbative. But the defender obtained possession precisely in terms of the missive. He got from the first limited possession, and he makes no complaint—he acquiesces in the clearest possible way. Well, a demand is made for payment, and then, for the first time, he says he did not get the possession he bargained for. Then, as to the question raised about pencil writings, there may, in some cases, be difficulties. There are none here. The validity of a regularly probative deed written in pencil, I do not think has ever been decided. Looking to the facilities with which forgery may be made, I am not prepared to

No. 105. say that the document is in the same position as if it had been written in ink. Here the defender admits he put his name to a pencil memorandum, and left it in the pursuer's custody, and its effect must, under the proof, be determined just as if it had been in ink. But to get quit of it as an adminicle of evidence of the contract, he offered to improve it; and the question is, has he done so? I think his proof is only brought up to this, that there is an appearance of roughness on the face of the paper, while the important word "south" is not even said to be affected at all. Can we, upon this, convict the pursuer of having deliberately forged this document? There is no evidence on which we can do this.

I think the Sheriff's judgment is right, and his note, which is most cautious and guarded, precisely expresses my view.

Proving the tenor—Casus amissionis.—The mere changing of his chambers by an agent is not of itself a sufficient casus amissionis. Circumstances in which the casus amissionis held proved where the deed had not been seen since the dissolution of partnership of a law firm who had the charge of it.

L.

WILLIAM M'KEAN brought this action of proving the tenor of a disposition executed by his late father. He stated, that after being executed, the disposition was for some time in the custody of Messrs Lamond and Monteath, writers in Glasgow; that while in their custody it had been lost, and although a most careful search had been made, both by the pursuer and Messrs Lamond and Monteath, they had been unable to recover it. The pursuer was possessed of the scroll of the disposition and reconveyance in his favour, and of the instrument of sasine following thereon; and the writers of the deed and the witnesses to the execution were alive, and could prove the terms and execution of the same.

The Court, on 10th December 1853, sustained the adminicles, and allowed a proof of the tenor and casus amissionis.

The evidence corroborated the pursuer's statement. Mr Lamond stated that his impression was that the deed had been lost on the occasion of a dissolution of partnership, when his partner removed from the office which up to that time had been occupied by the firm. There was then a division of papers and documents, and he had never seen it since. Mr Monteath was now in India. The other witnesses identified the draft, and proved the execution of the deed.

The pursuer now submitted that a change of the agent's chambers was of itself sufficient casus amissionis to entitle him to decree.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—I rather think a case has here been made out. But certainly the abstract principle has never been laid down, that if an agent changes his chambers once or twice, that is a sufficient casus amissionis.

 Haig v. Haigs.

Succession.—A landed proprietor, by antenuptial marriage-contract, destined his lands to his heirs-male, whom failing, to his heirs-female of that or any subsequent marriage, whom likewise failing to his own nearest heirs and assignees whatsoever in fee, the eldest heir-female always succeeding without division; declaring that it should not be lawful for the heirs to alter the order of succession. The granter of the conveyance afterwards executed a gratuitous disposition in favour of his son, “and the heirs of his body, whom failing, to me, my heirs and assignees, heritably and irredeemably,” qualified with an obligation on the disponent, on completing his title, and entering with the superior, “to renounce and redispone the said lands and pertinents to and in favour of me (the father) and my heirs and assignees, heritably and irredeemably, to be holden of and under him,” the son, and his foresaids in blench. Held (altering judgment of Lord Benholme), that the destination of the disposition altered the destination in the marriage-contract, but that the granter could not defeat the destination in the marriage-contract by a gratuitous deed; nor could the heir, who had only an expectancy under the marriage-contract provision. Therefore, the granter having died, and also his son, without issue, held that the eldest heir-female succeeded to the lands, to the exclusion of heirs portioners.

JAMES HAIG, senior of Bemersyde, entered into an antenuptial contract of marriage in 1794 with Miss Isabella Watson, whereby he disposed the lands of Bemersyde to himself in liferent, and to the heirs-male of the marriage; whom failing, to the heirs-male of any subsequent marriage; whom failing, to the heirs-female of the marriage; whom failing, to the heirs female of any subsequent marriage; whom likewise failing, “to his own nearest heirs and assignees whatsoever in fee, the eldest heir-female always succeeding without division.” There was also a declaration against altering the order of succession.

There were several children born of the marriage; and, in 1817, Mr Haig executed a gratuitous disposition in favour of his eldest son, James Haig, junior, with the view of giving a freehold qualification, and the question now was, whether or not the destination in that disposition had evacuated or altered the destination contained in the marriage-contract? and, if so, whether such alteration was within the power of the parties?

The terms of the disposition of 1817 were as follows:—Mr Haig “disposed, ‘From me, my heirs and successors, to and in favour of the said James Haig, junior, and the heirs of his body; whom failing, to me, my heirs and assignees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably, All and Whole the town and lands of Bemersyde,’ &c. ‘All incorporated into one free barony, called the barony of Bemersyde.’ But excepting therefrom the lands called the Third and the lands called Northfield, with the pertinents of the same respectively, as therein particularly described; which lands of Third and Northfield were declared to be nowise included in the disposition. ‘But always with and under this provision and declaration, as it is hereby specially provided and declared, that the said James Haig, junior, shall be bound, as by acceptance hereof, he binds and obliges himself and his foresaids, so soon as he shall have completed his titles to the lands hereby disposed, by sasine and entry with the superior, to reconvey and redispone the said lands and pertinents to and in favour of me, and my heirs and assignees, heritably and irredeemably, to be holden of and under him, the said James Haig, junior, and his foresaids, for payment of the sum of one penny Scots, in name of blench duty, &c. ‘And for that purpose, to grant dispositions containing obligation to infest, precept of sasine, clause of warrandice, and all other deeds requisite. In which lands and barony, and others above disposed, with the foresaid exceptions, and under the foresaid provision and declaration, I oblige myself and my foresaids to infest and seise the said James Haig,

Haig v. Haigs.

Mr Haig, senior, died in 1840. Mr Haig, junior, died in 1854, without issue. He had been infeft on the precept contained in the disposition of 1817, and afterwards obtained a charter of confirmation. He had also, on his father's death, expedite a general service, and took infeftment on a Crown charter of 1791—the precept in which, however, was afterwards discovered to be exhausted.

The pursuer, Barbara Haig, and her two sisters, Sophia and Mary, the defenders, were the only surviving children of Mr Haig senior. The pursuer, as eldest daughter, claimed to be heir-female of provision under her father's contract of marriage. The defenders maintained that the succession had been altered by the deed of 1817, and now devolved upon the pursuer and defenders as heirs-portioners. The action contained declaratory conclusions that the deed of 1817, and titles completed thereon, were not intended to alter, and had not the effect of altering, the destination under the marriage-contract; that, notwithstanding thereof, the destination still subsisted, and remained in full force to regulate the succession to the lands of Bemersyde; and that, in virtue thereof, the pursuer was entitled to succeed to the whole of these lands without division; or, in the event of its being found that the destination in the marriage-contract was altered by the disposition of 1817, then the action concluded to have that disposition reduced, with all that had followed thereon; and, being so reduced, then it further concluded to have it declared that the pursuer was now entitled to succeed without division to the lands of Bemersyde, to the entire exclusion of the defenders, her younger sisters, as heirs-portioners-at-law of their father.

The Lord Ordinary, on 20th March 1855, pronounced the following interlocutor:—“ Finds that the late James Haig, the father of the pursuer and defenders, had right to the estate of Bemersyde, under a Crown charter, dated 3d February 1791, by which that estate was granted to him, and to the other heirs-male procreate of the marriage of his father and mother; whom failing, to the nearest heirs and assignees whatsoever of his said father: Finds, that by the marriage-contract between the said James Haig and the mother of the pursuer and defenders, dated 11th December 1794, this estate was conveyed by James Haig to himself in liferent, and to the heirs-male of that marriage; whom failing, to the heirs-male of any subsequent marriage he might enter into; whom failing, to the heirs-female of the then present marriage, with other substitutions in fee, with an exclusion of heirs-portioners in favour of the eldest heir-female, and with a prohibition against altering the said order of succession: Finds, that by the said marriage contract, the said James Haig bound and obliged himself, and his heirs and successors, to infeft himself in liferent, and the said heirs of the marriage contract, in their order, in fee, in the said estate: Finds that the order and destination of heirs contained in the said marriage-contract has never been effectually altered or evacuated either by the said James Haig, or by his son, the last James Haig, and that this marriage-contract still remains the ruling deed of destination of the said estate: Finds that the pursuer, as the eldest heir-female of the marriage, is now the heir of provision under the said marriage-contract entitled to succeed to the said estate to the exclusion of the defenders, her sisters: Therefore decerns and declares in terms of the first declaratory conclusion of the summons: Finds no expenses due to either party.” *

* “ NOTE.—In consequence of the blunder committed in the notice of Jan

The defenders reclaimed. The argument is embodied in the opinion of No. 107. Lord Curriehill.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—The question is, whether the succession to the greater part of the estate of Bemersyde has devolved on the pursuer exclusively, as eldest heir-female, or upon her and her sisters, the defenders, as heirs-portioners? Feb. 14, 1857.
Haig v. Haigs.

The pursuer's claim is founded upon the marriage-contract, dated 11th December 1794, between the parents of the parties—James Haig, then of Bemersyde, and Isabella Watson,—whereby the former conveyed that estate to himself, “in liferent, and to the heirs-male to be procreated betwixt him and the said Isabella Watson, whom failing, to the heirs-male of any subsequent marriage the said James Haig shall enter into, whom also failing, to the heirs-female to be procreated betwixt the said James Haig and Miss Isabella Watson, whom failing, to the heirs-female of any subsequent marriage he shall enter into, whom likewise failing, to the said James Haig, his own nearest heirs and assignees whatsoever, in fee, the eldest heir-female always succeeding without division,”—reserving, however, to Mr Haig power to prefer any one of the younger heirs-female he might think proper, and declaring “that it shall not be lawful for any of the said heirs or substitutes to alter or change the order of succession as hereby established.” Mr Haig, the granter of this conveyance, having died, leaving one son, James, and three daughters of this marriage, and without leaving children of any other marriage, and James, the son, having subsequently died without issue, the eldest daughter now claims the succession under the above destination, as being the eldest heir-female of the marriage. Her claim is well founded, unless that destination has been effectually altered. And, accordingly, there is no dispute that she exclusively succeeds to a portion of the estate, as to which no such alteration is alleged to have taken place. The question is, whether or not there has been such an alteration as to the remainder of the estate?

The defenders maintain that that destination was evacuated or altered as to that part of the estate which is in dispute, by their father having, on 31st March 1817, disposed the same to his son, with a destination expressed in different terms, viz.,

Haig, his infeftment on the Crown charter of 1791 appears to be inept. But still he had a good personal title to the estate, which enabled him effectually to convey it under the destination of the marriage-contract.

“The conveyance by James Haig to his son of 31st March 1817, for the purpose of conferring upon the latter a freehold qualification, cannot be held as an implement of the marriage-contract, and an evacuation of the destination therein contained in favour of the other heirs of provision. For, 1st, that conveyance only embraced part of the estate; and, 2dly, it conferred no substantial right to the part conveyed; the son being bound immediately to reconvey the dominium utile. The reconveyance was to be made in favour of his father, his heirs and assignees.

“The Lord Ordinary is inclined to think that such a reconveyance would have operated in favour of the heirs of provision under the marriage-contract, which was then the ruling destination of the estate. In consequence of the father not being himself validly infeft in the estate, the title expedie by the son under the conveyance of 1817 appears to be inept as part of a feudal progress, and the precept in the open charter of 1791 still remained unexhausted.

“Whether the title thus made up by him is perfectly regular may admit of a doubt, in respect that the marriage-contract contains no express assignation of the precept of 1791. If that doubt could be removed, then the last James Haig was duly infeft under the mid-couple of the marriage-contract, which would infer a destination in favour of the pursuer.

“If the infeftment of James Haig be considered defective, the pursuer cannot directly succeed in special to him, as heir of provision, but she is still entitled to make effectual the destination in her favour contained in the marriage-contract, even although it should be necessary that the precept of 1791 should be taken up, in the first place, by all the three heirs-portioners.”

No. 107. —
Feb. 14, 1857. Haig v. Haigs. “from me my heirs and successors, to and in favour of the said James Haig junior, and the heirs of his body, whom failing, to me my heirs and assignees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably.” That disposition was a gratuitous one, and was qualified with an obligation on the disponent, on his completing his title and entering with the superior, “to renounce and re-dispose the said lands and pertinents to and in favour of me (the father) and my heirs and assignees heritably and irredeemably, to be holden of and under him, the said James Haig junior, and his forebears, in blench.”

The pursuer makes two answers to this defence—1. That according to the true construction of this destination it does not import an alteration of the former destination, and that as the term heirs is flexible, the destination in this disposition should be read as meaning the heirs to whom the estate had already been destined; and, 2, That on the other hand, the conveyance, if it does import an alteration of the destination in the contract of marriage, was ultra vires of the granter. The summons accordingly contains alternatively a declaratory conclusion for carrying into effect the former plea, if it should be sustained; and a rescissory conclusion under which effect may be given to the latter plea, if it should be sustained. The Lord Ordinary has decreed in terms of the declaratory conclusion only.

I. The first of these pleas is founded chiefly on an allegation that the intention of the granter of the disposition of 1817 was merely to create a freehold qualification in favour of his son, and not to alter the existing destination of the estate. There is no evidence in support of this allegation, except what appears on the face of the conveyance itself. And in the first place, such an intention is at variance with the prima facie and technical meaning of the language of the conveyance, because the deed sets out by conveying the subjects from not only the granter himself, but also from his heirs and successors,—the natural meaning of which is, that the then existing destination in favour of these heirs and successors was to be cut off. Then the parties to whom the subjects are destined by this disposition are not generally the granter himself and his heirs and successors, but himself and the heirs of his body, whom failing, himself and his heirs and assignees whomsoever. This destination differs from that in the contract of marriage in several respects. For example, the exclusion of heirs-portioners,—the preference of heirs-male of the body to general heirs-male,—and the distinction between the heirs of different marriages, are done away. Nor is this all. The intention appearing ex facie of the disposition itself was that only a mid-superiority should be held under this title; and that after that conveyance should be feudalised in the person of the grantee, a new estate consisting of sub-feu of the dominium utile should be created by the latter in favour of his father, with a destination different from either of the former, viz., in favour of the father and his heirs and assignees whomsoever. In these circumstances, and in conformity with the principle of the case of Molle, 13th December 1841, F. C., and a series of prior cases, I do not think that we are warranted in construing the destination in the disposition of 1817 as being the same as that in the contract of 1794. When that disposition was granted, the parties either had, or had not, the destination in the contract of marriage in their view. If they had, then their change in the terms of the destination must be held to have been intentional. And if they had not, then the destination in the disposition cannot be held to be deprived of its proper meaning by reference to what was not then in their view. On these grounds, I think that the declaratory conclusion of the action is not well founded, and that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, in so far as it decrees in terms of that conclusion, ought to be recalled.

II. The question remains, whether this alteration of the destination was within the power of the parties to the disposition of 1817. The granter of that deed himself had not the power to alter it; because that destination, being a provision in an antenuptial contract of marriage in favour of the heirs of the marriage, conferred upon these heirs not only a spes successionis, but likewise a jus crediti, which the granter could not afterwards defeat nor alter by a gratuitous deed; and the disposition of 1817 was granted only, as is expressly set forth in its own preamble, for the love, favour, and affection of the granter for the grantee. Nor could this want of power in the granter be supplied by the concurrence of the grantee. Although the latter was then the apparent heir of the marriage, he had not power to alter that destination, or authorise his father to do so; because it was an express condition of the provision in his favour, that it should not be altered nor changed by any act of the heirs or substitutes. But for this disabling condition of the provision in the contract, it might have been held that, by their joint deed, the father and son could evacuate the destination in that contract, on the principle of the case of Carruthers of Dormont, 19th May 1812, and 16th December 1819. That principle is, that the expectant heir of a marriage is, even during his father's lifetime, the creditor in the jus crediti created by a provision in an antenuptial contract in favour of the heirs of the marriage; that, as such, he may then receive implement of that provision by having the estate which forms the subject of the provision propelled to him; and that, consequently, he has power to discharge the provision on any terms he may think proper, if he be not expressly prohibited from doing so. In that case there was no such prohibition; and a discharge of the provision granted in such a predicament by the heir expectant of the marriage was sustained, even although eventually that expectant heir predeceased her father. But the principle of that case does not apply to the present one, where the heir of the marriage was disabled by an express condition of his right from altering the destination. As that disability would have operated, even if the right to the estate had become vested in him, either by its being propelled to him by his father, while alive, under the destination in the contract, or by his having survived his father, and made up his title as heir of provision under the contract, a fortiori does it operate in the existing case; the heir of the marriage having had only an expectancy in 1817 under the qualified provision in the contract of 1794, and his right under that contract, moreover, having never been feudalised.

The defenders maintain, that as the disposition of 1817 was the proper deed of the father, and the son merely accepted of it, that acceptance was not properly a deed of alteration on his part, and is not struck at by the prohibition in the contract. That argument will not bear examination. Its unsoundness is tested by this,—that if the disposition of 1817 had not been accepted of by the grantee, it would have had no effect whatever; acceptance by the grantee being as necessary as delivery by the granter, to render effectual a disposition inter vivos. Moreover, according to the principle of the case of Dormont, the apparent heir of the marriage is, in such a transaction, the proper party who evacuates the destination; because he is the creditor in the jus crediti created by the antenuptial provision, and it is he, and not the obligant or debtor who has the title to discharge it. But, in truth, such a proceeding is ineffectual, unless it be the act of both parties, and the expectant heir be not prohibited from entering into it; and when, as in this case, both are disabled from doing the thing, the one by a legal prohibition, and the other by a conventional one, such an act cannot be effectual.

I am therefore of opinion, that the disposition of 1817, and the investiture following thereon, in so far as the destination in the marriage-contract of 1794 was altered, is invalid, and ought to be reduced under the recissory conclusion of the action.

The discussion of this question has been encumbered with several matters which do not appear to me to have any connection with it. One of these is a question which was raised as to the validity of a sasine which was expedite in 1791, in favour of Mr Haig, the party who made the conveyance in the contract of marriage in 1794. But as he was confessedly the owner of the estate in 1794, in virtue of a provision of it in his favour in the marriage-contract of his parents, dated 17th October 1757, and a retour of his general service as heir of provision under that contract, and a Crown charter of resignation following thereon, the validity of the destination in his own contract of 1794 is equally binding, whether his right to the estate was real or personal. Although that sasine may have been null, on the principle of the case of the Magistrates of Brechin, 11th December 1840, I abstain from going into that irrelevant question.

Equally irrelevant to this question is the discussion which was raised as to the validity of another instrument of sasine expedite by the last Mr Haig in 1846, on the same receipt as that on which the sasine of 1791 proceeded. Although that sasine may have been inept, in respect of one of the midcouples by which Mr Haig was supposed to be connected with it not having been recited in terms of the statute, I also abstain from going into that question; because that sasine, whether valid or not, could have no effect in either supporting or defeating the destination in the contract of 1794.

No. 107. An argument, founded on the 43d section of the Disentail Act, 11 and 12 Vict. c. 36, is equally foreign to this question; for, even supposing that that enactment were held to render abortive destinations in onerous contracts of marriage, it would not operate retrospectively. Urquhart, 11th July 1853, Macqueen's Reports, I. 658.

Feb. 14, 1857.
Haig v. Haig.

The LORD PRESIDENT and LORD IVORY concurred.

LORD DEAS.—The argument suggested various questions of importance, which I concur in thinking it is not necessary to decide. James Haig, senior, was in titulo to execute the conveyance contained in his marriage-contract of 1794, whether his right was personal or feudal. If, therefore, neither he nor his son, James Haig, junior, had power, gratuitously, to alter the destination in that contract, it is unnecessary to go farther; for, in that view, the destination stands, and the pursuer is entitled to succeed to the estate. Now, I agree in holding, that neither father nor son could so alter that destination. The father could not do it, because this would have been contrary to the good faith of the marriage-contract. No doubt he might propel the fee to the son, and if the son had been unfettered, then, upon the principle of the case of Carruthers, the father and son together might have evacuated the destination, although the fee had not been actually propelled. But the son was subject to the prohibition in the contract, which bears, "that it should not be lawful for any of the said heirs or substitutes to alter or change the order of succession as thereby established;" and consequently, although the fee had been actually propelled to him, he could not have gratuitously altered. All this has been fully stated by Lord Curriehill. The only qualification I have to adject to his Lordship's views is, that it seems to me unnecessary to decide what would have been the effect of the destination in the deed of 1817 had the powers of the parties been different from what they were.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—The Lord Ordinary "decerns and declares in terms of the first declaratory conclusion of the summons," which proceeds upon the footing that the destination in the deed of 1817 was not intended or calculated to alter the destination in the marriage-contract, and would not have that effect although left un-reduced.

LORD DEAS.—If it be necessary to decide that point, I am prepared, as at present advised, to concur upon it also with Lord Curriehill. But I think the course should be to decide upon the reductive conclusions, and the declaratory conclusion which is made consequent upon the reduction.

Here it was explained from the bar, that the parties had proceeded as in a declarator, so that the production had not been satisfied, and it was proposed to hold this done now. But the attention of the Court being thus called to the state of the process, they were unanimously of opinion that the case must go back to the Lord Ordinary to be put in shape before judgment; and the following interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the interlocutor reclaimed against: Find that the record in this case was prematurely closed; and, of consent of parties, open up the same: Further, they remit to the Lord Ordinary to have the production satisfied; and thereafter to proceed with the cause as shall be just."

Of this date the Lord Ordinary verbally reported the case, and stated that the production was now satisfied, and the proceedings properly in shape.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Lord Ordinary having now reported this case on a closed record, with the productions, I understand that the parties refer to their previous argument, and we now pronounce the judgment which we formerly pronounced.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords, on report of Lord Benholme, Ordinary, and having considered the closed record, and heard counsel for the parties, reduce, decern, and declare, in terms of the reductive conclusions of the libel: Further, they find, declare, and decern, in terms of that declaratory conclusion of the libel which is consequent upon the reduction of the writings under challenge: Find no expenses due to either party, and decern."

Curator Bonis—Power of Sale.—Special powers granted to the curator bonis of Lindsay, a lunatic to sell heritage, where the annual income was insufficient to provide for the interest of debt, the expenses of management, and the proper maintenance of the lunatic—all which a sale would remedy (abs. Lord Ivory).

SOMERVILLE, a lunatic, was proprietor of the estate of Airhouse, of which the free rental was L.649. He was also proprietor of a house in Edinburgh, the rent of which was L.34. He had a claim upon Campbell of Islay's sequestrated estate for L.1118, 18s. 10d., and he had a road debt of L.85. On the other hand, the estate was so burdened with debt, that the lunatic's present whole available free income was only L.38, 16s. 1d. Should the interest on the heritable debt fall to $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., the free available income would be about L.88. Should it rise to 5 per cent., there would be an annual deficiency of about L.62.

1st Division.
 Ld. Mackenzie
 L.

The lunatic was boarded in the Edinburgh Lunatic Asylum at L.60 per annum, the lowest rate of board next to that for paupers. The cost of his clothes and other necessaries amounted to from L.20 to L.30 a-year. The deficiency in his income for his maintenance was supplemented from the thinnings of wood, which realised about L.60 per annum—a source, however, which would be available only for five years. The only other source of supplementing his income was the realisation of the debt on Campbell of Islay's estate, which it was not anticipated could be made available for several years.

The petitioner, Donald Lindsay, was appointed Somerville's curator in 1853. He now applied for special powers to sell the lunatic's landed estate, on the ground that such a sum would be got for it as, after paying the debts, would leave a free available income of at least L.200. A certificate from Mr Skae, of the Lunatic Asylum, was produced, to the effect that there was little prospect of the lunatic being restored so as to be able to take charge of his own affairs, but that greater liberty, extended walks, and more generous treatment, might materially contribute to his comfort, if not his cure. To enable him to enjoy these advantages, however, his board would require to be at least L.200 a-year.

There was also produced a valuation and report by Mr Dickson of Saughton Mains, which, after stating the generally deteriorated condition of the estate, concluded that "the sale of the estate was not only expedient and advantageous for Mr Somerville's interest, but was also necessary and indispensable for saving the reversion of his property." The Accountant of Court was "decidedly of opinion that the interests of the ward would be best consulted by empowering the curator to sell the estate of Airhouse. The Accountant, indeed, thinks that in this case ruin and penury cannot otherwise be averted from the ward."

This petition was intimated to the sisters of the lunatic, who lodged answers, objecting to the proposed sale of their brother's estate. They stated that, "from their brother's attachment to the place, they felt assured that a sale would have a most injurious effect on him, and would either aggravate and confirm his mental indisposition beyond hope of recovery, or, if concealed, in the event of his recovery would assuredly induce a hopeless relapse." They also stated that "the apparent abundance of money at present, and the prospect of a speedy reduction of interest on heritable securities, may be expected soon to leave considerably more ample means at the curator's disposal for requisite improvements on the estate, or otherways; and the prospect of the affairs of the ward getting into a better state of arrange-

No. 108. ment may be supposed considerably to lessen the yearly expenditure, from the management being simplified."

Lindsay.

The Lord Ordinary reported the case to the First Division, who, on 22d November 1855, granted permission to take proof for the curator bonis, and also for the respondents.

The respondents did not lead proof, but the curator adduced evidence corroborative of his statements in the petition. It appeared that the available income had now considerably decreased, owing to the interest of money lately borrowed, necessary repairs on the house of Airhouse, and other unavoidable expenditure. In the course of Dr Skae's examination, he stated that "he now thought there was little or no prospect of the lunatic's recovery."

Of this date, the case was put to the roll. No appearance was made for the respondents.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The petitioner has satisfied me that a legal necessity for disposing of this property, such as we referred to in the recent case of Maconochie, has been made out. The sale is shewn to be necessary as well for the benefit of the lunatic as to prevent absolute loss to the estate. The free income of the lunatic only just exceeds what is necessary for his annual support. The dividends payable to him as a creditor on the Islay estate, are not a permanent source of income. Neither is the revenue derived from the sale of wood; and even if it were so, the L.60 so derived, and the present surplus, after paying for his board, are not adequate for the lunatic's proper maintenance. We must consider his interest. If he is in an asylum at the rate of L.60 per annum, he is maintained at a rate only one stage removed from a pauper lunatic, and cannot enjoy any of those advantages which, by paying a higher board, might prove beneficial to his health. Besides, the estate may become less valuable. It is at present in a neglected condition, and, for many reasons, it is difficult to get good tenants. Every thing supports the statements made by Mr Dickson and Mr Lindsay, to the effect that the estate is gradually becoming worse. There is not only a case made out of necessity for a sale to prevent loss to the estate, but it is also necessary for the sake of the lunatic. Dr Skae reports, that he desires many things which his income will not afford him: His interests thus require the property to be sold, in order that he may have such comforts as his means entitle him to enjoy. It may be for the interest of others that these comforts should be denied to him, but it is the interest of the lunatic, not of his heirs, we are bound to consider.

We cannot take the statement of the parties who object that there will be injury to the lunatic by the sale of the estate, that he is so much bent upon possessing it, that if he is aware of the sale, it will so affect his mind as to make his insanity permanent; or, if he hears of it after a recovery, it will produce a relapse. In support of these allegations, there is no proof. We must assume, therefore, that they cannot be supported, or proof would have been led.

LORD CURRIEHILL concurred.

LORD DEAS.—I concur in the judgment proposed by your Lordships. I do not go into the details of the figures, but the result I think is, that the annual income is insufficient to provide for the interest of debt, the expenses of management, and the lunatic's maintenance (which is truly of the nature of a debt), in the way in which he ought to be kept,—and indeed it is very doubtful whether the income be sufficient to provide for his maintenance even on the footing of the board remaining at its present low and inadequate rate. In these circumstances, I think there is a legal necessity for the sale.

LORD IVORY absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"On report of Lord Mackenzie, and having advised the proof led in this cause, and having heard counsel for the factor thereon, no appearance being made for the respondents, grants power to the curator, after due advertisement, to dispose of the estate of Airhouse by public roup at a price not lower than L.18,000."

THOMAS HAMILTON, Pursuer.—Sol.-Gen. Maitland—Gifford.

Feb. 18, 1857.

Hamilton v.
 Caledonian
 Railway Co.

Railway Company—Liability—Reparation—What is a lawful passenger—Statute 8 & 9 Vict. cap. 83, sect. 101.—Parties travelling by the Caledonian Railway without a ticket are charged excess fares, according to a schedule furnished to the station masters;—Held, that a person who had works at different stations along the line, and was in use to travel, as it suited his convenience, beyond the station for which he had taken out his ticket, was, when so travelling without a ticket, and not seeking to evade payment of his fare, a lawful passenger, and as such was entitled to recover damages for injury from an accident which took place during the journey through the fault of the Company.

THE pursuer Hamilton, brick and tile manufacturer at Auchengray, brought this action of damages against the Caledonian Railway Company for injuries sustained by him in consequence of a collision between a passenger train by which he was travelling, and a goods train on the defenders' line of railway.

1ST DIVISION.
 Lord Neaves.
 C.

The defence was, that at the time of the accident, the pursuer was not a lawful passenger, inasmuch as he was travelling without a ticket. He was thus acting in contravention of the bye-laws of the Company, and actually subject to penalties for so trespassing.

The following issue was adjusted on 10th June 1856, and sent to trial before Lord Neaves on 12th July 1856:—"Whether, on or about the 9th July 1855, the pursuer was a passenger travelling by the Caledonian Railway from the Carstairs Junction Station to the Mid-Calder Station; and whether, at or near the Ballgreen or Burnbrae Siding or Station of the Caledonian Railway, through the fault of the defenders, a collision took place on the said railway, or sidings thereof, between the train in which the pursuer was so travelling and another train; and whether, in consequence of the said collision, the pursuer was injured in his person, to his loss, injury, and damage."

The case now came before the Court on a bill of exceptions. The nature of the case will be shewn by the following articles of the pursuer's statement which were put in evidence:—"In reference to the defenders' statement that the pursuer was travelling without a proper ticket, the pursuer has to make the following explanations:—In the superintendence of the various brick-works belonging to the pursuer, and the prosecution of his business, the pursuer had very frequent occasion to make use of the defenders' railway, and he is well known to the ticket-collectors, porters, and other servants on the line. It frequently happens that the pursuer, from want of time or otherwise, is unable to overtake the business which he had intended on any particular day, and thus he often omits leaving the train at the station at which he originally intended to leave, and for which he held a ticket, and passes on to a further station. In consequence of meeting customers and otherwise, the pursuer has often occasion to change his mind as to the station at which to stop, and although holding only a special return ticket for a particular station, he finds it necessary to stop at some other, either within or beyond it.

"On such occasions it has been the pursuer's invariable practice to consult his convenience and the exigencies of his trade as to the station at which he stops; and in case he travelled a greater distance than that covered by the ticket, he paid the difference of fare when the ticket was given up. This was the pursuer's invariable practice, and it was recognised, approved of, and acted on by the Railway Company for a considerable length of time. Not the slightest objections were ever made by the Railway Company to the pursuer's practice in this respect. The Railway Company not only for a

No. 109. long period have dealt with the pursuer on the footing above explained, but they have dealt, and still deal with many others and the pursuer on the same footing. Indeed, any passenger to a particular station is always allowed to change his mind and proceed to a more distant station, paying the difference of fare on giving up his ticket. This is the universal practice of railways throughout the kingdom, and a passenger so acting is not chargeable with a violation of any of the statutes.

Feb. 18, 1857.
Hamilton v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

“ On the said 9th July 1855, being the day of the collision in question, the pursuer, in the morning, applied at Auchengray for a day-ticket to Carstairs and back. One of the porters, called Sommerville, was acting as a ticket seller, and the pursuer offered him a pound-note for change. The train was just coming up, and Sommerville refused to take the money, and hurriedly handed the pursuer a ticket, saying, ‘ You can pay on your return.’ The pursuer put the ticket in his pocket without looking at it, and ran across to the train, by which he proceeded to Carstairs. On finishing his business at Carstairs, the pursuer found he was in time for the express train leaving Carstairs at 11.35. This train, however, did not stop at Auchengray, and the pursuer resolved to go on with it to Mid-Calder and visit his tile-works at Broxburn. He accordingly took his seat in the train, by which he proceeded till the collision occurred as above narrated. The pursuer did so on the footing that he was to pay for the extra distance he had travelled, as well as the price of the ticket, when he should give up his ticket. Not the slightest objection was made to his doing so. And the Railway Company had always allowed him to act in the manner and on the footing above explained. The ticket was found in the pursuer’s pocket, and it was not until many weeks after the collision that the pursuer saw it, and discovered that it was only a return ticket between Auchengray and Carnwath. Carnwath is a mile and a-half from Carstairs.”

There was produced in evidence a table of excess fares used by the station-masters on the Caledonian Railway, and an admission by the Company that, “ at the stations of the railway, whenever a passenger travels further than the distance for which his ticket was granted, the Company and its servants exact from him the difference of fare in money, and that this is of frequent occurrence, and that the sums so paid are stated in the Company’s books to the credit of the ordinary revenue.”

Smith, the station-master at Auchengray, also deponed, that “ on the day of the accident, and after it happened, or next day, Mure, the pursuer’s foreman paid the ticket, i.e., 7d., being price of return ticket to Carnwath. I had asked him for it. Sometime afterwards 9d. was sent me as from the pursuer by Robert Brydone, then a railway porter, now abroad. I had sent Brydone with an account, and he brought back 9d. more, as for return ticket to Carstairs.”

And Sommerville, a porter at the same station, deponed,—“ Pursuer asked for third-class return to Carnwath, and I gave it. I am sure he so asked I was not paid for it. He asked if I could change a pound-note, which I could not. I reported this to Mr Smith.”

“ Thereafter Lord Neaves charged the jury; and in reference to the term ‘ passenger ’ in the issue, directed the jury in point of law, that a passenger in this issue means a lawful passenger—i.e. a person lawfully in the railway carriage in order to be conveyed by it; and that a person feloniously or clandestinely or fraudulently in such carriage would not be a passenger in the sense of the issue. And the said Lord Ordinary further gave it as his direction in point of law, that a person in a carriage contravening the statute 8th & 9th Victoria, which he explained to the jury, would not be a passenger.”

“ First Exception.—Whereupon the counsel for the defenders asked the Lordship to direct the jury that a person in a railway carriage without ticket, and in violation of the bye-laws and regulations of the Company, not a passenger in the sense of the issue. The Lord Ordinary declined so to direct the jury. Whereupon the counsel for the defenders tendered their exception accordingly. No. 109.

Feb. 18, 1857.

“Second Exception.”—And the counsel for the defenders further asked his Lordship to charge the jury, that if the jury are satisfied that the pursuer took out a return ticket from and back to Auchengray, with the view of going on to Mid-Calder on his return, and not stopping at Auchengray, the pursuer cannot recover under this action. But the said Lord Ordinary refused so to charge the jury. Whereupon the counsel for the defenders tendered their exception accordingly. Hamilton v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

“Third exception.”—And thereafter the counsel for the defenders further asked his Lordship to charge the jury, that if the jury are satisfied upon the evidence that the pursuer was travelling in the train, at the time when the accident happened, without a ticket, and without the authority or consent of any official of the Company, they were bound to find for the defenders. The Lord Ordinary refused so to charge the jury. Whereupon the counsel for the defenders tendered their exception accordingly.”

The Railway Company now pleaded;—That, as carriers, they were not under the statute but common law; and the question was, whether, in this case, there was any contract for the safe carriage of the pursuer? There was not, inasmuch as the pursuer was not a lawful passenger, not having complied with the regulations essential to make a contract. The Company were only carriers on the conditions which they themselves offered to the public, and which must be accepted in order to make a contract. Writing was not essential to its constitution. It only required an undertaking to carry the passenger from one particular place to another, but here there was no such undertaking. The pursuer had no right to go into the carriage, much less to be carried in it. It was of no consequence whether he was within any of the three categories mentioned by the presiding Judge. The fact was, that he was in the train without any contract with the Company to convey him. The duty of safe carriage did not arise from the fact of travelling, but from the contract to convey; and to the undertaking to carry or convey, the law superadded the duty of carrying safely. By its regulations the Company refused to carry a drunken person, but suppose he was smuggled into the train, would the Company be responsible for his safety? Their legal responsibility rested on a contract to carry, and that was shewn by the fact, that in every case in which an injury occurred, the pursuer pleaded this ground of liability with perfect success. If this pursuer had lost his luggage at Carstairs, the Company would not have been responsible.¹ He was truly in the position of a person getting up behind a carriage and getting his leg broken by an accident. The direction, therefore, was inadequate to put the jury in possession of the law.

LORD PRESIDENT.—Does your principle of law apply to a person having a third class ticket going into a first class carriage?

D. F. Inglis.—I am unable to answer that. There may be a difficulty about that.

Pleaded for the pursuer;—The verdict of the jury established that there was negligence on the part of the defenders, and that the pursuer was a passenger, unless the breach of the Company's bye-laws made him no passenger. A special contract was not necessary to make the Company liable. Liability for the safety of passengers was founded on duty,² and was incurred by the Company as common carriers. The pursuer was a passenger in the proper sense of the issue. The constitution of express contract between the parties ab ante before the pursuer went into the carriage was not necessary to make him so. The liability of common carriers, generally, was constituted without any previous contract. Thus, in the case of a mail coach or omnibus, there was no preceding payment. The pursuer was not acting fraudulently and with an intention of avoiding payment for his journey. Therefore, whether there was an express contract or not, there was, of necessity, some kind of contract, for the Railway Company advertised that they had trains by which it was safe to travel, and the pursuer was entitled, as one of the public, to hold that the Railway Company had undertaken to carry him safely by all of these advertised trains. The defence was rested on the bye-laws of the Company. It was not immaterial that these existed only by virtue of sect. 101 of the statute, which did not invert the liability of the Company as public carriers. If, at common law, the Railway Company were responsible for the pursuer's safety, the Act did not relieve them of that responsibility. The purpose of these bye-laws was to establish certain important regulations for the convenience and comfort of the journey; for example, the prevention of smoking, and destroying the carriage. And so in regard to a ticket. It was for convenience that every one should take out a ticket, and compliance with that regulation was sufficiently secured by the sanction of a penalty of 40s. on parties not complying with it. But the argument for the Railway Company would lead to extraordinary results. A person, in perfect good faith, might, in ignorance, take his seat in a train without a ticket, and be injured. Would it be an answer to say that he was not a passenger? It would, in a word, confer upon the Railway Company an immunity which they were not entitled to as common carriers.

LORD PRESIDENT (after going over the facts, and stating that there was a conflict of evidence as to whether the pursuer asked for the ticket which was in his possession or not.)—Parties travelling beyond the proper distance for which they have tickets are in use to be charged excess fare, and there is a column in the Railway table of fares applicable to such excess fares, which the Railway Company are entitled to exact. It is a fact that the Railway Company do exact these excess fares, and the pursuer states that he was in use to travel—when occasion required, or it suited his convenience—beyond the distance for which he had taken out a ticket, paying the excess fare. That is not distinctly corroborated by the officers of the Railway Company. There is a difference of opinion as to what would have been the duty of the officer at Midcalder when this party had arrived there. But that is only a difference of opinion as to the check which the Company have in cases of fraud, and which would depend on the fact whether the party was acting honestly or not, whether or not he was wishing to avoid payment of his fare.

Farther, the accident having occurred, an officer of the Railway called on the pursuer, who had an account-current with the Company, and his foreman there paid the price of the return ticket to Carnwath. He subsequently paid a further sum of ninepence, as for a return ticket to Carstairs, and the money does not appear to have been returned to him. He himself does not say that he paid it, but that his wife paid it. But the officer of the Company says that the person whom he sent for the account brought it, and there the matter stops.

In that state of matters the case went to a jury.

The statute of 8 & 9 Victoria, referred to in his charge by the presiding Judge provides “that any person who shall travel or attempt to travel in any carriage used on the railway, without having previously paid his fare, and with intent to avoid payment thereof, or who, having paid his fare for a certain distance, shall knowingly and wilfully proceed in any such carriage beyond such distance, without previously paying the additional fare for the additional distance, and with intent to avoid payment thereof, or who shall knowingly and wilfully refuse or neglect, on arriving at the point to which he has paid his fare, to quit such carriage, is for every such offence liable to a penalty of forty shillings; and any person committing such offence may be lawfully apprehended and detained by the Company's officers and servants, until he can be conveniently taken before some Justice."

No. 109.

Caledonian

The jury found for the pursuer, and that finding has established certain matters. It has established that the collision took place through the fault of the Railway Company, and that the pursuer suffered damage thereby. It has also established that the pursuer was not in the train feloniously, or clandestinely, or fraudulently, and that he was not a person who travelled without a ticket, or beyond the distance, with the intention of not paying the value. But then the Railway Company called on the Judge to give certain farther directions, and the question is, Whether, by refusing to give these other directions, the Judge has erred, so that the verdict must be set aside? If, in regard to any of these matters, it shall appear to the Court that the direction asked to be given was one which was required, in order to guide the jury to a right conclusion on the point of law, then that exception must be sustained. If, on the other hand, it appears to the Court that in regard to all of them, taking them separately, there was none of them which it was necessary for the Judge to give in order to guide the jury to a right conclusion in point of law, then the exceptions cannot be sustained. It is not enough, in the case of a direction as to duty, that there is nothing wrong in the direction stated. If it is not pertinent, or even if pertinent, if the matter of it is another way of putting a thing already put by the Judge; or, if not necessary to guide the jury, then there is no reason for sustaining it. But if it is not of that character, but such that in its own terms it is defective, and apt to lead the jury to a wrong conclusion, then it is not a direction which the Judge ought to give.

Each of these directions must be viewed in reference to its circumstances.

The first is, "that a person in a railway carriage without a ticket, and in violation of the bye-laws and regulations of the Company, is not a passenger in the sense of the issue." We think the presiding Judge did right in not giving that direction. We think that a person may be a passenger in the sense of the Act, although he may not have a ticket; and as to the violation of the regulations of the Company, it is not very clearly stated what these regulations are. He may be a passenger, though without a ticket, if he has been in use so to travel, and the officers of the Company know that he had so travelled. If so, he is no doubt travelling in violation of the regulations, because they say that no person shall enter a carriage without a ticket; yet, if he is so allowed to travel, and pay for his ticket at the end of the journey, and if there is usage to that effect, he is a lawful passenger in the sense of this issue. This first direction was not a direction the Judge was bound to give.

The second direction is, "that if the jury are satisfied that the pursuer took out a return ticket from and back to Auchengray, with the view of going on to Mid-Calder on his return, and not stopping at Auchengray, the pursuer cannot recover under this action." That is one view of putting the case favourably for the pursuer, because it does not introduce the element of his having taken a ticket only from Auchengray to Carstairs and back. It puts it as a case in which he cannot recover under this action. That was a right enough way of putting that part of the case, for if the pursuer asked for a ticket from Auchengray to Carstairs Junction and back, and it was a mistake giving him the other, then he is to be held in the same position as if he had got a ticket to go to Carstairs and back, and the direction allows that; but it says that in that case, if he had the intention of travelling back to Mid-Calder, and not to Auchengray, he was not entitled to recover under this action. Now that ignores previous usage or practice, or the knowledge of the officials at Carstairs Junction that the pursuer was going to Mid-Calder, and assumes that he had no intention of paying his fare, because the Judge who charged the jury, that if he had no intention of paying his fare, he was not a lawful passenger. Here again, therefore, if this party, in conformity with usage, and according to pay his fare on his arrival at Mid-Calder, according to such usage, did so travel to Mid-Calder, because it suited him better to go on than to

No. 109. stop at Auchengray, we cannot hold that in that case it would have been right to direct the jury in the terms required by the Railway Company. It would have been necessary to take into consideration the matter of usage and bona fides on the part of the pursuer. This exception, therefore, we must also disallow.

Feb. 18, 1857. Stevenson's Trustees v. Dumbreck.

The third direction is, "that if the jury are satisfied upon the evidence that the pursuer was travelling in the train, at the time when the accident happened, without a ticket, and without the authority or consent of any official of the Company, they were bound to find for the defenders." Now, as I read that direction, it is that the pursuer was travelling without a ticket, and without the authority or consent of the officials of the Company, on that particular occasion, not with reference to any usage to that effect, nor any inference of authority to be drawn from practice, but without express authority to travel without a ticket at that time. According to the finding of the jury, there was usage the other way. And if the jury were of opinion that there was such usage, then this was taking such element from them, and consequently the direction would be defective. On these grounds, we think that none of these exceptions should be allowed.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Disallow the bill of exceptions, and find the defenders liable to the pursuer in the expenses incurred by him in the discussion of the bill of exceptions: Allow an account thereof," &c.

Trustee—Liability—Tutor and curator—Caution—Bankruptcy—Discharge of a minor and tutor for pupil.—A truster provided for the payment to his children certain portions of his estate at a specified time, declaring his daughters should enjoy a liferent only of their share,—the fee going to their children,—and the mariti and right of administration of his daughters' husbands being excluded. The period for the distribution of trust-funds having arrived, the husband of one of the daughters (then dead) applied for and obtained payment of the shares appertaining to his two children, a pupil and a minor. Being in embarrassed circumstances, the trustees required him to find caution to account for the money to his children when they reached majority, and for its proper application. He found caution, and one of the cautioners was appointed factor. The father then granted a discharge as tutor for his pupil son, and curator for the minor—the minor and cautioners being all parties to the deed. The father misapplied part of the funds, and the factor to the rest. The latter also was sequestrated. In a multiplepinding and exoneration against the trustees;—Held (altering judgment of Lord Cowan), that mala fides not being alleged against them, and the father having been admittedly entitled in law to uplift the money, and the caution, though extrajudicial, having been admittedly sufficient at the time, the trustees were entitled to take credit for the sums so paid by them, and were not liable either to the pupil or minor for the subsequent misapplication of the funds or insufficiency of the cautioners.

Process—Multiplepinding—Opening of Record.—A closed record in a multiplepinding carries with it all the finality and effects of a closed record in an ordinary action: Therefore, held incompetent to open up a record closed on the above statements for the purpose of introducing such averments of knowledge on the part of the trustees in regard to the bankrupt and insolvent circumstances and previous conduct of the father of the beneficiaries as could have implied mala fides on the part in paying the money to him, without, at least, judicial caution.

Feb. 18, 1856. THIS litigation commenced in 1848. In 1809, the deceased William Stevenson executed a trust-disposition and deed of settlement by which he conveyed his whole heritable and moveable estate to certain trustees for the purposes therein mentioned. The deed contained this direction:—"In second place, I will and appoint, that the said trustees, or quorum foresaid, No. 110. account for or pay and divide the whole proceeds of the foresaid heritable subjects, effects, debts, sums of money, and others, hereby conveyed, with the rents, interest, and profits, if any be, under the deductions before and after mentioned, to and among my said children before named, or any other child or children to be lawfully procreated of my body, in the proportions after mentioned, on their respectively attaining the age of 25 years complete." Feb. 18, 1857.

1st Division.
Lord Cowan.
C.

Stevenson's
Trustees v.
Dumbreck.

This was followed by a declaration that "the shares or proportions of my foresaid subjects and effects to which my said daughters shall be entitled are conveyed to them only in liferent, during all the days of their lives, and to the child or children who may be lawfully procreated of their bodies in fee: and which liferent provisions in favour of my said daughters shall be exclusive of the jus mariti or right of administration of any husband whom they may marry, and shall not be affectable by their debts or deeds, or liable to be attached by their creditors, and that any receipts or discharges to be granted by them to my said trustees shall be equally valid and effectual as if granted with consent of their said husbands."

The provisions in favour of his children were then declared by the truster to be in full of legitim. He appointed his trustees to be tutors and curators to his children during their pupillarities and minorities, and declared that they should not, in either of their capacities of trust-disponees, executors, or tutors, be liable in diligence, or for omissions or negligence, nor in solidum with or for one another, or for any factor to be appointed by them.

There was no exclusion of the tutorial and curatorial powers of the father of his daughters' children.

William Stevenson, the truster, died on 27th July 1839. He left three sons and three daughters. Their shares of their father's estate were fixed by the terms of the trust-deed. One of the daughters, Margaret Stevenson, had previously married a Mr John Dumbreck. She died about six months after her father, in January 1840. She left two children, Charles, aged six years, and John, aged fifteen.

Article 3 of the statement for the trustees was as follows:—"The objectors' mother at the time of her death had attained the age of 25 years. Between the date of her death and the date of the discharge to be immediately noticed, of 20th October 1841, certain small payments were made for behoof of the objectors to meet the expense of their clothing, maintenance, and education—their father having been unfortunate in business and unable to support them. The objectors and their father, as curator for the one and administrator for the other, insisted further for payment of the full sum due to them, and raised an action against the trustees to enforce that demand, which the latter were advised they could not resist. The balance (amounting to about L.590) was therefore agreed to be paid, and, accordingly, the discharge already referred to was granted by the objectors' father as administrator-in-law and tutor for his son Charles, then in pupillarity, and by the objector John, then a minor, and his father, as his curator."

The discharge was dated 20th October 1841, and proceeded on this preamble:—"And whereas I, the said John Dumbreck, junior, being now in the years of minority, applied to the said trustees, with consent of my said father, for payment of my share of the said provision, and I, the said John Dumbreck, senior, also applied, as administrator-in-law and tutor to the said John Dumbreck, my second son, who is still in the years of pupillarity, for payment of the other half of the said provision payable to me—and whereas the said trustees agreed to comply with these applications, upon condition that we should grant to them a valid and formal discharge, with warrandice, and security to the effect underwritten;" therefore, in consideration of L.588, 10s. 5d. paid to them, "being the balance of their mother's share and proportion of her father's means and estate," they simpliciter discharged the trustees of the same.

Articles 5 and 6 of the statement for the trustees were as follow:—"In order as far as practicable to secure and protect the objector's interest in the sums thus paid, the trustees stipulated that William Waddell, sometime baker in Cumbernauld, and Michael Waddell, writer in Glasgow, should become, conjunctly and severally, bound that the objector's father should faithfully and properly discharge the office of administrator-in-law and tutor and curator for his said sons, as regarded the sums of money paid over to him as aforesaid, and should duly count and reckon with them when they came of age. The object of this stipulation was to enable the objectors, when they came of age, to go against William and Michael Waddell, as well as against their father, if the money had not been duly applied for their benefit, or was not fully accounted for. An obligation to this effect was accordingly inserted in the deed of discharge, which was signed by the Messrs Waddell, who, at the sametime, became parties to the clause of warrandice in the deed.

(6), The circumstances of the objectors' father being at the time in an unsatisfactory state, it had farther been arranged between the parties that a factory should be granted by the objectors and their father for their respective rights foresaid, in favour of the said Michael Waddell, to enable him to uplift and invest all sums of money to which the objectors had right for their behoof. Accordingly, a deed of factory and commission was granted, of even date with the said discharge, by the objector John Dumbreck, junior, and his father as his curator, and by the father as administrator and tutor for his son Charles, authorising Michael Waddell to uplift and receive the foresaid sums, and any additional sum which might come to be payable, and to 'deposit or otherwise invest the said sums either in bank or on heritable or personal security, according to his discretion, in his own name, for their behoof.'

The objectors' answer to that last statement was: "Admitted that the objectors' father's circumstances were in an unsatisfactory state, but it is not known that the deed of factory and commission was granted in favour of Michael Waddell."

In the condescendence of the fund in medio, the trustees credited themselves with a sum of L.11,879, 15s. 6d., as being "sums paid to the different members of the family." That sum of L.11,879, 15s. 6d. included the L.590 referred to in the above discharge.

The objections to the condescendence were thus stated in articles 6 and 7 of the objectors' statements:—"Objection 6, for C. Dumbreck.—The sums before mentioned, alleged to have been so paid to or for behoof of the objector and his brother John, were not so paid or applied. The objector's father whose right of administration was excluded by the trust-deed, applied the sums that came into his hands for his own behoof and purposes. The discharge before mentioned granted by the objector's brother John, his father and Messrs Waddell, was not signed by the objector, as he was then a boy of about seven years of age, and incapable of granting it. The alleged cautioner, Mr Michael Waddell, received the foresaid sum of L.598, 8s., and instead of applying it for behoof of the objector and his brother, he, at various times, made certain payments therefrom to the objector's father, who, in like manner, applied them solely to his own purposes. The said Michael Waddell has lately been sequestrated in terms of the Bankrupt Act, and, at the date of his sequestration, there remained in his hands of the above sum no less than L.351 unaccounted for."

The objection for John Dumbreck, junior, was in similar terms, only that he stated that the discharge "was not signed by the objector voluntarily, but he was compelled or unduly induced by his father to do so when he was only fifteen years of age."

Stevenson's
Trustees v.
Dumbreck.

"Objection 7, for C. Dumbreck.—The objector's father, since the death of his mother, has been twice married, and has a family by each wife. The objector and his brother John have been totally neglected by him, and their provisions under the settlement of their maternal grandfather appropriated as above mentioned."

The objection for John Dumbreck was in similar terms.

In these circumstances the objectors pleaded, that the payments objected to were not duly made by the trustees, nor warranted by the terms or nature of the trust. And Charles Dumbreck farther pleaded, that the discharge founded on was not binding on him, in respect it was not granted by him, nor by any one entitled under the trust-deed, to receive the fund in question on his behalf. And John Dumbreck pleaded, that in the circumstances the discharge was not binding on him, or, at all events, was reducible at his instance, on the head of minority and lesion.

The trustees pleaded, that the deed of discharge and deed of factory and commission, followed by the action and decree, effectually barred the objector John Dumbreck, junior, from challenging or repudiating the payments now objected to, and equally barred Charles Dumbreck from challenging them. That they the trustees were entitled to pay the objectors' provisions to them, and to their father as curator, and as tutor and administrator; and, having done so in good faith, to the extent stated in the condescendence of the fund in medio, they could not be held bound to pay the sums a second time.

The Lord Ordinary, on 17th January 1854, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that, in accounting with the objector Charles Dumbreck, the trustees of Mr Stevenson are not entitled to take credit for the two sums alleged to have been paid by them on his account to his father John Dumbreck, as his administrator-in-law, conform to discharge No. 68, and receipt dated 12th June 1843, No. 66 of process, and to that effect sustains the objections for the said Charles Dumbreck; and, as regards the objections stated by John Dumbreck, repels the same, in respect of said discharge and receipt, and decerns: Finds the said Charles Dumbreck entitled to the expenses incurred by him, as these shall be taxed in conformity with the principle explained in the annexed note; but finds no expenses due hinc inde as between John Dumbreck and the trustees: Appoints an account of the expenses found due to be lodged," &c.*

* "NOTE.—The points adverted to in the note to the interlocutor of 20th May 1852 were ably argued at the renewed debate; but, while the Lord Ordinary still feels the question as to the validity of the payments by the trustees objected to by John and Charles Dumbreck attended with considerable difficulty, he has arrived at the conclusion embodied in the interlocutor without much hesitation. The position of the two objectors is materially different; and this difference requires to be attended to in the argument. At the time the payment was made to the father, his son Charles was in pupillarity, and the discharge relied on by the trustees was consequently granted by the father alone as administrator-in-law; but his son John was in minority, and the discharge bears to be granted by him and by his father, as his administrator-in-law and curator. A great variety of letters and documents were brought forward by the parties, and were largely commented upon at the debate. The Lord Ordinary thinks that, while, on the one hand, there is no evidence to implicate the trustees, or their agent and factor, the deceased Mr Jameson, in a charge of fraud or collusion, or to hold them as having acted in bad faith in the management of the fund; so, on the other hand, clear proof that they were perfectly aware of the facts and circumstances, and the embarrassed state of his affairs, and that they well knew that, to part with the money to him, in his character of administrator-in-law, was to peril the safety of the fund. Nay, it is shown by the productions, that, having themselves this belief, they consulted counsel as to the course they ought to follow, and were advised that they could not safely pay to the father, in the state of his circumstances, except under a decree of this Court. The trustees and their agent and factor were, nevertheless, persuaded to pay over the fund, without such sanction, to the father, or rather to his agent Michael Waddell, acting under a deed of factory and commission from the father. Certain precautionary measures, no doubt, were taken by the trustees to guard against the possible loss of the children's funds; and it is for consideration how far the adoption of those measures is sufficient to protect them from the responsibility that would otherwise have been the legal consequence of their acts.

"On one point the Lord Ordinary has formed a clear opinion. In the state of the father's affairs, as established by the documents in process, and as admitted in the record by the trustees, payment to him of the funds of his pupil child, without any security for their faithful application, would not have been justifiable, and his discharge could have no effect as a protection to them. The powers of the father, as administrator-in-law, were at an early period defined by the Court in a case very analogous to the present—Govan v. Richardson, 12th February 1633, D. 16,263. The debtor there refused to pay to the father, and consigned the money in a suspension, and thereby obtained judicial exoneration; and the Lords found the same ought not to be given up to the father, 'until the time he found caution to make the same furthcoming to her—the pupil—at her lawful age, in respect he was but a poor man, and it was feared that he might spend the money to the bairn's prejudice.' The same principle is recognised in the other cases to which reference has been made in the former note; and, in the case of Johnston, 1822, the father, being bankrupt, was superseded altogether, and a judicial factor appointed. This is consonant with legal principle. The bankruptcy of a mandatory empowered to uplift money operates the presumed revocation of the mandate; and no debtor, in the knowledge of his bankruptcy, could safely pay to the mandatory. The office of administrator conferred by law on the father cannot but be similarly affected by his bankruptcy—or even without bankruptcy by his known embarrassment and poverty. The debtors to the children, when aware of the father's condition, cannot be in safety to pay to him so circumstanced.

"This principle is peculiarly applicable to a case like the present. This is not the ordinary case of debtor and creditor. The trustees act under a family settlement, by the terms of which the granter makes provision for his children and grand children; and, although the trustees are not nominated tutors and curators, it is apprehended that they stand, nevertheless, in a more responsible position to the grand children of their constituent than mere ordinary debtors in a sum of money. To some extent, there is a duty imposed on them with regard to the funds under their charge belonging to children under age; and they must take care that the parties legally entitled to require payment, for behoof of the children, are in a situation duly to manage the funds when paid to them. And, accordingly, in all cases of this kind, the Court will, upon the representation of trustees, see that the interests of pupil and minor children are sufficiently protected.

"The next inquiry regards the effect of the steps taken by the trustees to protect the children from any loss of their provisions that might arise from the father having got the money; and it is here that the distinction in the situation of the two objectors comes to be of practical moment.

"What the trustees did was, first, to insist upon caution being given by the father not merely in aid of the warrandice contained in the discharge, but to the effect that the father should faithfully and properly fulfil the office of administrator-in-law and tutor and curator for his sons, in so far as related to the sums paid over to him for their behoof respectively by the trustees; and, second, as part of the transaction that the father and his minor son should execute a factory and commission in favour of Michael Waddell, who acted as his agent in carrying through the transaction and became one of his cautioners, by which power was conferred on the factor uplift the money, and to deposit or invest the same according to his discretion, under the obligation of accounting to the sons when they came of age, and subject to the declaration that the factory should be revocable on no pretence whatever during the nonage of the sons.

"Now, 1st, as regards the objector Charles Dumbreck, the pupil, it appears to the Lord Ordinary, that what the trustees thus did cannot protect them against the claims for his provision. As he was no party to the discharge and receipt, it is considered that, in transacting as they did with his father as administrator-in-law, and sanctioning the money getting into the hands of Michael Waddell, the trustees acted unjustifiably, and cannot plead the payment as exonerating them from their liability to account to the true creditor. They, no doubt, took the obligation, not merely of Michael Waddell, but also of his father William Waddell, as cautioners to the effect mentioned; but this cannot protect them from direct liability — (1.) Because, apart from the specialties of the case, having extrajudicially accepted of caution, and not sought judicial sanction to their proceedings, they must take on themselves the responsibility of making that caution effectual: (2.) Because, in the special circumstances of this case, they ought not to have paid to the administrator-in-law, even upon caution, but ought to have taken the judgment of the Court as to the terms on which and the parties to whom it behoved them to make payment of the pupil's money; and (3.) Because, in fact, from the peculiar transaction under which the money was paid, payment was not made to the administrator-in-law, so as to place the funds under his charge, but was made to another person altogether, in whose hands the funds were placed truly beyond the control of the legal administrator.

"2d, The position of the other objector is different. Being in minority at the date of the discharge and receipt, these deeds bear to be executed by him, with the consent of his father, as his curator; and, in like manner, the factory and commission in favour of Michael Waddell is granted by him with his father's consent. These deeds are in all respects regular; and the Lord Ordinary does not see sufficient ground, under this record, for refusing effect to them as deeds by which the objector is bound. There may be room for the discharge and factory being set aside at the objector's instance, now that he is come of age, on the special grounds stated in the record. No such proceeding, however, has been yet attempted. The discharge, as well as the factory and commission, and also the subsequent receipt, stand unchallenged; and it must be held that the steps that were taken by the trustees had the consent of the objector. In the face of his own deeds, he cannot be allowed to dispute the payments made by the trustees on the ground of their being unjustifiable and illegal. They are entitled, as matters stand, to place the payments to his debit—leaving him to make his recourse good against those parties with whom he and his curator consented to entrust the administration of his funds.

"The grounds on which the discharge is objected to are set forth in article 6th of the objector's statement. They are, in substance—(1.) That the discharge was not signed by the objector voluntarily, but under compulsion or undue inducement by his father; (2.) That Michael Waddell, who received the money, instead of applying it for behoof of the objector, at various times, made payments to the father for his own purposes; and (3.) That Michael Waddell has lately been sequestrated, having in his hands at the time a large amount of the money unaccounted for. The question is, Whether, in this accounting with the trustees, these matters of fact are relevant to obviate their right to take credit for the money indisputably paid to the objector and his factor with the consent of his father? The Lord Ordinary thinks they are not. It is not said that the trustees were aware of the alleged compulsion and undue inducement under which the objector stood in signing the discharge. Neither is it alleged that the trustees—and there is no proof to the contrary—were aware of the money, having been improperly given to the father for his own purposes. And, finally, that the money has been lost through the mismanagement of Michael Waddell cannot affect the trustees, assuming them warranted by the facts. Counsel for the objectors thereupon moved for leave to make an addition to the record, such as, without materially altering it, would remove the objection now taken to it; and the Court, "before answer," allowed the objectors to state in a minute the addition they proposed to make. That minute having been lodged, was answered by the trustees; and on 13th January 1857 the case was again called.

The minute for the objectors contained the following statements, with corresponding pleas:—"1. The sums referred to in the 4th and 5th objections¹ for the said objectors, and for which the said trustees have taken credit in their accounts, were not paid to or applied for behoof of the said objectors. The said sums were paid away by the trustees or their factor—during the pupillarity of Charles and the minority of John Dumbreck—to the objectors' father, who was then bankrupt, or at least insolvent, and who was in great want, and unable even to provide the ordinary means of subsistence for himself or his children; and of all this the said trustees, who were brothers-in-law of the objectors' father, were well aware before they paid to him the said sums. 2. The trustees were also perfectly aware, before they so paid away the said sums, that the objectors' father was not a fit or proper person to be entrusted therewith. Before paying to him the sum of L.588, 10s. 5d., referred to in the discharge No. 68 of process, and the sum of L.28, 1s. 1d., referred to in the receipt No. 66 of process, the trustees were well aware that the objectors' father had demanded the said sums from them, in order to apply the same, or at least a portion thereof, in the conduct of his own business, and that he had already applied for his own behoof a considerable portion of the funds belonging to the objectors, which had been previously paid to him by the trustees."

It further stated that the trustees had been advised by counsel that it was not safe for them to pay the funds without judicial authority; but notwithstanding this, they had paid away the funds, and the consequence was, that the greater portion was lost or misapplied. The minute also stated special objections to the discharge, and to two receipts produced in process.

entitled and bound to have paid to the parties by whom the discharge in their favour was granted.

"The objector contended, that there was no necessity for an action of reduction on the head of minority and lesion, but that, ope exceptionis, the discharge and receipt might be objected to in this accounting.

"There are cases in which such an action is not necessary, as when the act is to the minor—to which he excepts—bears from its character and on the face of it a presumption of lesion. Here no such case exists; and there are not even relevant statements to support an action of reduction on the head of minority and lesion. The lesion alleged to have been suffered by the minor is not so much from the act to which the trustees were alone parties, viz., payment of the minor's money to Michael Waddell, as from his and the father's alleged malversation and wrongful acts, and the factor's subsequent bankruptcy. As regards the payment of the money by itself, the trustees would have been bound to pay the minor on his requisition had his father been dead, and had the minor had no curators. But the father's concurrence, both in the discharge and in the commission and factory to Waddell, under which the money was paid to the latter, made it imperative on the trustees to pay over the money as required. Their bona fides in so acting is assumed, for the documentary evidence does not make out the reverse.

"The Lord Ordinary, on the whole, considers that the trustees are entitled to take credit for those payments on account of this objector.

"The Auditor, in taxing the account of expenses found due to Charles Dumbreck, will keep in view, that the other objector has been found entitled to no expenses, and proceed upon the principles of taxation which appear to him properly applicable to a case of combined discussion like this—reporting to the Lord Ordinary his view, unless there be some rule recognised in practice in similar cases, which he will follow."

The trustees, in their answers, denied the objectors' statements, and No. 110. pleaded;—That the statement in the minute being intended to establish grounds of objection to the raisers' accounts, and of liability against them, Feb. 18, 1857. which were entirely new, and inconsistent with those previously maintained by the objectors on the closed record, it was incompetent, and ought not to be received. Stevenson's Trustees v. Dumbreck.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It appears to me that this minute proposes entirely to alter this record and the shape of the case. The record is closed on objections by the Dumbrecks to the statements of the trustees. On 18th March 1851, the Lord Ordinary "closes the record upon the adjusted papers for the parties, being Nos. 14, 15, 16, and so on, of process." It is not said that any of the documents embraced in this interlocutor contain elements for disposing of the case not now before us. The minute proposes to alter the record most materially. The first article, perhaps, is not so objectionable. The word "insolvent," which occurs in it, I do not remember to have seen in the previous record. But the second statement stands in a different predicament. The trustees are said to have been "perfectly aware," before they paid the money, that the objectors' father was not a fit person to be entrusted with it. There is something here averred in addition to the pecuniary embarrassments of the father. It is said that he had demanded the said sums "from the trustees in order to apply them" in the conduct of his own business, and that he had already misappropriated a considerable portion of the funds. I regard that as a new averment. It is intended to represent something different from the mere description of the pecuniary circumstances of the father. The statement as to the perfect knowledge of the trustees is very important as regards the good faith of the trustees. In that respect it alters the case altogether. It is in vain to argue that the matters here averred are sufficiently within the statements of the trustees themselves. If so, the objectors have such benefit from them as the statements admit of, and there can be no loss to the objectors by refusing to add their own averments to the record. But I regard these averments as altering the record, and, for that reason, I am not prepared to receive them. To do so would be going farther than we have done in any case, and it would be a bad precedent. There is no proposal to add the statements in the minute as res noviter, and therefore, I give no opinion upon that point. But, in the circumstances, I am of opinion that we should refuse the objectors' motion. There is a concluded proof as well as a closed record, and, looking upon this proposed addition as a total change of the record, and not an explanation of it, I am for refusing to allow it to be received.

LORD IVORY.—I cannot say that I am able to differ. It is an unfortunate result, however, for the parties. This question arises on the motion of the objectors' counsel in the middle of the debate on the merits, when, finding themselves pressed by the line of argument for the trustees, they thought to better their position by getting the record opened. The fair meaning of such a proceeding on the face of it points strongly to an alteration of the record in order to better their case. Their may be situations in which a party's case may be relieved of superfluity and light thrown on what is dark, without trenching on the essence of the averments which constitute the record; and such minutes, containing explanatory statements, we have been in use to allow, under such conditions as to expenses or otherwise, as we see fit. But it is impossible to look upon this minute otherwise than as an attempt to change the substance of the record, and in any other action this would not have been competent under the Judicature Act. It is true that a multiplicity of pending and other such processes are excepted in the Act of Parliament, and specially dealt with in the Act of Sederunt. But, nevertheless, the statute and the Act point to this, that the ordinary form shall be followed as far as possible and expedient, and I am not aware that this case—the record being closed—does not carry with it all the finality and effects of a closed record in ordinary actions. Therefore we are here as in other cases where the party wishes to open up a record in order to introduce new and essential matter. I doubt the competency of that. I regret it in this case, but it is of more importance to protect the interests of the public, which laxity in form is apt to endanger. Therefore I agree that the motion should be refused.

No. 110.

 Stevenson's
 Trustees v.

a very peculiar position. The interlocutor and note of the Lord Ordinary, upon which this new view of the case is introduced, is dated on 20th May 1852, and both parties appeared then to hold that there was sufficient within the case for dealing with it in that new view of it; and so diligence ad probandum was moved for and granted. Probation is not renounced till long after that date—December 1853—the minute is lodged of that date, but not fee-funded till May 1854. Avizandum with the condescendence of the fund and the objections to it was made on 8th December 1853, so that at the very moment that the minute is said to have been lodged, the case was lying before the Lord Ordinary, who could not have seen that minute, and his interlocutor is dated on 17th January 1854. A very plausible argument may be raised that that was a proceeding by which neither party could be bound in reference to this interlocutor. But that does not touch this minute, the competency of receiving which we are now considering. I am, upon the whole, of opinion that we cannot receive it.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—Upon what ground are we asked to add this minute to the record? It is not on the ground that the interlocutor closing the record in a multiplepointing in a question as to the fund in medio, is not in the same predicament as other interlocutors closing records. Had that proposition been contended for, I was quite prepared to negative it. Nor is it on the ground of the allegations in the minute being res noviter. The footing on which the motion is made is, that it falls under the rule established by some decisions of this Court, that when there are in a record ambiguous expressions, the Court will give the party the privilege for its own satisfaction of explaining these. But I agree entirely with your Lordship that the allegations we are now asked to admit are not of the character of explanations of what is ambiguous, but are new matter altogether; therefore they are inadmissible.

I wish only further to remark that the Court should be very cautious how they extend that privilege farther than it has already been recognised. It is of the worst consequence to encourage parties to make ambiguous or slovenly statements in the record, in the belief that when pressed as to their meaning, they may be allowed to put upon them the meaning which best suits them by way of explanation. We are bound to guard against that, not only in justice to the rules of Court, but for another reason of very great importance, that a very large proportion of the time of this Court has been occupied of late in construing and attempting to find out the meaning of records, and I shall be very unwilling to extend any rule which will have the effect of increasing that difficulty.

LORD DEAS concurred. We have constantly occasion to remark upon the loose and imperfect manner in which records are prepared in this Court, which leads to great waste of the public time, and great expense to litigants. If the advisers of parties will not take warning from these remarks, the parties themselves must bear the consequences. There is no other way of enforcing those forms of procedure which are essential to the ends of justice.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Refuse to allow the statements contained in the said minute to be held as part of the closed record, or to be added thereto; and reserve the question of expenses of the discussion in regard to the matter."

The debate on the merits was then resumed. The trustees pleaded;—That they were entitled to take credit for the sums objected to. The objection that they ought to have obtained judicial authority before paying to the father, was entitled to no weight. No doubt had they obtained such authority they would have been perfectly safe; but it did not follow that because they had not obtained such authority they ought not to have made the payments, nor that they ought to be visited with a penalty for doing extrajudicially what they might with perfect safety have done judicially. In so acting they had saved the expense of such judicial procedure to the estate; and the whole question was, had their conduct brought loss to the estate which judicial procedure would have averted? If not, there was no liability. Previous decisions established nothing more than this, that when an administrator-in-law was in embarrassed or bankrupt circumstances, the tees were not safe to pay to him without security. There was no rule that judicial caution alone would protect trustees paying funds to an administrator-in-law in embarrassed circumstances. Such a rule might be very politic, but it did not exist, and without it the objectors had no case.¹

Trustees v.
Dumbreck.

The objectors pleaded;—That judicial caution implied enquiry by the Court into all the circumstances of the case, and the sanction of the Court, as the guardian of all pupils and minors in the kingdom. The trustees having acted on their own authority, took upon themselves all liability for whatever loss might arise from their proceedings; and their own statements disclosed such a case of knowledge on their part as did not warrant them in paying without judicial sanction. Farther, this was not an ordinary case of debtor and creditor. The trustees acted under a family settlement, by the terms of which the granter made provision for his children and grandchildren, and although the trustees were not nominated tutors and curators to the grandchildren, they stood, nevertheless, in a more responsible position to the grandchildren than mere ordinary debtors in a sum of money.²

LORD CURRIEHILL.—The only purpose of the trust-settlement of the late Mr Stevenson which we have occasion to consider, is that by which the trustees are appointed to account for or pay the proceeds and revenues of the subjects conveyed to them to the truster's children, on their respectively attaining the age of 25 years complete. The deed also provides that the shares or proportions to which the truster's daughters shall be entitled are conveyed to them only in liferent, and to their children in fee. These liferent provisions in favour of his daughters are declared to be exclusive of the jus mariti or right of administration of their husbands. The provisions in favour of his children are also declared to be in full of legitim, and every other claim whatever. The trustees are appointed tutors and curators to the truster's children during their pupillarities, and there is a declaration that the persons so named shall not, in their capacities of trust-disponees, executors, or tutors, be liable in diligence, or for omissions or negligence, nor in solidum with or for one another, or for any factor to be appointed by them.

The truster survived the execution of this deed about thirty years. He died in 1839, leaving three sons and three daughters, one of whom was married to Dumbreck. She died soon after her father, leaving two sons, the objectors in this action. They were entitled to the share of which their mother had the liferent, and that right vested in them immediately on their mother's death. It appears that, after the death of Mrs Dumbreck, various sums were paid by the trustees for the support and education of these children. These sums were paid to their father, as their administrator-in-law. In 1841, the funds had been realised to a considerable extent, and a division to a large amount was ready to be made. The sum divisible among the children of Mrs Dumbreck amounted to the sum of L.294 to each of them. That sum was demanded from the trustees by the children, or on their behalf by their father as administrator-in-law; and it is stated, and not denied, that action was raised for payment of it. In that year a sum was paid to the father for behoof of his children as administrator-in-law, and tutor for the youngest son, and curator for the eldest. A discharge was granted by the father in that capacity—the eldest son, a minor, being also a party to the discharge. The deed also contains a clause of warrandice. It is dated in October 1841.

So the matter rested till 1848, when the present action was raised at the instance of the trustees. The grounds upon which these payments, for which the trustees take credit in the condescendence of the fund in medio are objected to, are contained in the 6th article of the objectors' statements. Our duty is now to decide this case upon the facts and pleas in the record. We are not entitled to travel beyond it. If there is anything material not contained in the record, it is the objectors' fault or misfortune that it is not stated. But the question we have to determine is, Whether there is a relevant case stated in this record? The nature of the objections there set forth is, that the funds were not paid or applied to or on behalf of the objectors, that is to say, that their father did not so apply them. Of course these sums were not so applied by the trustees, because they were out of their hands, being paid to the person legally authorised to receive payment of them. They were misapplied by the childrens' father, but that is a matter with which, in the ordinary case, trustees have nothing to do. They were not guardians of these children. They paid the money to the right party, and, having done so, they had nothing more to do with the application of it.

Then it is said that the discharge was not signed by the youngest son, who, at the date of it, was a boy of seven years of age. That is perfectly true. But the tutor of a pupil is by law empowered to grant a discharge for his ward, and therefore this statement amounts to this,—that the discharge was rightly granted by the party entitled in law to grant it.

Farther, the objectors complain that "payment was made to the objectors' father." Why not? He was their legal guardian. But if the money was properly paid to him, their administrator, who was in law entitled to receive it, and was misappropriated by him, that is a matter for which the objectors must call their father to account; but it is a matter with which the trustees, who made the payment properly, have no concern.

Then "Michael Waddell (the cautioner) has been sequestrated." Again, that is a matter with which the trustees have no concern, unless the objectors can take the case out of the ordinary rule.

The seventh article is a repetition of the averment that the money has been misappropriated.

Now all that is clear enough. But it is said that while the objectors have not stated anything more specific in support of their objections, the trustees themselves have, in their statements in defence, disclosed a different case upon which the objectors are entitled to found as against them, and they found particularly upon the 3d, 5th, and 6th statements for the trustees, as shewing that the actings of their father, as guardian, were so far crippled by pecuniary embarrassments, that he was not entitled to uplift these sums without judicial authority, and finding judicial caution for its proper application.

I have great doubts whether the objectors are entitled to maintain that plea under this record. But supposing they were, this being a statement of the trustees, the objectors, if they found upon it, must take it precisely as it is made. They are not entitled to adopt it so far, and then qualify it as a statement of their own. They are not founding on it as evidence corroborative of their own statement, but as a separate and independent statement, on which a separate plea in law is to be rested. Taking the statement on that footing, therefore, what does it amount to? That the trustees knew that the affairs of this administrator-in-law were in some embarrassment. They did not know that he was bankrupt or sequestrated, or even that he was insolvent, but only embarrassed. They imposed on him the duty of finding caution; and this statement is introduced for the purpose of explaining the reason of their adopting this extraordinary course. He found caution; and it is not alleged that, at the time this payment was made, the cautioners were insufficient. It is only said that the caution was not approved of by a court of law. I know of no authority in the law of Scotland which requires that such caution shall be judicial. It would have been wise, perhaps, for their own sake, had the trustees obtained the sanction of the Court to their proceedings, so as to exclude all future challenge. But that would have exposed the estate to the expense of such judicial proceedings, and I see no corresponding benefit that would then have been conferred upon it. But the trustees did not apply for such judicial sanction to the proceedings. They took upon themselves the responsibility of the cautioners being sufficient; and it appears from the documents in process, that they did not do so rashly. It was only after inquiry as to their sufficiency that they accepted them, and their sufficiency at the time is not now disputed.

Trustees v.
Dumbreck.

But, again, it is said, that this loss was occasioned by a species of new trust created by the trustees, in respect of an arrangement by which the money was handed over to one of the cautioners as factor—now bankrupt—upon a footing which precluded both the children and the father from taking it out of his hands; and it is argued that the trustees, having been parties to such a transaction, are responsible for the result. Under this record it is impossible to listen to this plea. There is no statement nor plea which will enable one to approach it. There is not one word said about this factory in the objectors' statement of fact. It is the trustees who introduce the statement about it; and the objectors, so far from adopting that statement, close the record on this answer to it, that they do not know that a deed of factory was ever granted in favour of Michael Waddell. In that state of the record, the Court cannot listen to objections rested upon that ground. If the objectors have any case of that kind, it may or may not be still open to them. But under the present record, it is impossible, without setting the Judicature Act at defiance, to take up and decide that plea, which I therefore hold to be altogether out of the case.

Looking to the matter in this light, I entirely concur with the Lord Ordinary, that in so far as regards John Dumbreck, junior, the minor and his father, this discharge is effectual; but with regard to Charles Dumbreck, the pupil, I think that the Lord Ordinary is in error, and his finding as upon that branch of the case ought to be altered. The father, as tutor of the pupil son, had a legal title to uplift this money. His title of tutor was a good legal title for that purpose, and therefore what is the objection? He was in embarrassed circumstances. The only effect of that—assuming that we can look at it as part of the objectors' statement—was to impose upon him the obligation of finding caution. He complied with that obligation. He found caution which was at the time unobjectionable. The money has since been misapplied. That is a matter for which the trustees are not liable; and therefore I think that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be so far altered.

LORD DEAS.—I have nothing to add to the grounds of judgment stated by Lord Curriehill. I go, however, entirely upon the limited nature of the averments in the record, which seem to me not to admit of the application of the law laid down by the Lord Ordinary.

His Lordship's attention does not seem to have been called to the state of that record, and consequently he has gone into matters not there set forth or relied on. Article 6th contains the whole averments made by the objector in support of the objections sustained by the interlocutor to the two payments therein mentioned. The statement that the father's administration was excluded by the trust-deed is admitted to be a mistake. There remain only the statement that the larger of the two sums was not paid direct to the father, but to his cautioner, Michael Waddell, who became bankrupt "lately,"—that is nearly ten years afterwards,—with a portion of it in his hands; and the statement that no part of the money was applied on behalf of the objectors, but that all which was paid over to the father was applied by him to his own purposes. In these statements, however, the good faith of the trustees is not impeached. The money paid on the father's discharge was obviously made to pass through Waddell's hands for the better protection of the objectors' interests, and the reverse is not alleged. The trustees' admissions in statements 3d and 6th, that the father had been unfortunate in business, and that his circumstances were in an unsatisfactory state (giving the objectors the full benefit of them), only go to show the prudence of paying through Waddell, and of imposing his cautionary obligation, which is not said to have been insufficient or doubtful when granted. The period of division under the trust-deed had arrived, and the trustees were entitled to bring the trust to a close, and to pay the pupil's share upon the discharge of his administrator-in-law, unless they did so in mala fide, which is nowhere alleged. Had mala fides been averred and proved, I do not say I should have differed from the law laid down by the Lord Ordinary.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I concur, looking to the case on the record and the concluded proof. What other questions might have been raised otherwise, I do not enquire. It is right that I should state, however, that I am aware that Lord Ivory is not quite of that opinion. He is disposed to alter the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary; but rather, as at present advised, to alter it in a different direction. He rather thinks he can see his way to sustaining the interlocutor as regards the pupil, Process—Decree in absence—Reponing—13 & 14 Vict. c. 36, sec. 11.—A decree in respect of no defences, in a cause where the summons had been taken out to see, and which had been twice continued on motions by the defenders' counsel, is a decree not by default, but in absence, and the defender may be reponed against it at any time before extract.

Feb. 18, 1857. A SUMMONS was served on the defender in November 1851, and appeared in the calling lists in December, when appearance was entered, as was seen from the partibus, but no defences were lodged. When the case was enrolled in the printed roll on 13th January 1857, the defenders' counsel appeared, and got it continued till the 17th, when he again appeared, and got it continued till the 21st, when the following interlocutor was pronounced:—"In respect no defences have been lodged, Finds, decerns, and declares against the defenders, in terms of the conclusions of the summons."

The defenders, on 13th February, presented a reclaiming note, praying to be reponed, and allowed to give in defences.

The pursuer objected to the competency of reclaiming, on the ground that, under the recent Act, decrees by default became final if not reclaimed against within ten days, and the decree in question was one, not in absence, but by default. The marking on the partibus, and the appearance made by counsel, were conclusive on this point.¹

The defenders admitting that if the decree were one by default, the reclaiming note was incompetent, contended that it was a decree in absence. There was no order standing against them which they had failed to obtemper, and any decree was to be treated as in absence till not only appearance had been made, but defences proponed.²

Process—Decree in absence—Bar—Personal exception.—Question, whether a decree in absence obtained against a defender, on a summons, which had been personally served on him, can be opened up by his representatives after his death? and held (affirming judgment of Lord Benholme), that the representatives of the defender were barred from opening up the decree by reduction, in respect that during the defender's life he had opportunities of challenging the decree, and did not do so, but, on the contrary, he, and (after his death) his representatives wrote letters on the footing of it being a valid and unchallengeable decree, and proposed a settlement of accounts on that footing.

This was an action of reduction brought in 1854 by the children of the late James Gillespie Gillespie, and by Mr Mackersy, his trust-dispensee (under a private trust), of a decree in absence obtained in 1829 against Mr Gillespie by the present defenders, in name of an assignee, Mr Aitchison. Feb. 18, 1857.
2^d DIVISION.
Ld. Benholme.
R.

Among the grounds of challenge was this, that Aitchison had no valid title to pursue the action, as in so far as it flowed from Mrs Dods (one of the defenders), her right had vested in her husband, and (as he was dead) had passed to his executors, who were not parties to the assignation.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—“ Finds, that in the year 1829 an action was raised by William Ker Aitchison, as trust-assignee of the present defenders, and of the late Mrs Elizabeth Gillespie or Dickson, against the nearest of kin of their then deceased brother, William Gillespie, libelling that the said deceased was at the time of his death indebted to his said sisters, Mrs Dods and Mrs Dickson, in the sum of L.140, being cash advanced by them to him for fitting him out for the Island of Jamaica, and for defraying the expense of his passage, and otherwise conform to a state of said debt, commencing on the 16th January, and ending on 1st February 1812, and for which advances the said William Gillespie granted a holograph acknowledgment in the shape of a promissory-note, which is recited in the summons, with interest since the date of the advance, and concluding for decree for the said advance with interest, against the said nearest of kin, as charged to enter to the said William Gillespie: Finds that one of the defenders called as nearest of kin in this action was the late James Gillespie Gillespie, the father of the present pursuers, Mrs Ann Gillespie or Wemess, and Miss Alice Jane Gillespie: Finds that this action proceeds upon a charge against the said James Gillespie to enter, and a citation against him as defender, both personally given: Finds that decree in absence was pronounced upon this summons, being the decree which is now sought to be reduced by the present pursuers: Finds that the said James Gillespie Gillespie survived till the year 1845; but that he made no attempt to impeach the said decree, or to dispute the truth of the statement on which it proceeded: Finds that, on the contrary, the said James Gillespie Gillespie, by his holograph letters dated 31st March and 8th April 1845, addressed to the defender, Mr Dickson, not only admitted the original constitution, but also the present subsistence of the debt, and acquiesced in the application of William Gillespie's share of Somerville's¹

Dods.

Mr Dickson had, on 19th July 1841, written to Mr Mackersy:—"Mr William Gillespie was indebted to Mrs Dickson and her sister Mrs Dods in L.140, advanced to fit him out for the West Indies, &c., and interest since 1st February 1812, when he left this country, with L.9, 12s. 9½d. of expenses of process—for all which I hold a decree of constitution against his representatives, dated 30th June 1829." To this Mr Mackersy replied:—"With regard to your claim against the late Mr William Gillespie, I presume the same will now be extinguished by his share of Mr Somerville's succession, which, of course, would be applied by you in liquidation of the debt. I have made a rough calculation on the subject, and this seems to be the result, or nearly so."

In 1845, some correspondence passed between Mr J. G. Gillespie himself and Mr Dickson, to whom he had written about "my sixth share of William's share of his aunt's property, which you are fully aware is not cognizable by my trust-deed." In his reply, Mr Dickson said,—“You are of course aware that there is a preferable debt due to Mrs Dods and me by the representatives of Mr William Gillespie, of which a detailed statement was sent to your agents, Messrs Weir and Gardner, on 30th April last. From this state I observe that it will take at least 10 or 12 years before his share of the rents of Mr Somerville's trust-properties will admit of the debt being paid off.” Mr Gillespie's answer is holograph, and contains this passage:—"With respect to the period at which this (William's) share becomes divisible amongst his representatives, it humbly strikes me you have made a

* "NOTE.—The advance of the two sisters to their brother, William Gillespie, as a family arrangement, was probably well known at or about the time, to James Gillespie Gillespie, the other brother. At all events it was distinctly brought under his notice by the judicial proceedings in 1829. These proceedings were intended for the very purpose of putting these advances upon a distinct footing. It is to be presumed that James Gillespie Gillespie would have defended the action had he not been cognisant of its justice. It appears from the general charge, No. 31, and the decret of constitution, No. 13, that the charge and summons were both personally executed against him. At any time during his life, his oath might have been resorted to as a means of proof, had that been necessary.

"But it is plain that he never disputed the debt, and that he acquiesced in the mode of liquidating it, which it is the object of the present pursuers to dispute.

"The present reduction has been brought confessedly to aid their pleas in the process of multiplepoinding raised as to the distribution of Somerville's estate, in which they dispute the payments made by the trustees out of William Gillespie's share, in liquidation of his debt, constituted by the decree in absence. Whether these payments could be impeached even if the pursuers were successful in the present reduction, is a question not hujus loci. But the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that in justice and equity they are not now entitled to succeed in the reduction.

"The title of the pursuer, Mr Mackersy, cannot, it is thought, be maintained independently of the other pursuers for whose behoof he appears substantially to hold. Besides, the trust-deed under which he acts seems to have no application to the truster's interest in his brother William's estate. And, moreover, if it were necessary to go into it, Mr Mackersy's own letters, as well as James Gillespie Gillespie's, would probably afford a bar to his pursuing the present action."

Gillespie v.
Dods.

The pursuers reclaimed. The object of the decree sought to be set aside in this action was to make the estate of a deceased brother attachable for a debt due to his sisters, a debt due by a bill which had long been prescribed. The decree had passed against another brother, James G. Gillespie, as one of his representatives, when 12 years of age, and it had passed in absence, yet the argument was maintained that the merits of the claim could not be looked into or the decree opened up by James's representatives, because he had been personally cited, and was now dead. If that were a sound defence, the doctrine went this length, that if a case were enrolled, and decree was allowed to go in absence, and if the party died, that decree would have all the effect of a decree in foro. The whole law of decrees in absence was peculiar to Scotland, but this was a new principle when applied to the circumstances here: the action of constitution was not directed against the debtor, but only against one of his representatives; there had been others equally entitled to defend, but all representatives were in a situation essentially different from that of the proper debtor; where he is the party, his absence leads to a presumption that he acknowledges the debt to be justly due, and if he appeared, the pursuer could put him to his oath; and therefore a decree in absence had the effect of inverting the relative position of the pursuer and defender. But when the party was a representative who could personally know nothing of the facts alleged against the deceased, these presumptions failed. It had not been alleged by the defenders that J. G. Gillespie, notwithstanding the personal service, had been aware of the decree at the time, and his acquiescence afterwards could not affect the heir's right. All the defenders did was to stand on the decree, not the merits of their case. There was nothing in the accounts or correspondence produced which shewed acquiescence in the decree: if there were any homologation, it applied only to the claim, not the decree. It was a doctrine of great hardship, which would exclude challenge within the prescriptive period, when the pursuers were prepared, as they offered to do here, to challenge the title of the pursuers of the original action, as well as their grounds of debt.¹

The defenders replied, that the rule that a decree in absence could be opened up at any time within the prescriptive period was open to many exceptions. Where the decree proceeded upon a personal citation, and the party against whom it passed did not open it up during his life, it could never be opened up; because, by the death of the principal defender, the pursuer was deprived of the right to refer it to his oath; so, where there had been no personal citation, but the defender had, in a subsequent action, had an opportunity of challenging the decree which proceeded on an open account which was prescribed, and had not availed himself of it, that was held to bar his representatives from opening it up. The present case was stronger than either of these; not only had there been personal citation, but the correspondence shewed that James G. Gillespie, who lived for 16 years after it, and knew all about the circumstances, both of the debt and decree, and its liquidation, never seemed to have thought, although at one time in extreme poverty, of attempting to set it aside. Yet nine years after his death, the attempt was made to get rid of it by setting up a plea of prescription against a debt which had been acknowledged by all parties.²

Feb. 18, 1857. LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is an important case in point of principle, as well as in regard to the substantial justice between the parties.
 Gillespie v. Dods.

Two of the sisters of this family of Gillespie had advanced, as is said, a sum of money to assist in the outfit of their brother William to go to Jamaica, in the year 1812, for which William granted a promissory-note. That seems not to be disputed. William died soon after. He was entitled to a share in the succession of a Mr Somerville, under the settlement of the latter, and his share fell to his brothers and sisters. I do not enter into the question, whether the share of one of the sisters had passed to her husband, and, on his death, to her children, for that point can arise only if we hold the present action is not barred by the facts to which I shall advert. The sisters wished to recover the sum advanced to William out of his share in the above succession, and a trust assignee (as they were also representatives) took proceedings against the next of kin of William, including those sisters, in ordinary form. One of the next of kin was their brother James Gillespie Gillespie, brother of William. Decree of constitution was obtained in June 1830 against him. In the action James Gillespie Gillespie was personally cited. He was living in Edinburgh, where one of his sisters was married in a highly respectable sphere of life. Of the whole matter, and of the proceedings, no one can doubt that he was perfectly cognizant, although he was young when the advance was made to his brother William. Out of the trust-funds which had belonged to William, and out of James's share of these, numerous payments were made to the extinction of the above debt after the decree of constitution, and, as will be seen, with the knowledge of James Gillespie Gillespie. By these payments the debt was paid off.

James Gillespie Gillespie, against whom this decree was taken, lived until 1845, and never attempted to dispute the validity of the decree or the payments made to extinction of this debt. He was, as I understand, in Scotland all that period of 16 years. But he was not undefended, nor were his interests not attended to. There are various deeds granted by him from 1824 downwards, which show that his attention was fully called to his affairs, and to his interest in the above succession. He states that his share in the succession of William's share was not conveyed by his trust-deed. How that may be we know not; but his statement on that point shows that he had his right in that succession most fully in view. And in 1829 his present agent, Mr Mackersy, took charge of his interests. In 1841 Mr Mackersy, acting for him, applied to Mr Dickson, the husband of one of these sisters, for an account of his intromissions as trustee and agent of Mr Somerville's trust-estate, which account he received, and which included the whole payments made as at that date to extinction of this decree. The answer of Mr Dickson is extremely important. Independently of the clear intimation afforded by the account of the payments made to extinction of this debt, this letter fully apprised Mr Mackersy, who is in truth now the party, of this decree of constitution. On the record it is actually denied that Mr Mackersy had any knowledge of this debt until referred to in the recent multiplepoinding. Mackersy's answer is also most important.

Then, in 1845, the late James Gillespie Gillespie, then in Greenock, writes to Mr Dickson a letter on the same subject, which, with the answer, is conclusive.

Such being the facts, nine years after the death of James Gillespie Gillespie, Mr Mackersy, as his acting trustee, although James Gillespie Gillespie had said his trust-deed did not embrace this claim, along with two daughters of James Gillespie Gillespie, who, I hope, have secured themselves as to the expenses of this litigation, by guarantee from Mr Mackersy, raised a reduction of the decree of constitution obtained in 1830 as in absence.

If constrained by any rule of law to sustain this action, it would be a striking illustration of that most anomalous principle in our law as to decrees in absence, which exists, I believe, in no other country. But the decree is safe from challenge. Without going further back than the case of Campbell in 1752, there was then fully established—probably older cases sanctioned the principle—a most salutary restraint on the attempt to open up decrees in absence, viz., that the decree had been acted upon, and real transactions had passed on the faith of it. That case was stronger than any later one, because the decree in absence was taken against an undefended pupil. But the intervening facts were held after the lapse of time, although far short of prescription, to bar the attempt to reduce. The principle on which that case proceeded is well stated in the opinions of the consulted Judges in the case of Brown v. Sinclair, 9th March 1837. That case of Brown v. Sinclair was a very peculiar one, and the opinions show that there was no intention whatever to countenance the unqualified right to open a decree in absence, without reference to the equitable considerations which intervening facts reared up to support the decree. The plea stated in that case was in truth only the technical plea of a title to exclude. That was, indeed, repelled; but the right to open up the decree was not sustained. The facts, however, which followed the decree, were not admitted or clear on the record as in this case, and a proof was allowed. After the proof had been taken the case came again before the Court, 10th March 1841. The case was complicated in fact, and the rubric unhappily misses altogether the point that the case was a continuation of the old case as to a decree in absence. The Lord Ordinary found—(reads). The Court adhered, Lord Fullerton stating that the acquiescence following on the decree was to be looked to as affording evidence of the belief of the parties as to the justice of the decree.

Gillespie v.

The principle established by this case and that of Campbell is surely a most just and reasonable view of the subject, and a most proper limitation of the right to open up a decree in absence. A person is personally cited to an action. He is on the spot. He has the full opportunity of judging whether he should resist that decree or not. He does not do so. The decree is acted on. He acquiesces in its execution. He dies without ever attempting to challenge it. And is it not most just to hold that such acquiescence arose from and proves his belief that the decree was well-founded, and that he knew that he had no ground on the merits, whether there was any defect in point of form or not, for attempting to reduce that decree? After a quarter of a century and more, it would unsettle all confidence in the security of rights secured by decree proceeding on personal citation, if an heir or executor could be allowed to open up such decree as matter of right.

The cases of Blair, Macdonald, and Sutherland, are exceedingly important. The effect of personal citation was taken to have been long fixed in the law, as giving a totally different character to a decree in absence from that which belongs to one in which the party was not cited. But the case of Sutherland further shews that even if there was no personal citation, the knowledge of the party, and transactions passing on the faith of it when his acquiescence could only be accounted for by knowledge that the decree was just, may bar the right to open up the decree.

But there is another principle, or a different way perhaps of viewing the principle, which I think it is very important to keep in view. The challenge is attempted to be taken up in this case, after the party had survived the decree for sixteen years, by executors, or a trustee, nine years after his death. Now, it does not at all follow, that when a party has an option to take up a right of challenge, say, or to acquiesce in a decree, or to renounce certain provisions if he had chosen, and to betake himself to legal claims, such option necessarily passes on to an executor. It is of the nature of such option (I so describe it from want of a better term) that the party should exercise his own will and pleasure, and be guided by his own feelings of justice, or kindness, or expediency, as to whether he should avail himself of his supposed right or not. That the option to do that which the party himself after long survivance did not, should pass to and be exercised by an executor many years after the principal's death, seems to me inconsistent with the proper character of such an option, and would, in many instances, allow such executor to go against the undoubted wishes and purpose of the party he represents. Formal renunciation of such a right of option is not necessary to prove that it was substantially waived, and intentionally not acted on. It is, therefore, in my judgment, a matter of great delicacy, after a party's death, and after, it may be, family arrangements or onerous transactions proceeding on the fact that he did not avail himself, and did not intend to avail himself of an option which he possessed, to allow an executor to take up that personal option as if it had been properly his right of option, and to proceed to measures which his predecessors a quarter of a century before might have attempted, but abstained from doing. In this Division of the Court, my former colleagues and myself applied this principle in a question as to the option to claim legitim, or to take the provisions contained in a father's settlement. The child, able to judge for himself, took the provisions in the settlement, but died; and the executors then proposed to renounce and to claim the legitim. We then held, that after the death of the other party, though there was no formal renunciation of the legitim, the option could not pass, regard being had to the circumstances, and be exercised by the next of kin of the deceased child. Some remarks were rather hastily made on this view of the matter in an after case, founded on the notion that as the right to legitim vests, so it necessarily passed to executors. That was a misapprehension of the point. We did not doubt the right to claim legitim originally; but, like any other right that might be claimed or not in the option of the party to whom it belonged, if the intention not to claim it was satisfactorily proved, we held that after his death the option did not pass to executors. Of course, in each case the circumstances are to be considered as evidence of what was deliberately done or forborne to be done, and the lapse of time is of importance as evidence of his purpose and intention.

I shall be slow, therefore, in any case in which the party having the option to challenge or claim, dies after long survivance, without an indication of any intention to challenge or put forward a claim, to admit the right of the executor to take up such option or personal right entire, and unrestrained or unaffected by his predecessor's conduct, and to assume the right to act as possibly his predecessor might have done a quarter of a century before. I do not say that any such right to challenge or claim is to be laid down in the abstract as so entirely and purely personal that in no case can it pass to a representative. Far from it. The circumstances must always be looked to. But there is indeed a great difference between a challenge by the original party within a reasonable time, and the attempt, after his long survivance and entire acquiescence, by an executor, to place himself at once in his right, and to claim the privileges of option which, a quarter of a century before, his predecessor might have enjoyed.

LORD MURRAY.—This is a case of great importance, which I have considered with much anxiety. The point is—whether the circumstances which took place are sufficient to exclude the right of challenge, or whether there is this right, and these circumstances are only to be matter of consideration afterwards. It appears to me that this Court have pronounced various judgments on equitable considerations, excluding the right of challenge. This makes such cases to be cases of circumstances, and the facts here have been gone over by your Lordship in the chair very fully, and they shew that this man, Gillespie, was quite cognizant of all his rights. Now that is a very important fact; and being clearly brought out, I do not think we should be excusable in subjecting the parties to a long discussion under this reduction. I think we are warranted in holding this action of reduction is inadmissible. I am far, however, from holding that in all cases mere personal service followed by death of the party would exclude a reduction. In every case of this kind the Court must take into view all the circumstances, and more especially this, whether the decree, as here, has been actually carried into effect, and followed out by family arrangements. It would be very unjust if we were, after so long an acquiescence to reverse everything that has been done. I agree with your Lordship.

LORD WOOD absent.

LORD COWAN.—I look upon this case as very important, both in itself and point of precedent.

The effect of decrees in absence is philosophically, if not very practically, discussed by Lord Kames in one of his treatises; and to one principle stated by him a good deal of weight has been given in decisions of the Court; namely, that if a party is cited and does not choose to appear, he is to be held pro confesso, because his opponent, failing other proof, is entitled to the benefit of his evidence.

I do not propose to go into the authorities and precedents as to decrees in absence. They have been fully treated of and dealt with by Lord Brougham in the case of Brown v. Sinclair, which was remitted by the House of Lords for the opinion of the whole Court, and to which reference has been made. The main facts of the case we have to dispose of are—that there has been personal citation of a defender in an ordinary action; that decree has gone out in absence against him; that there was no reference to his oath prior to that decree being taken; and that he died without attempting to open up the decree. In these circumstances his representatives maintain that the decree having gone out in absence they are entitled to be simpliciter reponed, to the effect of at once getting into the case of Blair and other decisions.

When there has been a judicial reference to oath, and the party, though personally cited to appear and depone, has failed to compear, and decree in absence is taken against him, this proposition on the part of the defenders may be true. It would be the greatest injustice to give representatives in such a case power to set aside the decree pro confesso, simply because of its having been in absence. But where no such peculiarity exists, I do not think it can be held that there is any incompetency in proceedings to set aside the decree.

The case of Nicholson v. Macleod in 1810, quoted to us, seems to me to be precisely in point, and to settle that a decree in absence, though proceeding on personal citation, may be opened up after the death of the debtor. The Lord President's opinion shows that there was no such absolute rule in the law of Scotland before 1810, as that founded on by the defenders. He may have gone rather far when he says that all the previous authorities apply to the case of a proper judicial reference to oath. This cannot be said of Blair's case, as reported; but it is possible that there may have been special circumstances in the case, not appearing from the report, which may possibly reconcile that decision with the observations ascribed to the eminent Judge to whom I have referred. At all events, that decision negatives the general plea of incompetency, for which the defenders so broadly contend.

On the other hand, the pursuers referred to a decision of Lord Curriehill, in which it was said he had recognised the doctrine contended for by them in an interlocutor, which was acquiesced in, viz., that every decree in absence is open to be set aside, and its grounds and warrants examined into, even after the death of the debtor. I have been furnished with a copy of the interlocutor, and of his Lordship's note, in which there is not a word tending to support that absolute proposition. There were two pleas stated in defence—1. That reduction was absolutely incompetent. 2. That the decree had been acted upon by the parties, and therefore could not be opened up. What his Lordship did was to repel the first plea, under reservation of the effect of the facts and circumstances tending to shew that the decree was acted on.

The true doctrine of the law seems to be, that while there is no incompetency in instituting such an action after the debtor's death, the decree in absence, if it has been acquiesced in and acted on by the debtor, will not be allowed to be opened up by his representatives. And on this point I consider the case of Brown v. Sinclair, in all its stages, both here and in the House of Lords, to be most instructive and important. Your Lordship in the chair has sufficiently adverted to that decision. On the one hand, I think the circumstance of personal service, while a very important element in support of this decree, when challenged by the representatives, is not conclusive against the competency of the reduction of it on the ground of its having been taken in absence: Such a case as that of Macleod may again occur. But, on the other hand, there may be additional circumstances tending to support the decree, or rather to raise a plea of personal objection against the party challenging it, which may be sufficient answer to the attempt to have it set aside.

Then what are the circumstances here on which the defenders rely as a good defence to this action of reduction?

Observe, this is a concluded clause, all further probation having been passed from by both parties; and therefore the merits, so far as these apply to the reduction of the decree as in absence, and to the defences, are for disposal.

There was personal service. The party is dead, and his oath is no longer available.

The decree was known to the deceased.

The debt under it was the subject of correspondence between the creditors holding it and the deceased and his agent. It was obtained in 1829, and that correspondence is proved to have taken place in 1841 and 1845. There was no challenge till 1854, when brought in aid of claims on the trust-funds in a multiple-sinding.

Not only so, but payments on account of the debt have been legitimately made by

No. 112. the trustees, and to an extent supposed to have been enough for its extinction. Suppose the debt had been fully paid, could there have been condictio indebiti?
 Feb. 19, 1857. And yet the very object of this action is pro tanto to the same effect, to get rid of Connell v. the payments by the trustees, on the ground that there was no proper debt.
 Ferguson.

All these circumstances are conclusive to my mind in support of the defence against this reduction.

The view adopted by the Lord Ordinary seems to me well-founded, and I think this is as strong as any of the cases in its specialties, especially that of Lockhart, D. 12,200, in which the decree was refused to be opened up.

THE COURT adhered, and found additional expenses due.

No. 113. THE UNION BANK OF SCOTLAND, Nominal Raisers and Pursuers.
 MATTHEW CONNELL AND OTHERS, Real Raisers and Advocators.—
 D. F. Inglis—Pyper.

FERGUS FERGUSON AND OTHERS, Claimants.—Penney—E. S. Gordon.

Process—Multiplepoinding—Competency—What is double distress—Is it pars judicis to dismiss an action against which no objection to the competency is taken?—An independent congregation subscribed a sum to build a chapel. The sum was deposited in bank in name of the pastor and two laymen, as trustees for the congregation. Dissensions divided the congregation into two parties, each of whom claimed the fund. A multiplepoinding was then raised to ascertain which party was entitled to the fund, and concluding alternatively that if the purpose for which it was subscribed could not be carried into effect, then to have it returned to the subscribers. No objection was taken to the competency of the action. The Lord Ordinary dismissed the action as incompetent;—Opinion (per Lord Deas), that it was not pars judicis to do so: but, on the point of law—Held (altering judgment of Lord Ordinary, abs. Lord Ivory), that the action was competent, there being competing claims such as in law amounted to double distress.

Feb. 19, 1857. CONNELL and Others were members of a congregation in Glasgow, calling themselves an Independent Church. The claimant, Fergus Ferguson, officiated as minister. The “Church” wanted to build a chapel “for themselves, and those with whom they might enter into communion;” and a sum of upwards of L.800 was subscribed for that purpose, and deposited with the Union Bank in Glasgow, in the name of Ferguson, the pastor, and two members of the congregation. The congregation split into two parties, each of whom claimed the fund as representing the original church. This action was then raised in name of the Bank by certain contributors to the fund, to ascertain to which section of the church the fund should belong to be applied to its original purpose, or alternatively, if that should be impossible, to have the subscriptions returned.

Article 4 of the pursuers’ condescendence was as follows:—“In or about the month of May 1852, misunderstandings having arisen between the said pursuers and defenders, or among the defenders themselves, in regard to an alleged attempt having been made to exclude or cut off certain parties from the said church, and as to the management and disposal of said money, the defenders, Connell and others, for themselves, and others adhering to them on or about 15th of said month of May, protested against said exclusion, or attempted exclusion, and against the other pursuers and defenders interfering or intermeddling with said sum, in any manner of way, without their consent and sanction, at least to the extent to which they contributed, subscribed, or collected the same, or helped or assisted so to do. The purpose and object for which said sum was contributed or collected can never now be attained; and those who collected and contributed it differing as to its application, each is entitled to have his and her share restored and repaid.”

Therefore the pursuers stated, “this action had been rendered necessary for the purpose of ascertaining who were the parties entitled to said sum, or any part thereof, or in what manner and proportion it was to be divided." No. 113.

The action was raised in the Sheriff-court of Lanarkshire. Feb. 19, 1857.

Connell v.
Ferguson.

The real raisers, Law, Connell, and others, claimed the fund in medio, "they being the only adherents to the principles professed by the body or members of the church, and to which they adhered at and during the time the fund in medio was being collected, and it being collected solely for the purpose of providing a house for those holding such principles." And they pleaded, that Ferguson and his adherents no longer represented the church in question.

Ferguson and his adherents made no claim, but they pleaded;—That the fund in medio, consisting of gifts or contributions for the erection of a chapel for the church under Ferguson's charge, and there being still such a church, the same in doctrine, government, and discipline, the claimants, as trustees and holders of the fund, were entitled to apply the whole of it to this purpose. And they farther pleaded, that Connell and his party had voluntarily left the church, and had no cause to complain of the discipline; and not having themselves formed a church which they could pretend was the church for which the building fund was designed, they had no title to ask any portion of the fund either on the ground of injustice to themselves or otherwise.

The Sheriff-substitute (Smith) held, "that the expulsion was a mere matter of discipline, and not reviewable by a court of law,"—that the pursuers' averments "did not shew that the general body, who expelled Messrs Paul and Wright, departed from the principles of constitution of the congregation: Finds, therefore, that the object of the trust created in" favour of "Ferguson, &c., can still be carried out for behoof of the congregation, and that there is no reason for depriving them of the fund in medio lodged in bank in their names as trustees:" Therefore he preferred Ferguson, &c., to the fund in medio, and found the real raisers liable in expenses.

The Sheriff-depute (Alison) adhered to this interlocutor, which Connell and others advocated.

The Lord Ordinary, on 22d May 1855, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the summons in the present process of multiplepoinding, which was brought by the advocates, Matthew Connell and others, as real raisers, in name of the Union Bank of Scotland, and the Rev. Fergus Ferguson and others, as nominal raisers thereof, sets forth as the subject in dispute and fund in medio, a sum of L852, 19s. 5d. sterling, contained in a deposit-receipt by the said Union Bank, in favour of the said Rev. Fergus Ferguson and others, dated 3d September 1852; and that in the condescendence forming part of said summons it was stated, that this sum was contributed and collected under an agreement or arrangement between the pursuers and defenders, 'for the purpose, and with the view of building or purchasing a place of worship for themselves, and those with whom they might enter into communion.' And in the said condescendence it is further stated, that misunderstandings having arisen between the parties, the object for which the said sum was contributed or collected can never now be attained, and that the action had become necessary 'for the purpose of ascertaining and determining who are the parties entitled to said sum, or any part thereof, or in what manner or proportions it is to be divided between them,' which summons is directed against the said real raisers, and a variety of other parties, pretending interest in the said sum: Finds that it was not admitted but claimed by the nominal raisers, the said Fergus Ferguson and others, that the purpose and object for which the said money had been collected could not now be attained, and that no habile evidence was produced or tendered by which the said allegation was or could be instantly verified: Finds that the action, as a process of multiplepoinding for dividing and determining a fund which had been collected and deposited in bank for the purpose of purchasing or building a place of worship, was, in these

No. 113. circumstances, premature and incompetent: Finds farther, that the real raisers or advocates have not put on record any statements sufficient to import an immediate dissolution of the trust under which the said money was held, or of the purpose to which the same was applicable; and there is thus no sufficient allegation of double distress affecting the nominal raisers, to warrant the raising of the present action in their names: Therefore finds that the action was incompetent, and dismisses the same, and decerns: Finds the respondents entitled to expenses both in this Court and the inferior Court; allows an account thereof to be given in," &c. *

Connell v.
Ferguson.

* "NOTE.—If the Lord Ordinary were to dispose of this case on the points embraced in the Sheriff's interlocutor under review, it would be necessary, in any view, to overturn a great deal that has been done in the Court below, where the proceedings have not been regularly conducted. The process is one of multiplepinding, in which certain of the parties have been preferred to the fund in medio as claimants. But the Lord Ordinary cannot discover that the usual interlocutors were ever pronounced sustaining the process or ordering claims. The two claims which were lodged and revised are not in proper shape, as containing no proper demand or conclusions, so that it is difficult to tell what the advocates at least really want; and the litigation proceeded nearly in the same way as if it had been an ordinary action between the real and the nominal raisers. Finally, after a proof had been allowed, the order was recalled in respect of a judicial minute of admission by the defenders of the facts stated by the pursuers in record, 'and the pamphlets therein referred to and founded on,' though under a denial of motives and inferences. The pamphlets here mentioned consist of 'a narrative of the despotic expulsion of two deacons' from the church in question, with a relative protest and appeal, extending to 54 pages of close print, and a 'continuation of the narrative of the expulsion of about 100 members and nearly the half of the office-bearers' from the same church, and a second appeal, with an appendix. The Lord Ordinary understands that the minute of admission was intended to admit, not the publication of the pamphlets merely, but the facts set forth in them, and, indeed, the record itself. Article 14 of revised condescendence, No. 27 of process, is made up on the principle of holding these pamphlets as 'here insert.' If the forms of process required the Lord Ordinary in the first instance to examine the records of inferior Courts brought up by advocacy, he would not have allowed such a record to stand; and it is impossible that any Court of Law that looks to correctness of procedure can found its judgment either upon the allegations or admissions of parties, made by a reference to such extraneous and irregular documents. But the Lord Ordinary thinks it unnecessary here to enter on what may be called the merits of the case, as he considers that the original action was unwarrantable and incompetent. It is admitted by the real raisers that a sum was here collected by certain parties for the purpose of building or buying a place of worship. That sum also, it is admitted, was deposited in bank, and the deposit-receipt, of which a copy is produced, bears to be in name of the nominal raiser, the Rev. Fergus Ferguson. Prima facie, therefore, there is here a trust constituted for a specific purpose, and it is not immaterial to notice that this purpose is the erection or acquisition of an heritable subject. Some of the subscribers allege that occurrences have taken place whereby that trust and its purposes are brought to an end, so that they are entitled to have the fund divided or distributed in some way or other among the subscribers, instead of its being devoted to its destined object. The parties insisting in this view seem not now to be very numerous, and it may be doubted whether they have good ground for supporting their plea. But be this as it may, the Lord Ordinary is clear that these discontented subscribers are not entitled, per saltum, to bring an action of multiplepinding for the division of the fund, until it first be formally found and declared that the admitted object of the original subscription has failed so as to set the fund free for division. It would be highly inconvenient, in this incidental manner, to try the question whether the trust, which confessedly once existed, has been in any way brought to an end, and the responsibility of the holders of the fund thereby inverted and altered. A process of this kind, so brought, does not seem to be supported by the case of M'Ewan v. M'Gavin.

No. 113.

Feb. 19, 1857.
Connell v.
Ferguson.

The real raisers reclaimed, and prayed the Court to sustain the competency of the action, against which they pleaded there was no plea on record. It had been acquiesced in by all parties, and a Judge was not entitled to interfere with the discretion of parties in this respect, and at his own hands dismiss the case. As to the objection on the merits, counsel had not been heard on it. The objection to his interlocutor was simply that there was no plea on record such as the Lord Ordinary had given effect to, and it was not now competent to add any such plea.¹

Pleaded for Ferguson and others ;—The only question was, whether it was pars judicis to deal with this question ?—Was a Judge entitled to dismiss an action when the party against whom the action was directed did not object to its competency ? It would be serious to hold that he was not. It was for the public interest that he should do so ; for example, where parties combined to get a judgment in a form of action not recognised by law. The right of the Court so to interfere had been sustained in cases of less urgency than the present.² The argument for the real raisers truly was, that a multiplepoinding was competent wherever there were double claims. Until recently, it was only competent where there was double distress by diligence. That was characteristic of the action still. It was not sufficient that there was a sum of money to which there was more than one claimant.

29th May 1831, 9 Shaw 622, which was referred to at the debate. The circumstances of that case, and the shape of the proceedings, were different. There was there some reason to say that the original purpose of the subscription had been fulfilled, so as to leave a surplus undisposed of, and the multiplepoinding was brought by the actual holder of the fund for his exoneration, in reference to conflicting claims made upon him ; one of which was insisted in in the form of an action of count and reckoning. Nothing of that kind here exists. Moreover, it may be seriously doubted whether, when this fund was originally appropriated for investment in an heritable shape, there is not a defect of jurisdiction in the Sheriff-Court to entertain a process for putting an end in any way to such a trust or arrangement, under which the beneficial interests of those concerned are of an heritable character, inferring a right to have an heritable subject created and made over for their use. The Lord Ordinary thinks that the true course for the real raisers was to raise a declaratory action before the Court of Session, to have the trust and its purposes found to be extinguished, and the fund declared to be divisible. It is only, perhaps, another aspect of the same principle to say that there is here no double distress to justify the action. The holders of the fund in whose name it is raised, are not de facto exposed to any conflicting diligence or demand upon them. They seem to be themselves the trustees who are vested with the fund, and the only parties making a demand upon them are the real raisers. The question arises—whether the holders of the fund shall comply with that demand, or shall do their duty under the trust imposed upon them. It seems clear that they are not bound to pay any attention to the demands of the pursuers, who hold no diligence, decree or document against them, until they are liberated from their trust character and duties ; and a process of multiplepoinding does not seem the proper way of attaining that object. Further, the conflict, such as it is, lies between the pecuniary claim of the real raisers and the liability of the trustees to apply the money to the purpose of procuring a place of worship. This seems not truly a case of double distress, such as is necessary to found an ordinary process of multiplepoinding. It may be added, in conclusion, that if these objections are well founded, it seems pars judicis to give effect to them."

No. 113. ever, I think that the action is competent. A fund was subscribed for certain congregational purposes. Dissensions arose, and the fund was deposited in bank. Two parties claim it—the one of them adherents of, and the others seceders from, the original congregation. One party, Ferguson and others, plead that the other claimants left the church voluntarily; that the expulsion complained of was a mere matter of discipline, which it is incompetent to inquire into; and they deny that there is any intelligible statement of any violation of the principles or constitution of the church in the real raisers' claim.

Ferguson.

The other party pleads that the claimants, Ferguson and others, having departed from the principles and constitution of the church, and having failed to abide by and walk up to those principles in form, discipline, and government, are no longer the church in question, and have forfeited all claim, not only to the fund in question, and every part thereof, but also to the church's other property and effects. The claimants Law and others say, that having abidden by these principles, they constitute the church, and are entitled to the fund, to apply it to the use for which it was originally intended.

There are thus two parties competing for the fund, in order to apply it to the purposes for which it was originally intended. I think that is a fit subject for a process of multiplepinding. I do not think that the action can be thrown out as incompetent. I say nothing about the other questions which might arise here, because the only question now before us is the competency of the action; and upon that point I am for recalling this interlocutor.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—Had this multiplepinding been brought by the real raisers upon the footing that the object of building a church with this fund was at an end, I should have had considerable doubt about the competency; and, on the principle of the case of Ronaldson, I should have held that the preliminary question required to be defined before a multiplepinding was competent. But although that question might be raised on one of the alternatives of these pleas, the first question raised is the competition between the two different parties for carrying out the original purpose of the subscribers; and in that competition each of them holds that the money is designed for that purpose; the only question being, which of them is to get it? Therefore there are competing claims; and competing claims such as in the sense of the law amount to double distress. I entirely concur.

LORD DEAS.—The Lord Ordinary has sustained objections to the competency of the multiplepinding which have not been stated in the record either in the inferior Court or in this Court. The first question appears to me to be whether we can entertain these objections? Now I observe that the summons (including in that term the original condescendence) afforded on the face of it sufficient materials for raising these objections to the competency if they were well founded. These objections ought, therefore, to have been stated as preliminary pleas when the action came into Court, now nearly seven years ago. But, although various preliminary pleas (not now insisted in) were stated, the objections suggested in the Lord Ordinary's note were not stated. The record was closed and the case went to judgment on the merits, and then it was advocated to this Court, when a farther opportunity was afforded, by the terms of the Judicature Act, for lodging additional pleas, but the record was again closed without any plea being stated against the competency of the action of multiplepinding; and, in these circumstances, the question arises whether it be pars judicis to dismiss the action as incompetent? I am humbly of opinion that it is not. The general rule is that parties must state their own pleas. If there be a plea which occurs to the Court as necessary to be added, the Judicature Act authorises this to be done. This is not said to be a case for exercising that discretionary power, and accordingly it has not been exercised, nor is it proposed to be so. What has been done is to give effect to objections to the competency not put on record either in the inferior Court or this Court, precisely as if they had been on record. Now unquestionably there are cases in which it is pars judicis to give effect to an objection not stated. But these cases are exceptional, and the exceptions rest on peculiar grounds. For example, if two parties combine to try a speculative question which has not arisen and may never arise the Court may say that the public time is not to be wasted in discussing and deciding such a question. Again, if the Court has plainly no jurisdiction to try the question, the Court may refuse to pronounce or confirm a judgment which would be worthless. Or, if all parties interested are not in the field, the Court may refuse to proceed and to pronounce a judgment by which the rights of absent parties might be compromised,—as where the question relates to an heritable subject belonging to heirs-portioners or pro indiviso proprietors, which might be carried off from them by the judgment, so that those of them who were not called might have to become pursuers of a reduction;—or where the property belongs to a dissolved company, and a similar result might happen to the prejudice of partners not called. But there are no analogous grounds for holding the present case to be exceptional, nor any ground at all that I can discover which would not go to make it incumbent on the Court to give the same effect in cases generally to pleas not stated on the record as to pleas that are stated; than which I can conceive nothing more contrary to all wholesome and recognised rules of pleading. The objection to the form of action, which the Lord Ordinary has here taken up and sustained, must, to say the least of it, be admitted to be not only debateable but doubtful; seeing that his Lordship formed one opinion upon it and your Lordships have expressed another; so that the result of holding it pars judicis to take up such a plea, would be that, although the nominal raisers had intentionally (it may be) avoided stating it because they deemed it doubtful or hopeless, the Court must take it up and consider both sides of it for themselves, and then decide it. I cannot think that the objection here is of a kind which falls to be so dealt with. If indeed it could be said as suggested, rather than affirmed, in the note of the Lord Ordinary, that the action involved a competition of heritable rights, there might be some ground for giving effect to this plea as excluding the Sheriff's jurisdiction. But it is not pretended, and cannot be held, that such was the nature of this action. And, upon the whole, I am of opinion that the absence of any plea, such as the interlocutor gives effect to, is, of itself, a sufficient ground (and indeed the proper and legitimate ground) for recalling that interlocutor.

But I may add that, supposing the plea had been stated, I should have concurred with your Lordships in holding that it fell to be repelled. The object of the action is to try, alternatively, which of two parties has a right to direct the disposal of the fund in medio, as being the party adhering to the tenets of and forming the Regent Street Church Congregation of Glasgow, and, in the event of its being found that neither party has that right, or that the purpose of the subscription has failed, then to have the money paid back to the contributors. To the grounds upon which your Lordships think the action competent to try the first of these alternatives I have nothing to add. But I think it equally competent to try the second. Where parties join in a subscription to effect a particular object, and place the money subscribed in the hands of certain persons to carry out that object, I think the quasi trust, thereby created, is for the alternative purpose of either carrying out the object of the subscription, or, if that cannot be done, of paying back the money. There is no room for an action of reduction in such circumstances, as in the case of Ronaldson, and no necessity for a declarator, any more than if the alternative purpose had been expressed upon the face of the subscription paper. It would be most inexpedient to hold that, in every case of a subscription, of however trifling amount,—it might be to obtain a man's portrait, or to present him with a snuff-box, or for some still more trifling object, which came to be abandoned, or was found impracticable in consequence of his death or otherwise, no single subscriber could get back his money without an action of declarator in this Court, to have it found and declared that the object of the subscription had failed. I know no rule of law making such a course necessary, nor yet making it necessary for each subscriber to raise a separate action for, it may be, his half-crown or shilling, to which action the holder of the fund might naturally answer that he could not repay one of the subscribers without the consent of all. I think the appropriate action, in such a case, is a multiplepounding, and that this action is even more clearly competent for its second (alternative) object than its first, although either, of course, is sufficient to entitle the action to proceed.

Copartnery—How far a joint-stock company, after dissolution, subsists to the effect of winding up—Title of directors to sue.—A joint-stock company was managed by a board of trustees, who were empowered to fix the instalments payable by the partners on their shares. The contract of copartnery did not provide for the management and winding up in the event of a dissolution of the company, and did not contemplate the possibility of a deficiency in the then existing property or paid-up capital to pay the debts. The company having been dissolved, and there being such a deficiency, an action for payment of a call was brought against a shareholder by nine individuals, designing themselves "shareholders and surviving trustees, duly authorised by and representing the said company, and having power to wind up the affairs and discharge the debts of the company ;"—Held (abs. Lord Ivory), that this not being an action for relief, the defender's debt was due not to the trustees, but to the company itself, and the company not being the pursuers of the action, the trustees had no title to sue.

THE following narrative is taken from the note appended by the Lord Ordinary to his interlocutor:—"The discussion of the validity of the pursuers' title in this case has involved the examination of the propriety or soundness of the legal maxim announced by certain high authorities,—that a company, although dissolved, still subsists in reference to winding up. The defender denies that this maxim is to any extent or in any sense well founded. The bearing of his argument in impeachment of the maxim in the present case, will appear from the following statement of facts :—

"By the contract of copartnery of the Glasgow Cemetery Company, the capital stock of the Company was fixed at L.20,000, divisible into 10,000 shares of L.2 each ; of which 7s. 6d. was to be paid up, the shareholders becoming bound afterwards to contribute the remaining L.1, 12s. 6d. 'by such instalments and at such periods as the board of trustees for the Company after mentioned shall fix and require,' under certain restrictions as to the amount of each call, and the interval between each. The whole management of the affairs of the Company was entrusted to twelve of the partners designated as trustees, four of whom were annually to retire, and their places to be filled up by an election to take place at a meeting of the Company to be held in the month of March.

"Certain stated annual meetings, on fixed days, were appointed for stated purposes connected with the affairs of the Company; which meetings were to be intimated 'by advertisement in any two or more Glasgow newspapers, to be fixed by the trustees at least two days before the day of meeting.' And it was provided, that 'besides the said stated annual meetings, general meetings of the Company shall be held at any other times that the trustees for the time being may appoint; and it shall be in the power of any shareholders holding L.1000 sterling of stock among them, by written requisition, to require the chairman to call a meeting of the Company for the consideration of any particular matter, to be specified in such requisition, on receiving which the chairman shall be bound, within fourteen days thereafter, to call a meeting ; and all such occasional meetings, whether called by the trustees, or by the chairman upon requisition, shall be intimated by advertisement as aforesaid, which shall specify the purpose or purposes for which the meeting has been called; and the resolutions or instructions of the partners at such occasional meetings shall have the same force and effect as those passed at the stated meetings of the Company.' No. 114.

Feb. 19, 1857.
Barclay v.
Lawrie.

"By article 19th it was provided, that it should be in the power of the partners at any time, at a meeting called and intimated by circulars as well as advertisements, by the vote of partners holding two-thirds of the shares of the capital stock, to dissolve the Company.

"The only provision for the management, in the event of dissolution, being this:—'And in the event of a dissolution being agreed upon as aforesaid, the cemetery or cemeteries belonging at the time to the Company, and all other property they may possess, shall be sold and disposed of in such manner, and after such advertisement, as may be agreed upon, either by said meeting or by the trustees, in the event of the meeting devolving the matter upon them; and the price, after discharging all debts and expenses, shall be divided among the partners according to their interests in the stock.'

"It is to be remarked, that in this clause there is no provision for the appointment of any person or persons generally to wind up the affairs of the dissolved Company, and apparently no contemplation of the possibility of a deficiency in the then existing property or paid-up capital to pay the debts.

"Nor was this deficiency in the provisions of the contract fully supplied by what took place at the meeting of 1st November 1848, at which the Company was dissolved. The minute of that meeting bears—'Mr Cunningham, the secretary, laid on the table the advertisements calling the meeting. Thereafter read report of the directors to the meeting, and which is engrossed on the subsequent page.

"Whereupon it was moved that the Company ought to be dissolved, and instructions given to the trustees to bring the heritable property to sale by public roup or private bargain, in terms of section 19th of the contract of copartnery; and on a sale being effected, to discharge the Company's debts, and hand to the shareholders state, showing how the ultimate realisation of the estate stands, and with instructions to the trustees to divide the surplus without calling any farther meeting. Which motion having been carried unanimously by two-thirds of the shareholders present, either by themselves or by proxies, and the trustees directed forthwith to bring the heritable property to sale, and a vote of thanks given to the chairman for his conduct in the chair, the meeting broke up.' It seems evident that by this meeting the Company was dissolved without any special power being conferred upon any one effectually to wind up the affairs of the Company, in case it should turn out (which was the case) that its heritable property, when disposed of, was insufficient to pay the debts.

"The present action was raised by nine individuals, designing themselves 'Shareholders and Surviving Trustees of the Glasgow Cemetery Company, duly authorised by and representing the said Company, and having power to wind up the affairs and discharge the debts of the Company,' against the defender, as a partner of the Company, to the extent of 100 shares. It concluded against him for payment of a call of 5s., said to have been duly made on 1st February 1848, being some months before the dissolution of the Company, and also of an additional contribution of 15s., imposed by the pursuers on 30th June 1850 (after the Company was dissolved), in order to liquidate the debts of the Company.

"The only meeting mentioned in the summons, or in the record as originally closed, at which the pursuers were invested with the powers pretended by them, was that of 1st November 1848, being the meeting for dissolution; in to which the following statement was contained in the summons and original records:—'At a meeting of the shareholders held on 1st November 1848, the Company was dissolved, and the trustees authorised to sell the heritable property, and wind up the affairs, and discharge the debts of the Company.' It appears, however, that although not mentioned in the closed record, copies of the minutes of two subsequent meetings had been put into process; and it was argued by the pursuers that their title was aided, if not completely supported, by the proceedings of those meetings. After an obstinate struggle between the parties, the Sheriff allowed the record to be opened up, to the effect of allowing the pursuers to set out the contents of these minutes. These alleged meetings took place on the 23d May and 4th July 1849.

"At the latter of these dates, the minutes bear that the Commercial Bank had made an urgent claim for the immediate payment of a debt due by the Company to them of about L.3350. It was stated that an opinion had been obtained, recommending that a statement of the liabilities of the Company should be made up, and a demand made upon all the solvent shareholders for an amount proportioned to the number of shares held by each; and failing payment within a specified time, that an action should be raised against the defaulters. The minutes of the meeting concluded as follows:— 'Several of the gentlemen having expressed their opinions, it was ultimately agreed to remit this matter to the trustees, with full power to them to act as they shall deem most expedient for the interests of all concerned; and the secretary was instructed to prepare and lay before an early meeting of the trustees the statement above suggested, with a list of the solvent partners, and an allocation of the proportion payable by each.'

"Had there been no objections to the constitution of this meeting, it might probably be held sufficient to support the pursuers' title in the present action. But it is observed by the defender, that this meeting was attended only by six parties—viz. the secretary and solicitor of the Company, and four of the trustees; that it was called merely by advertisement in terms of the contract, and not by circular; and that the advertisement had not sufficiently disclosed the object of the meeting.

"It was argued by the defender, that after the Company was dissolved, it was incompetent to call a meeting of the shareholders for such an important business as this, merely by advertisement, the provision of the contract for calling general meetings of the Company in this way having been superseded by the dissolution; and it was maintained that due notice of the special objects of the meeting ought to have been given by circular to every shareholder interested.

"It was propounded as a general position, that by the dissolution of the company, the ordinary management by directors or trustees to be annually elected could no longer be maintained, even to the effect of winding up the affairs of the Company; that the provisions of the contract as to the calling of general meetings were in every particular inapplicable to the circumstances of the dissolved Company, and that the shareholders, in regard to the winding up, were subject to none of those arrangements as to combined action which the contract might contain in reference to the business of the subsisting Company.

"On the other hand, it was argued by the pursuers, that although when the contract itself provided for a special mode of winding up the concern upon a dissolution, by the nomination or election of managers for that purpose, this would supersede and put an end to the authority and functions of the ordinary directors of the Company as a subsisting company, yet when the contract contained no such provision, the office-bearers of the Company must necessarily have power to wind up their affairs upon a dissolution unless that authority was superseded by a general meeting of the shareholders.

"It was said, that although the Company is dissolved as to the carrying on of its business, the contract still subsists; and its provisions as to the calling of general meetings, their constitution and functions, must still be No. 114.

obligatory upon the partners, in so far as the winding up is concerned."

case to the Lords of the First Division." *

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—I do not think this action can be sustained. I do not go much on the irregularity of the election, but it appears to me that neither under the minutes nor under the contract had the pursuers authority conferred on them to insist in such an action as the present. This is not an action at the instance of the Company. It is an action in the case of a dissolved company, with a view to winding up its affairs, and is brought by certain persons said to be trustees. It is difficult to say that the regulations provide for the course to be adopted in winding up: but, at any rate, the powers contained in the contract must be exercised in the way appointed. Here the call is larger than that authorised by the contract, which neither confers power to impose it nor to sue in such an action as the present. I am for altering the interlocutors of the Sheriff.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—This summons concludes that the defender, as a shareholder of the Glasgow Cemetery Company, should be decerned to make payment of two sums—(1) of L.25, as a call of 5s. per share upon 100 shares of that Company held by him; and (2) L.75, as a contribution or allocation of 15s. on each of these shares.
The defender is called upon to pay these sums as being portions of the stock of the Company, which the defender is bound to pay without any accounting whatever.
But although these sums are claimed from him as being debts owing by him to the Company itself, this action is sued at the instance, not of the Company, but of seven individuals describing themselves as "shareholders and surviving trustees of the Glasgow Cemetery Company, duly authorised by and representing the said Company, and having power to wind up the affairs and discharge the debts of the Company." The defender objects to the title of these persons to sue the present action, and the only question before us at present is, whether or not that objection is well founded?

A party sued for payment of an alleged debt, and objecting to the title of those who sue him, must discuss such an objection on the assumption that the claim sued for is, on its merits, well founded. But even assuming that the alleged debts sued for are owing by the defender, the party who would be creditor therein would be the Company itself. And, by the law of Scotland, which differs in this respect from the law of England, even a private company so far partakes of the character of a corporation as to be a separate person in law, and to be capable of sustaining the relation of creditor or debtor in relation, not only to third parties, but likewise to the partners of the company themselves. It has likewise been established that such a company, even when it is denominated by a descriptive name,—such as the Sea Insurance Company of Scotland, or the West of Scotland Malleable Iron Company, or the like, has a good title to sue or defend, by its social firm, some of its partners being joined with it in the suit. Even, therefore, assuming the defender to have been paying the sums sued for to the Company, the Company itself, as the creditor, is the party at whose instance, with some of its partners, the action ought to have

* NOTE.—(After the above narrative):—

"The Lord Ordinary shall only say, that he has not been satisfied of the utter groundness of the maxim announced by Mr Bell in his Commentaries (ii. p. 635), that partnership subsists after dissolution for the purpose of winding up the concern.'
Although altogether defunct as to carrying on business, it does not seem to follow that the Company may not be considered as still existing to the limited effect of being in its assets and paying its debts. Nor does he see any good reason why the provisions of the contract in reference to the joint action of the shareholders should not subsist until their joint interests arising out of that contract have been fully disposed of and arranged."

No. 114. Feb. 19, 1857. Barclay v. Lawrie. been instituted. But this is not the case; and the Company not being a pursuer of this action, I think that this is an insurmountable objection to the suit.

The seven individuals at whose instance the action is instituted describe themselves as suing in three different characters. The first is that of shareholders of the Company. But seven individual partners of a company have no title to sue one of their co-partners to pay a debt which he is alleged to be owing, not to themselves, but to the company. The case might have been different if this had been an action of relief at the instance of these individuals, setting forth that they had made over advances, or incurred liabilities on behalf of the Company, and concluding that the defender, as one of its partners, should relieve them of a rateable share of such over advances or liabilities. But this is not an action of that description.

Secondly, the pursuers describe themselves as trustees of the Company. But this does not mean that the Company, the creditor in the alleged debts, had assigned these debts to the pursuers as trustees for its behoof. The denomination of trustees is assumed by them as being merely equivalent to directors or managers of the Company. And, even assuming that such were truly their position, this would not render competent such an action at the instance of themselves individually, because the jus exigendi is not in them in that character.

And, in the third place, they represent themselves as being authorised by the Company, and empowered to wind up its affairs and discharge its debts. I do not think that they have succeeded in shewing that such authority and power have been conferred upon them by the Company. But it is not necessary to go into a critical examination of the minutes on which they found as conferring upon them such authority and power, because these minutes, besides being insufficient for that purpose, would, even according to the statement of the pursuers, amount only to a commission or mandate to the pursuers to wind up the affairs and discharge the debts of the Company; or, in other words, would place the Company and themselves in the relative position of principal and agent. But an agent, who is merely commissioned to collect, sue for, and discharge his constituents' debts, without having these debts assigned to him in trust for his constituent, has not the jus exigendi vested in his own person; and any suits which he may institute against the debtors can proceed only in the name of his constituents, the proper creditors in the debts. This is clearly the case while the Company is subsisting and carrying on business, and the case is the same even although the Company has ceased to carry on business, and subsists only to the effect of winding up its affairs.—Vide Baird v. Buchanan. 21st February 1855, D. xvii. 461.

On these grounds, I think that the pursuers have no title to sue this action, and that, therefore, it ought to be dismissed.

LORD DEAS.—Two questions occur for decision in this case, both of them quite special—the one depending on the terms of the minutes of meetings of the dissolved Company, and relative advertisements—the other on the terms of the contract of copartnery.

The question under the minutes is—whether a title was thereby conferred on the trustees or directors to sue for calls, supposing they had it not by the contract? Now the only minute which can be pretended to have had this effect is the minute of 4th July 1849. But it is unnecessary to discuss the import of this minute, because it is quite clear that the advertisement calling the meeting did not specify amongst its purposes the making of or suing for calls, and still less the authorizing of the trustees or directors to sue for calls; but, on the contrary, set forth the whole objects of the meeting to be to receive a report as to the position of the company's affairs, and give further instructions as to the disposal of the property. Now the contract expressly provides (art. 11)—that all occasional meetings (such as this was) shall be intimated by advertisement, “which shall specify the purpose or purposes for which the meeting has been called.” And, assuming the contract to remain in force, the meeting, obviously, could not bind absent partners in a matter as to which the terms of the contract had not been complied with.

As to the power of suing, said to be conferred upon the trustees or directors under articles 3 and 8 of the contract (which alone contain anything beyond the general power of management conferred by article 5), I think it unnecessary to consider very minutely whether the terms of these articles do imply a power to sue or not, because I am of opinion that whatever the powers thereby conferred were, these are limited, by the very conception of the articles themselves, to the endurance of the Company as a going concern. They might not have been so limited, and then the general question pointed at by the Lord Ordinary might have arisen. But I think they are so limited, and consequently that no general question does or can arise. For example, in article 8, the power to make calls is, obviously, for the purpose of buying and laying out grounds, building tombs, and otherwise enabling the trustees (subject to instructions of general meetings) to manage the affairs of the Company as a going concern. And then, in article 3, the power to do diligence for calls is coupled with the option of declaring defaulters to be no longer partners of the Company, which could never be intended to apply after dissolution, when there is a deficiency, and the trustees might be too glad to relieve each other or their friends for further liability from loss. The partners might, of course, limit the powers of the trustees in reference to calls to the endurance of the Company as a going concern; and I think they have done so here—very possibly not intentionally, but from not having contemplated that the speculation might happen to result in loss—a contingency, indeed, not seemingly in view in any part of this contract, although there are provisions made for dissolution upon the opposite assumption of there being a surplus to divide.

THE petitioners were tutors nominated by the late Mr Morison of Saughton, to his only child, Catharine Morison, now three years old. The estate was strictly entailed. It contained a number of farms, the leases of which would expire during Miss Morison's pupillarity. The lease of one of them expired at Martinmas next, and this application was made by the tutors for authority to grant a lease of that farm for 19 years.

A report was produced by Mr Dickson of Saughton Mains, to the effect that none of the farms could be advantageously let on leases of shorter duration; and, if let for a shorter period, it would have the effect not only of greatly reducing the rent, but would tend to the disadvantage of the pupil and her estate, by retarding the improvement of the lands.

On 27th January 1857, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Appoints the petitioners to put in a minute referring to the authorities upon which this application is founded; and remits to Mr Dickson, farmer, Saughton Mains, to report as to the propriety of granting a lease of the farm for nine years, the period of the pupil's reaching puberty, and what effect such a lease would have upon the rent."

The petitioners in their minute referred to the following authorities, where the Court had granted similar powers to tutors-nominate:—Mrs Forbes or Carnegy, 22d December 1838, ante, vol. i. p. 355; Dame Amelia Halket and others, petitioners, 24th November 1857, ante, vol. x. p. 146; Tutors of Archibald A. Spiers, 11th July 1848, ante, vol. x. p. 1474.

The petitioners likewise referred to the following authorities, where similar powers had been granted to factors loco tutoris, tutors-at-law, and others, who, the petitioners submitted, did not occupy so favourable a position as tutors-nominate:—Ker, 24th January 1839, F. C., 14,451; Shepherd, 10th July 1841, F. C., 16,1288; Mackenzie, 26th January 1842; Shepherd, 12th December 1843; Ball, 6th July 1837; A B, 27th May 1841, F. C., 16,959; Shepherd, 23d November 1844; Brown, 11th December 1846, ante, vol. ix. p. 250; Thriepland, 7th June 1848, ante, vol. x. p. 1234; Lindsay, 13th December 1855, ante, vol. xviii. p. 205; Kincaid, 5th July 1856, ante, vol. xviii. p. 1208; Fraser, 2, 124: 2, 299.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think there is precedent enough, as well as principle, for this proceeding. The circumstances of this case are strong. The amount of loss to the estate, in the event of the lease being limited to nine years, will be very great. There is no benefit to be derived by so limiting the duration of the lease. In these circumstances it is very clear that a fair rent cannot be obtained unless this power is granted;—which practically comes to be a power only for the ordinary management of the estate. I do not say that that would give a tutor-nominate power to grant such a lease of himself, for the propriety of doing so depends on different circumstances. But it is here the kind of management which is best for this estate and, in all these circumstances, I think we ought to grant the powers prayed for.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I have never had any doubt that it is competent for this Court to grant the special power which is prayed for, although we must exercise that power only if we be satisfied that the interest of the pupils requires us to do so. The competency of granting such an application is settled by authority, and appears from the series of decisions quoted in the minute. I am satisfied that this Court has granted similar powers in numerous other cases; and that, if these have not been reported, this is just because the granting of such powers, when the interest of the wards has required this to be done, has become a matter of established usage. And, although I think that it is now too late to go back upon the question of competency, I concur with your Lordship in holding that the competency has been settled by these authorities upon sound principle. In Scotland, as in every other civilized country, the law carefully provides for the interests of those who are in the helpless state of pupillarity. It does so by conferring powers, to a certain extent, for administering their estates, and for disposing of their persons, upon those who are their tutors, either as fathers or as nominees of deceased fathers, by service as tutors-at-law, or grants of tutory-dative. But it does not stop there. It authorises the Supreme Court, in the exercise of its nobile officium, to make further provisions for the interests of such parties when circumstances require interference. When they are left without tutors of any kind, this Court appoints factors to them, with powers of administration similar, in many respects, to those which the law confers upon tutors. If such tutors, or such factors, abuse or neglect these powers, this Court has authority to interfere for the protection of the pupils, whether it be their persons or their estates which require such protection. And much is this the case, that this Court may even remove pupils from the custody their parents, when such an extreme proceeding is found to be necessary for the interests of the former. And when the limited powers which the law itself confers upon tutors, or the usual powers which this Court confers upon factors loco tutoris, appointed by itself, are not sufficient to enable them to protect the interests of the wards from impending loss or injury, this Court has authority to confer upon these guardians such additional powers as may be sufficient for that purpose. The Court's authority in these matters, as it is sufficient to enable it to delegate such powers to even such factors appointed by itself in place of tutors, is, a fortiori, sufficient to enable it to delegate such powers to tutors themselves. And, accordingly, this has been done in the series of cases mentioned in the minute, and, indeed, has become matter of common usage.

Hutcheson.

In the present case, the inquiries which have been made under the direction of the Lord Ordinary, establish that the interest of the pupil requires that we should grant the special powers prayed for. A new lease of the farm in question must be granted. The tutor, in the exercise of only those powers which he has in virtue of his office, cannot grant it for a longer period of endurance than about nine years. In the existing state of this farm, a lease of it limited to that short period would be maladministration of the property, according to sound principles of rural economy, which are applicable to such cases, and would be very detrimental to the interests of the ward. And, hence, these interests require that the Court, in the exercise of its authority, should empower the tutor to extend the period of endurance of this lease.

LORD DEAS.—This is an application by tutors-nominate. There is a great difference between granting special powers to such tutors and to factors loco tutoris and others who are officers of this Court. The latter are at all times amenable to our jurisdiction, and their cautioners are liable if what is done be ultimately found wrong. But tutors-nominate find no caution. On obtaining special powers they walk away, and we have no farther control over them. The cases cited of our own officers are not in point. In the three other cases cited (which were all in this Division), the distinction does not seem to have been under notice. I am not sure that the other Division follow the same course. A power to let for nineteen years may be different from a power to sell or borrow—coming so much nearer an act of ordinary administration. But I should prefer that Lord Ivory (who stated a doubt last day) were present, or that we should consult the other Division.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords, on the report of Lord Mackenzie, grant warrant to and authorise the petitioners, as tutors for the said Catharine Henrietta Adamina Duncan Morison, to let the lands or farm of Fincraigs and Pitmossie, referred to in the petition, at a suitable rent on a lease to endure for nineteen years, as prayed for, and decern."

Process — Reduction — Relevancy of averments — Force and fear — Fraud — Essential Error — Proof before answer. — A husband, by antenuptial contract of marriage, conveyed certain heritable property to his wife in liferent, renouncing his jus mariti and right of administration. Having been unfortunate in business, he became largely indebted to a bank, and obtained his wife's concurrence to a disposition of the property liferented by her. In a reduction by her of the disposition, on the ground of force and fear, fraud, and essential error, she averred that her husband ~~came~~ hurriedly into her bedroom, when she was unwell, and told her that the bank threatened him with diligence and ruin unless she consented to grant the deed; and, on her refusal, peremptorily repeated that she must sign it without anybody knowing of it, otherwise, to avoid imprisonment, he would flee the country, and leave her and her family to do as they best might: that, at this juncture, the bank agent came with the deed prepared: that, without reading it, or having it explained

MRS JESSIE PRIESTNELL or MACKENZIE, the pursuer of this action, was the wife of Hugh Mackenzie, manufacturer in Paisley, and liferentrix by antenuptial contract of marriage of certain heritable subjects which belonged to her husband, but from which his jus mariti and right of administration were, by the marriage-contract, excluded. She was infest in these subjects for her liferent use. The sasine contained the clause of renunciation by Mr Mackenzie of his jus mariti and right of administration, and also the declaration that the subjects should not be affectable by his debts or deeds, or the diligence of his creditors. She now brought a reduction of a disposition granted by her of these subjects to the Bank of Scotland, and of other deeds following thereon, by which the defender Mr Brough acquired the property from the bank, on the ground of force and fear, fraud, and essential error. The subjects had been sold by the bank by public roup, and purchased by Brough, who was now infest in them.

The pursuer stated, that at the date of her marriage her husband was solvent and prosperous, but that afterwards, in October 1854, the firm of which he was a partner got into embarrassed circumstances, and were deeply involved in debt. The Bank of Scotland was then largely in advance to them. The condescendence then proceeded as follows:—“ Cond. 5. Mr Mackenzie and his said company not having the means wherewith to liquidate the balance due to the Bank of Scotland, the said John Hutcheson, as agent for the Bank, contrary to the good faith of the said antenuptial contract, insisted that he should get the pursuer to concur with him for her foresaid right of liferent, in granting to the bank a security over the said property, and threatened him and the company with diligence and ruin unless this was done. Mr Mackenzie was very averse to involve his wife in his difficulties; but being pressed by Mr Hutcheson, on the part of the bank, he, in an evil hour, acceded to his requirements. Cond. 6. The bank having, through Mr Mackenzie, obtained the titles to the foresaid property, including the instrument of sasine following upon the said antenuptial contract, they, by their law-agent in Paisley, prepared the absolute disposition of the said property now produced, bearing to be granted by the pursuer and her said husband, and purporting to convey to the said John Hutcheson the absolute right to the said property, including the pursuer's liferent. Cond. 7. Neither the draft of this disposition nor the principal was authorised, seen, or considered by the pursuer, or any one acting on her behalf. Neither the bank nor their said agent, nor her husband, consulted her as to the preparation or execution thereof. All these parties were acting against her, for the purpose of extorting from her without any consideration the foresaid antenuptial provision. Even at the time of executing the said disposition, instead of employing a professional man to see that it was regular and properly executed of the pursuer's freewill and consent, the bank, and their agent Mr Hutcheson, employed and constrained Mr Mackenzie to convince the pursuer to execute it without informing her of the circumstances. Cond. 8. Accordingly, on the forenoon of the 26th of October 1854, without any previous intimation, Mr Mackenzie came hurriedly into the bed room where the pursuer was at the time, and told her that she must prepare immediately to sign a paper or deed for Mr Hutcheson, or the said bank, which, he said, was coming for her signature. She refused, being wholly ignorant of its nature; and asked what sort of paper or deed it was to which her signature could be necessary. Mr Mackenzie represented to her that it was a bond over the property in question for several hundreds of pounds.

which he owed the bank, but was unable at the time to pay. She still refused, whereupon he told her peremptorily that she must sign it; that he was completely at the mercy of Mr Hutcheson, who would imprison and ruin him if it was not signed. He also said, that if it was not signed by her he would immediately flee the country, leaving her and the family to do as they best might. The pursuer was not well at the time. She had been ill for a fortnight. She had a family of three young children, who would be involved in their father's ruin. She was taken by surprise, and was greatly alarmed and excited. She asked for a little time to consult some of her friends; but Mr Mackenzie would not hear of this. He said the matter was instant; that nobody must know anything about it, and that there was no use of resistance or delay, for the deed must be signed. At this juncture Mr J. R. M'Arthur, and a clerk in the office of the defender Mr Hutcheson, came to the house with the deed. This was notified to the pursuer. There was no time given for deliberation or reflection. The pursuer was compelled, à et metu, to go and sign the deed in presence of the two last mentioned parties, who brought it. Cond. 9. When she signed the deed she had not read it, nor heard it read or explained; nor did she know anything about the contents of it,—neither did her husband know the contents of it. The representation that it was a bond for several hundred pounds was false; and the other representations with respect to her husband's imprisonment or flight from the country, and which the pursuer believed at the time, were made use of to compel her to sign the deed. Cond. 10. The deed which was so signed by the pursuer is the disposition in favour of Mr Hutcheson, first called for. It has never been ratified by the pursuer, the parties who obtained it being well aware that the pursuer could not make the declaration or affidavit which the ratification by a wife contains. Cond. 11. The said disposition falsely bears to have been granted in consideration of the sum of L.1000 sterling instantly paid by Mr Hutcheson to Mr Mackenzie. No such payment was made; and that sum was quite inadequate to the value of the property. The deed was granted by Mr Mackenzie, it is now alleged by the defenders, as a security to the bank for debt; but if so, it was for prior debt contracted by the company of which he was a partner. The pursuer herself received nothing for signing the deed. It was extorted from her at the instance of Mr Hutcheson, as agent, and for behoof of the Bank of Scotland, without giving her any consideration whatever."

In these circumstances, the pursuer concluded for reduction of the disposition, and of articles of roup, and other proceedings which had followed hereupon.

The disposition was absolute in its form. It bore to be granted by the husband as taking burden on him for his wife for all right, title, and interest he had or could claim in and to the subjects by liferent, infeftment, or otherwise, and by the wife herself, for her own right and interest, with consent of her husband.

The averments of the defenders, so far as essential, are embodied in the opinion of Lord Deas.

The Lord Ordinary, on 20th January 1857, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer's record does not contain a statement sufficient to support the grounds of reduction, or relevant to be admitted probation; Therefore, assolizies the defenders from the conclusions of the petition, and decrees: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses," &c. *

* "Norman. Three grounds of reduction were insisted on at the debate. 1. Force of law was alleged as sufficient to annul the conveyance executed by the pursuer; 2. Intimidation; 3. Fraud. This head are contained in the 8th article of the condescendence."

No 116. The pursuers reclaimed. The plea of fraud was departed from.

Feb. 20, 1857.

Priestnell v.
Hutcheson.

LORD DEAS.—This action is brought by Mrs Mackenzie to reduce a disposition granted by her and her husband on 26th October 1854, in favour of the Bank of Scotland, with the infestment which followed upon it, and certain articles and minutes of roup and relative disposition and sasine, whereby the subjects, which had been disposed to the bank, were acquired from the bank by the other defender Mr Brough. The disposition to the bank was absolute in its form, as for a price of L.1000 instantly paid to the husband. It bore to be granted by the husband, as taking burden on him for the wife, for all right, title, and interest she had or could claim in and to the subjects, by liferent infestment, or otherwise, and by the wife herself, for her own right and interest, with consent of her husband. It now appears that the subjects had been the property of the husband, and that, by

The general averment embraced in the last sentence of this article must be understood as explained by the details by which it is preceded.

“ After the best consideration the Lord Ordinary can give to these details, he does not think they amount to such force or fear as to interfere with the consent of the pursuer, and so to annul the deed she was induced to execute. The representations made to her by her husband as to the power of the bank, as his creditor, to imprison his person, and ruin his credit by the diligence of the law, and the alternative of his flying the country to avoid imprisonment, are not alleged to have been false. A strong motive was thus pressed upon her to execute the deed. Fear of the consequences of her refusal, no doubt, induced her to comply. But these consequences are not alleged to have been misrepresented. They were steps which the creditor was by law entitled to take against her husband, and which would lead to his incarceration or flight. They were steps which the husband could not prevent. He merely disclosed to her a danger which, as to him, was inevitable, unless she interfered to avert it.

“ The authorities in our law upon this subject are happily very few. The doctrine is very generally expressed by our text writers. Nor does the civil law give much assistance upon the subject, as it appears to have varied from time to time.

“ That the reduction on the ground of force and fear operates to annul the deed even against onerous third parties, suggests the necessity of the extortion being of such a character as substantially to interfere with the freewill of the party, and to exclude the consent which the law holds to be necessary to the due execution of any deed.

“ In the case of a married woman, the sex and peculiar relation of the party, no doubt, render a smaller amount of violence or fear sufficient to annul the deed than in the case of a man. But, on the other hand, it seems clear that mere coercio maritalis is not sufficient to annul a deed executed under its influence. The wife may think it her duty to obey her husband,—to sacrifice her own pecuniary interests to benefit him. But in the very performance of what she considers her duty she makes a choice,—she exercises her volition, and it cannot be said that she is overpowered either by force or such fear as interferes with her freewill.

“ 2. The second ground of reduction is that of fraud; but as that does not seem to be pointed against the defenders by any distinct averment, it is unnecessary to enlarge upon it.

“ 3. A plea of essential error has been added to the record, in the hope of giving that character to some of the statements on record. The Lord Ordinary does not, however, find anything in the record to sustain the plea. The pursuer was certainly aware that the deed she was asked to sign constituted a sacrifice of her own rights. She was told by her husband it was to afford a security for his debt which he could not pay. And it is not denied on the record that this is its true character, although it is said (art. 11) that it was for prior debt contracted by the company of which she was a partner.

“ It is not alleged that she was misled by the apparent absolute nature of the conveyance. It is not said she ever believed it to be an actual sale. Indeed, it is alleged that she knew not the actual contents of the deed, but only what her husband told her about it.”

antenuptial contract of marriage, he had conveyed them to the wife in liferent, for her liferent use only, renouncing his jus mariti and right of administration, and all other rights competent to him by law in consequence of the marriage, in relation to these subjects, declaring them not to be affectable by his debts or deeds, nor by the diligence of his creditors. The husband had thus retained the fee, but the liferent stood vested, as a separate marriage provision, in the wife. It now farther appears by the mutual admissions of parties, that the disposition, although absolute in its form, had truly been intended as a security for the debt of the husband, or of him and his partner Mr M'Arthur, then trading under the firm of M'Arthur and Co. But no back bond or back letter had been granted, and the parties differ as to the precise object of the security. The pursuer Mrs Mackenzie says (cond. art. 11), "it was for a prior debt contracted by the company of which he" (her husband) "was a partner." The defenders say it was understood and agreed upon between their agent Mr Hutcheson and Mr Mackenzie and his partner, "that Mr Hutcheson should hold them" (i.e., the subjects) "in security of whatever might be overdrawn by M'Arthur and Co. on their cash-account, and of their general obligations to the bank." The defenders further say (stat. 6), that, at the date of the disposition, M'Arthur and Company's cash-credit with the bank had been overdrawn to an amount, including interest, of L.2138, 17s.; that the balance afterwards rose to L.5145, 16s. 9d., besides interest; and that, when the firm stopped payment in February 1855, the balance amounted, with interest, to L.2819, 14s. 8d. The only other security which the bank appears to have held for these overdrafts, was a disposition in the same absolute form, at the nominal price of L.800, granted by Mr M'Arthur, the only other partner of M'Arthur and Co., of certain subjects belonging to him. Whether these subjects have been sold, or what they have realized, is not stated, nor is it material to the present question. The subjects which had been conveyed by Mr Mackenzie and his wife were, however, sold by the bank, by public roup, to the defender Mr Brough, at the price of L.1580, and a disposition granted to him on which he is infest. The pursuer admits that the overdrafts at the date of the disposition to the bank were not less, at all events, than the amount stated by the defenders, and that the overdrafts at the close of the account exceeded L.2000.

In these circumstances, and upon the strength of certain averments to be immediately noticed, three grounds of reduction were insisted in by the Lord Ordinary.—1st, Force and fear; 2d, Fraud; and, 3d, Error in essentialibus. The Lord Ordinary found that the pursuer's statements were not relevant to support any of these grounds of reduction. The ground of fraud has been abandoned at the bar, and no further notice need be taken of it. There remains the two grounds—1st, of force and fear; and, 2d, of essential error.

Although, translating the language of the Roman law, we couple together force and fear as one ground of reduction, the act of force is truly, as Lord Stair observes (i. 9, 8), only one means of inducing fear, the true ground of reduction being extortion, through the influence of fear, induced in the various ways, of which he gives instances, partly from the civil law and partly from our own law,—such as the fear of torture, fear of infamy, fear of danger to life, and so on. It would be very difficult, and it is not here at all necessary, either by definition or description, to point out all the means by which, and which alone, such fear may be induced, on the part of a married woman, as the law will recognise as sufficient to void her solemn deed. Certain it is, on the one hand, that it is not every sort of fear—or rather it is not the fear of consequences of every sort, which will void such a deed; and, on the other hand, that fear of particular consequences may be sufficient in the case of a married woman, though of full capacity, which would not be sufficient in the case of a man of full capacity, and that these consequences need not necessarily be injury to herself, either in her person or character, but may be injury to her husband or to her children, the fear for whose safety may be stronger even than the fear for her own. But while I state these propositions in a general form, I do not attempt to define or describe what must be the nature of the consequences feared, in order to render them relevant to support reduction of the deed. It is not necessary to do so; and it is safer and sufficient, after seeing what is here actually averred, to proceed to inquire, whether, in any view of the law, what is so averred can be regarded as sufficient to annul this deed?

No. 116.

Feb. 20, 1857.
 Priestnell v.
 Hutcheson.

Now what is averred by the pursuer is substantially this:—That Mr Mackenzie and his partner, trading under the firm of M'Arthur and Company, became embarrassed in their circumstances, and largely indebted to the bank, on a cash-credit account;—that the bank insisted with Mr Mackenzie that he should get the pursuer to concur with him, for her liferent interest, in granting a security to the bank over the subjects comprehended in her antenuptial contract of marriage, "and threatened him and the company with diligence and ruin unless this were done;"—that the bank prepared the security in the form of an absolute disposition;—that on the forenoon of 26th October 1854, when she was not well, having been ill for a fortnight, Mr Mackenzie came hurriedly into her bedroom and told her, and afterwards repeated peremptorily, in the face of her refusal, that she must, without anybody knowing of it, sign the deed which was about to be brought, and which he described as a bond over the property for several hundred pounds, as otherwise he would be completely at the mercy of the bank, who would imprison and ruin him; and that, if the deed was not signed, he would immediately flee the country (obviously meaning to avoid imprisonment), leaving her and her family, which consisted of three young children, to do as they best might:—that at this juncture Mr M'Arthur and a bank clerk (who were the instrumentary witnesses) came to the house with the deed, and this being notified to her, she went into the room where they were (it is not said accompanied by her husband), and signed the deed in their presence—having had no previous notice of the nature of the deed, and not being made aware otherwise than has been already stated, of its object or contents, by its being read over to her or otherwise.

Now, laying out of view for the present, any specialty in consequence of the deed being in the form of an absolute disposition in place of a bond and disposition in security,—a specialty which affects, I think, solely the separate plea of error in essentialibus,—all that is here stated amounts truly to nothing more than this,—that the threat of imprisonment (which was quite a lawful threat) had been used against the husband if the debt should not be paid, or this security granted;—that he told his wife, quite truly, that this threat had been used, the consequence of which, if acted on, would be to ruin him; that, rather than be imprisoned, he would immediately flee the country, leaving her and the children (not, however, to starve, for she would, in that event, have had her liferent entire),—and that she being taken by surprise, and excited and alarmed by these consequences, correctly enough depicted to her, went into the room where the instrumentary witnesses were, and there, without further objection (so far as appears from her statements, signed the deed in their presence. The not reading over the deed goes for nothing, under this branch of the argument, in the absence of any charge of fraud. And as to the surprise, it is only material in so far as it may account for the operation of weaker grounds of fear than might otherwise be deemed sufficient. But, still the grounds of fear must be such as the law recognizes as relevant to void a solemn written deed; and here the only fear alleged is fear of consequences, which it was quite lawful for the bank to hold out, and equally lawful for the husband to communicate to his wife, as well as to tell her what he himself might thereupon feel constrained to do, in order to avoid imprisonment and gain a livelihood; and what the wife, to avoid the consequences thus impending, agreed to sign the deed, it would be more correct to say that she acted from affection than that she acted from fear; and although affection may no doubt induce fear for the person who is its object, yet if the fear so induced be merely the fear of (or in other words, the desire to avoid) such consequences as are stated here, all which might have ensued without illegality on the part of anybody, this is not the sort of fear which we hold relevant to void a formal and delivered deed. The bank threatened nothing which was unlawful, and the husband held out nothing which was unlawful, for he only said he would be constrained to leave the country, which might be a very natural course for him to take to avoid imprisonment, and seek a livelihood, and was very different from the case put (upon which I give no opinion) of a threat to the husband to commit suicide, or some other violent and unlawful act. In a reduction on the ground of force and fear, I hold it necessary to specify the things so done in such a way as to enable the Court to judge whether they really amount to force and fear in the eye of law, very much as in a case of fraud it must be specifically stated in what the alleged fraud consists. Here, I think, the spe-ification, in place of supporting, destroys the charge; and on this point, therefore, No. 116.

I concur with the Lord Ordinary.

There remains the ground of essential error. And here arises, I think, a question of considerable delicacy, in reference to which I had rather avoid, in the meantime, either expressly sustaining the relevancy, or holding that the pursuer's averments are so plainly irrelevant as to lead at once to the dismissal of the action. If it were absolutely necessary to take the one course or the other, I should, of course, be ready, whether in the same direction or not, to decide the relevancy of this ground of reduction as well as the other upon which I have already expressed my opinion. But there is a middle course, which we do not often take, but which may be quite competently taken, where there is a strong expediency in favour of it, and which I should propose to your Lordships to take here, and that is to allow a proof before answer. If the pursuer shall fail in proving her material averments, we shall be saved the necessity of deciding a delicate and novel question in the unsatisfactory and hypothetical form of a question of relevancy. And if, on the other hand, she shall succeed in proving these averments, we shall be in the safer and more satisfactory position of deciding upon a real case, and, consequently, run less risk of creating misapprehension in regard to the law, or dealing in the dark with the rights of the parties.

I suggest this course to your Lordships the more readily, because, it appears to me, that, even if the relevancy were to be sustained, this would be a case in the decision of which the legal inferences to be drawn from the particular facts proved would require greatly more consideration than is likely to be required in order to come to a conclusion as to what the facts proved are. It is not a case, therefore, in the extrication of which the aid of a jury is likely to be, by any means, so useful as where the difficulty lies mainly in ascertaining disputed questions of fact, or in drawing inferences which are more matter of discretion than matter of law. Nor much time be lost, or unnecessary expense incurred, in taking what, looking to the nature of the averments, we plainly see must be a very limited proof, and a proof at the close of which a judgment, final in this Supreme Court, may be at once pronounced. In this particular case, therefore, I should suggest to your Lordships, what I admit to be an exceptional course,—to allow a proof before answer of the facts averred, in so far as they bear upon the question of essential error: and as this course, if adopted, will leave the relevancy of these averments for future consideration, I forbear, in the meantime, from indicating any opinion whatever, upon that question of relevancy, either as it affects the bank or the purchaser, or upon what it may or may not be material for either party to prove.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I entirely concur.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The case is very delicate on that last branch of it. I have given it every consideration, and think it better fitted for the consideration of the Court than for a jury; and, therefore, I entirely concur in the opinion of Lord Curriehill.

LORD IVORY absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor submitted to review: Find that the plea of fraud is no longer insisted in, and that no relevant averments are made in support of the plea founded on force and fear: Therefore, Repel the reasons of reduction, and assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the action, so far as these are founded upon fraud and upon force and fear, and decern: And in so far as the action is laid upon the ground of error in essentialibus, before answer, and under reservation of all pleas of parties, Allow the parties respectively a proof of their averments, so far as bearing upon that ground of reduction; Grant diligence, &c., and appoint the commission and diligence to be reported quam primum; Further, they reserve all questions of expenses."

JAMES GRAHAM ADAM AND OTHERS, Defenders.—Macfarlane—Gifford.

Title to Sue—Transaction—Bankruptcy.—Held (affirming judgment of Lord Neaves, and in conformity with Crichton v. Bell, 25th June 1833), that a purchase by private sale, from the trustee and commissioners, of a debt forming part of a sequestrated estate, does not give a good title to sue the debtor.

1st Division.
Lord Neaves.
C.

THIS action was directed against the defenders, ten in number, as members of the provisional committee of a projected railway company in 1845, called the Lanark, Stirling, and Clackmannan Counties Junction Railway; and the action concluded for payment by them of an account of L.121, 15s. 6d., with interest since October 1846, incurred by them to John Stephen, who had been employed as surveyor and engineer of the proposed line. The pursuer's condescendence set forth, that after the account was incurred to Stephen, his estates were sequestrated, and John M'Pherson, writer in Glasgow, was appointed his trustee; that, by this sequestration, the account due by the defenders to Stephen became vested in M'Pherson as his trustee; and that in June 1854, M'Pherson, with consent of the commissioners, conveyed to Robertson, the pursuer, the account due by the defenders to Stephen and to M'Pherson, as his trustee, with full power to him to sue for, uplift, and discharge the same. The assignation was produced.

The defenders, while disputing their liability, pleaded, that the pursuer had no title to sue; and upon that point the Lord Ordinary, on 22d May 1855, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustains the defences against the pursuer's title to pursue: Dismisses the action, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses," &c.*

* "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary cannot distinguish the present case from that of Crichton v. Bell and Gillon, 25th June 1833, 11 Shaw, 781, where it was held that a purchase by private sale, from the trustee and commissioners, of a debt forming part of a sequestrated estate, did not give a good title to sue the debtor even although the creditors had approved of the transaction. That case occurred under the former Bankrupt Act; but although its provisions on this subject are not expressed precisely in the same terms as those of the Act now in force, there seems to be no such difference between them as to authorise a different decision here. By the former Act, sect. 34, the creditors were, at the first meeting after the bankrupt's examination, to 'give directions to the trustee for the recovery and disposal of the bankrupt's estate,' which the trustee was to follow; and, by sect. 41, the trustee was generally directed 'to recover and convert into money, in the speediest and most effectual manner, the whole estate under his management and power.' By the present Act, sect. 61, it is enacted, that the 'trustee shall manage, realise and recover the estate' belonging 'to the bankrupt wherever situated, and convert the same into money according to the directions given by the creditors at any meeting, and if no such directions are given, he shall do so with the advice of the commissioners.' By the former Act, sect. 56, it was enacted, 'That if, at the expiration of one year and an half from the date of the sequestration, any of the personal effects of the bankrupt, or any debts, whether heritable or moveable, due to him, remain still unrecovered, it shall be in the power of four-fifths of the creditors in number and value, convened at any general meeting called for the purpose after one advertisement, two weeks previous to the meeting, in the Edinburgh and London Gazettes, to direct that such remaining debts and effects, and also any contingent or future interest which the creditors at large may have in dividends deposited in bank, or lent out as aforesaid, be sold off by public auction upon two months' previous notice published in the Edinburgh and London Gazettes, the sale either to be in whole or in lots as a majority in value of the creditors shall direct.' By the present Act, sect. 112, it is enacted, 'That if, on the lapse of twelve months from the date of sequestration, it shall appear to the trustee and commissioners Judicial factor — Curator — Exoneration — Process.—The Court will not, as a matter of course, grant exoneration to a curator,—the ward concurring,—but will grant warrant for delivery of the bond of caution.

THE petitioners were the curators of Francis Burke, who attained majority Feb. 21, 1857. in August 1856. They now presented this application for exoneration and discharge, and to have their bond of caution delivered up. Burke concurred in the application. He had examined and approved of the whole curatorial accounts, and had also executed a formal discharge in the petitioners' favour, —which discharge was now produced. The accounts had not been examined and approved of by the Accountant of Court.

Patton, for the petitioners.—We propose to follow the course adopted in the case of Rollo.¹ We withdraw the prayer for exoneration.

LORD PRESIDENT.—Having that precedent, we shall grant the prayer as restricted.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords allow the prayer of the petition to be restricted at the bar: and, in terms of the restricted prayer, grant warrant to and ordain the expedient to sell the heritable or moveable estates not disposed of, and any interest which the creditors have in the outstanding debts and consigned dividends, they shall fix a day for holding a meeting of the creditors to take the same into consideration, and the trustee, besides advertising the same in the Edinburgh Gazette, shall, fourteen days before the day appointed, send by post to each creditor claiming on the estate a notice of the time and place of the meeting, with a valuation of the estate and effects, and a list of the outstanding debts and of the consigned dividends, and if three-fourths of the creditors in value assembled at the meeting shall decide in favour of a sale, in whole or in lots, the trustee shall cause the same to be sold by auction, after notice thereof published at least once in the Edinburgh Gazette one month previous to the sale, and in such other newspapers as the creditors at the meeting shall appoint.'

"Under both of these Acts, as illustrated by the case of Crichton, it must, it is thought, be held that the statutory direction given to the trustee to recover and realise the moveable estate does not authorise him to dispose of outstanding debts at his own hand, or with the mere aid of the commissioners. The natural mode, indeed, of realising an outstanding debt is to recover it from the debtor, and the assignment of it to a third party at an under value, such as here took place, does not seem to be an act of legitimate or ordinary administration. The disposal of outstanding debts by way of sale seems, under both of the statutes, to be guarded by special provisions, requiring first, that a certain time shall elapse, and next, that the sale shall be by auction, the only safe way, perhaps, by which the value of such a subject can be ascertained.

"Looking, then, both to precedent and principle, the Lord Ordinary thinks that the petition in this case has not validly acquired the alleged debt which is the subject of the petition, and, consequently, that he has no title to pursue."

No. 119. THE ACCOUNTANT OF COURT.—Watson.
 PATRICK MORRISON (Wilson's factor), Respondent.—Patton.

Judicial factor—Statute 12 & 13 Vict. cap. 51 (Pupils Protection Act.)—There are three classes of administrators to which the Pupils Protection Act applies,—a factor loco tutoris, factor loco absentis, and curator bonis;—Held (abs. Lord Ivory), that an appointment of a judicial factor, in terms of an application praying for an appointment of a judicial factor, and not for any of the classes mentioned in the statute, does not fall within the operation of the Act.

Feb. 21, 1857. PATRICK MORRISON was appointed, in November 1856, judicial factor on the estate of Robert Wilson, an aged person both deaf and blind, and unable to manage his affairs. The case now came before the Court on the following report by the Accountant of Court:—“A difficulty has arisen as to whether this is an appointment falling within the Pupils Protection Act, and the Accountant is therefore under the necessity of reporting to the Court, in order that the difficulty may be removed.

1st Division.
 Ld. Mackenzie
 L.

“The Pupils Protection Act (12 & 13 Vict. cap. 51) is entitled ‘An Act for the better protection of the property of pupils, absent persons, and persons under mental incapacity in Scotland.’

“Mr Wilson does not labour under direct mental incapacity, but under the loss of the use of the organs of sight and hearing, and these defects may be said to affect the use of his mental capacity, and to prevent him from exercising it in the administration of his affairs.

“The interpretation clause of the Act, however, is broader, and places under its provisions the estates of persons who are ‘under some incapacity for the time to manage their own estates,’ which is undoubtedly the case of Mr Wilson. But the term, ‘judicial factor,’ is not any one of the specific appointments named in the Pupils Protection Act. These are described as factor loco tutoris, factor loco absentis, and curator bonis; and the term ‘judicial factor,’ in the various sections of the Act, is held to mean either one or other of these appointments,—only used, however, as a general term for convenience, and to save repetition. There are, as the Court are aware, many judicial factors who are not under this statute; but the Accountant feels difficulty in holding this appointment to be one of these, and he is unwilling to take the responsibility of deciding that it is solely on the ground of the title of the appointment, when the circumstances of the case appear to point to an opposite conclusion.

“Should the Court, therefore, be of opinion that Mr Wilson's estate falls under the management provided by the Pupils Protection Act, it humbly appears to the Accountant that the appointment ought to have been curator bonis; and if so, it may be the pleasure of the Court still to direct the term of the appointment to be so altered.”

Patton.—The present application is unnecessary.¹ The preamble of the Pupils Protection Act sets forth the same species facti as the Act of Sederunt of 1730, and was evidently introduced to amend the procedure under the former Act of Sederunt in regard to appointments on the ground of mental incapacity.

Watson, for the Accountant.—The Accountant cannot hold, of his own authority, that a judicial factor means anything but the three different kinds of factors in the interpretation clause. No. 119.

Feb. 21, 1857.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Act was undoubtedly intended to apply to all those persons who are administrators for others, but I think also that the Act contemplated that all such persons would be comprehended under the particular description there mentioned of factors loco tutoris, factors loco absentis, and curators bonis. It rather appears to me that one of these classes would have been the more proper appointment here, and so have brought this case, beyond all question, within the operation of the Act. I do not know of any other class of administrators which the Act intended to comprehend which may not be found under one or other of these three classes. Ritchie v. Ritchie.

The error, if there is one, consisted in not praying for the appointment of a curator bonis. Questions of difficulty might arise whether a judicial factor fell under any and which of these classes of administrators mentioned in the statute; and I think that to hold that this appointment, even in a limited sense, fell under the Pupils Protection Act, would be dangerous, and calculated to throw this very useful statute into confusion. Parties ought to be more careful as to the nature of the appointment they pray for. All that we can do is to hold that, as the appointment stands, it does not fall under the operation of the statute, and allow parties to put it right; which they can only do by now asking for what they should have asked for at first,—the appointment of a curator bonis.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I have nothing to add.

LORD DEAS.—I give no opinion as to whether the appointment be good. I have some doubts of that, on grounds which I will not go into, as the risk lies with parties themselves if they do not choose to put the matter into a right shape by applying for the appointment of a curator bonis.

LORD IVORY absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor: — “The Lords having heard counsel in this case, on the report of the Accountant—Hold that, as the appointment stands at present,—that is, as judicial factor in terms of an application praying for the appointment of a judicial factor, and not for any of the classes mentioned in the statute,—the appointment is not one falling within the Pupils Protection Act; reserving right to apply for the appointment of a curator bonis.”

Process—Proof.—In the course of a conjunct proof in a divorce, the loss of a letter was sought to be proved by the pursuer, who adduced two witnesses, one of whom had received the letter, and the other had delivered it;—Held, that although the pursuer might have directed more searching inquiry for it, yet it being sufficiently proved that neither the pursuer nor her friends were in possession of it, secondary evidence of its contents was admissible.

In the course of a conjunct proof in an action of divorce, it appeared that the defender Ritchie had lodged for sometime at Holyrood Abbey. It was averred that he had there been guilty of adulterous practices. A person of the name of Fulton, who also resided there, was examined, and stated that he was acquainted with the defender—that he remembered Ritchie being apprehended and put in jail—that he (Fulton) afterwards received several letters from him, one of which he produced and identified; and he deponed, —“I think, in one letter that I received from Mr Ritchie, there was a letter enclosed addressed to Mr Wilson. I gave the letter to Wilson, and I remembered his reading it to me and Mr Finlayson in Finlayson’s house, at the counter. I do not think that Wilson gave me back that letter. I have

Mr Ritchie was in prison at the time when I received that letter.—Here the deponent having withdrawn, the agent for the pursuer stated, that, having proved the loss of the letter in question by the evidence of James M'Allan Wilson and the deponent Mr Fulton, he now proposed to examine the witness Fulton as to the contents of the said letter. The agent for the defender objected to the proposed examination in regard to the contents of the letter in question, because the loss of it has not been satisfactorily proved; and because, at all events, it is incompetent to prove its contents by parole testimony. The commissioner, in respect that it is sufficiently proved that the letter in question has been searched for by the witnesses Wilson and Fulton, without having been found, and that there is no reason to believe that its disappearance has arisen from any fault on the part of the pursuer or her agents, in whose possession it never seems to have been—Finds that it is competent to adduce secondary evidence as to the general terms or contents of the said letter, which is not founded on as an obligation, and therefore does not require an action of proving the tenor, in order to establish the nature of its contents: Therefore, repels the objection. Against which deliverance the agent for the defender appealed."

The Lord Ordinary dismissed the appeal.*

The defender reclaimed.

LORD PRESIDENT.—There is no other person suggested in whose possession this letter could be. Each of the witnesses swears positively that he does not have it. It will not do to come piecemeal here on every objection of this kind.

Feb. 21, 1857. By deed of entail dated 8th March 1810, Clanranald conveyed the whole of his estates in the county of Inverness to himself in liferent and the heirs whatsoever of his body in fee, whom failing, to the other heirs of tailzie therein mentioned. The deed was fenced by the usual prohibitory, irritant, and resolute clauses, but the granter reserved full power to revoke and alter the same in all respects. On 8th June 1811, Clanranald executed a trust-disposition in favour of certain parties, of whom the late Robert Brown, Esquire, chamberlain to the Duke of Hamilton, was the last survivor, whereby he conveyed to them his whole estates in trust for behoof of the creditors of his grandfather, his father, and himself, at the date of the trust-deed. The pursuer might have made more special requisition, and directed more searching inquiry for the letters than she has done; but still the fact that it is not in the possession of either Wilson or Fulton seems sufficiently made out, and it was never in the hands of the pursuer or her friends; and, therefore, on the whole matter, the evidence of its contents appears to have been rightly admitted by the commissioner."

By contract of marriage, dated February 1812, entered into by Clanranald upon his marriage with Lady Caroline Anne Edgcumbe, daughter of the Earl of Mount-Edgcumbe, to which the trustees under the deed of 1811 were, inter alios, parties, he bound himself to infeft Lord Suffield, and certain other parties, in his whole estates, in security of the sum of L.20,000, as a provision for the children of the marriage (in certain circumstances which have occurred), other than the one entitled to succeed to the estate. The original trustees named in the contract are all dead, and the claim is now vested in the present Earl of Mount-Edgcumbe, Sir James Forrest of Comiston, Bart., and William Alexander, Esq., W.S., as trustees assumed under the powers granted in the contract.

Clanranald also, with consent of the trustees for his creditors, and subject to the trust purposes, and the provision of L.20,000, disposed the whole of his estates, or such part of them as should remain unsold after the trust purposes were accomplished, to himself, and the heirs-male of the marriage, and the heirs whatsoever of their bodies, the eldest heir-female succeeding without division; whom failing, to the heirs-male of his body by any subsequent marriage, and the heirs whatsoever of their bodies, the eldest heir-female always succeeding without division; whom failing, to certain other heirs and substitutes therein mentioned; whom all failing, to the heirs specified in the deed of entail of 8th March 1810, but always under the whole conditions, &c. therein contained; and declaring that these conditions should apply to himself as well as to the heirs called to the succession, so that the lands and estates might at all events be secured to the heirs called by the contract of marriage. Clanranald farther renounced, so far as regarded the heirs called by the contract of marriage, the power of alteration reserved to him by the deed of entail of 1810. He was duly infeft in Feb. 1817, in the whole estates conveyed by the contract of marriage, in virtue of a precept of sasine therein contained, but under the conditions therein mentioned.

There were one son and five daughters born of this marriage, which was dissolved several years ago by the death of Lady Caroline; and Clanranald had no issue of his subsequent marriages.

Clanranald contracted various debts subsequent to the date of the trust-deed in 1811, and, among others, one of L.5000 to Messrs Herries, Farquhar, and Co., bankers in London, and another of L.2200 to Mr J. H. Burnett, now Sir James H. Burnett, Baronet. In the year 1832, Herries, Farquhar, and Company raised an action against Clanranald; Mr Brown, the then only surviving trustee under the trust-deed of 1811; and the late Marquess of Lothian, &c., the trustees at that time for the younger children under the contract of marriage,—containing conclusions for having it found that the children were not onerous creditors under the contract, so as to enable them to compete with the pursuers as creditors of their father upon the residue of the trust-funds; and, by a supplementary action, Ranald John Macdonald (now a captain in the Royal Navy), Clanranald's only son, was made a party to the suit.

In March 1833, the Court pronounced a judgment, by which they decreed against Clanranald personally, in terms of the libel; but quoad ultra they found in effect,—

No. 121.

Feb. 21, 1857.
Macdonald v.
Lindsay.

1st, That the trustees for the younger children were creditors for the provision of L.20,000, and were preferable to the pursuers.

2d, That Mr Brown, the surviving trustee, was bound to denude of such part of the lands as remained unsold, and of such part of the price of the lands sold as should remain after satisfying the trust purposes, in such manner as to secure the succession thereto to the heir-male of the marriage; whom failing, to the other heirs called by the marriage-contract; and that the pursuers (Messrs Herries, Farquhar, and Co.), as creditors of Clanranald, were not entitled to do any diligence against the lands, or the prices thereof, so as to affect the interests of the heir or heirs under the marriage-contract; and,

Lastly, That the pursuers should be entitled to do all competent diligence against Clanranald himself, and his life interest in the residue of the trust-estate, in virtue of the decree pronounced against him in the action.

As already mentioned, the trustees under the deed of 1811 sold the whole of the estates, with the exception of two small islands, Tirrim and Risgay, and certain mid-superiorities of parts of the estates, with the feu-duties and casualties attached thereto; and, after discharging the whole debts due under the trust, a considerable balance of the price remained in the hands of the trustee, which, along with the unsold lands, fell to be applied under the provisions of the contract of marriage.

In the year 1839, Mr Brown, the surviving trustee, raised an action of multiplepoinding and exoneration before the Court of Session, with the view of procuring the authority of the Court for distributing and applying the residue of the trust-funds in his hands, and subsequently obtaining his exoneration.

Various claims were lodged in that process, and, in March 1841, Lord Cuninghame, Ordinary, pronounced an interlocutor finding Mr Brown entitled to be discharged of the trust so soon as the debts contracted by the petitioner prior to the date of the trust-deed were paid, or otherwise provided for; and, with reference to the claims of the several parties on the fund for division, his Lordship,—

1st, Sustained the claim of the trustees for the younger children for the provision of L.20,000, subject to the right of Clanranald or his creditors to the income thereof during his life.

2d, In respect of its being admitted that there would be a free balance of L.17,000, or thereby, after all the trust debts and the provision of L.20,000 to the children had been paid, he sustained the claim preferred by Captain Ranald John Macdonald, as heir-male of the marriage, to the fee or capital of the surplus, and of the estates which might be purchased therewith.

3d, He found that the balance must be invested in the purchase of land to be entailed, by a deed of entail to be executed by Mr Brown, or by such other party as the Court might appoint, and at the sight of the Court, in terms of the provision in the contract of marriage, in favour of Clanranald, and the heirs and substitutes in their order called by the marriage contract, reserving every claim of liferent interest or otherwise competent to Clanranald and his creditors in debts contracted subsequent to the date of the trust-deed, on the surplus fund or land to be purchased therewith.

Sometime afterwards, the estates of Clanranald were sequestrated under the Bankrupt Statute, and, on 15th March 1844, Mr Samuel Clerk, accountant in Edinburgh, was confirmed trustee on the sequestrated estate, and lodged a claim in that character in the multiplepoinding. A joint minute was afterwards put into process for Mr Brown, Mr Clerk, and Captain Ranald John Macdonald, heir-male of the marriage, whereby it was, inter alia, agreed,—

1st, That the capital of the trust funds should be held to amount to L.37,696, 10s. 5d., and that these, together with the two islands and the mid-superiorities before mentioned, should be made over by Mr Brown to a No. 121. judicial factor to be nominated by the Court for executing the trust.

That the person to be so nominated should, out of the annual interest or income of the capital, pay, — (1.) The cost and charges of management ; Feb. 21, 1857. Macdonald v. Lindsay.

(2.) The interest of such debts as might be found to form a burden on the capital; (3.) The interest of the debts of L.5000 due to Messrs Herries, Farquhar, and Company, and of L.2200 due to Sir James Horne Burnett, and the premiums of assurance on two policies effected on Clanranald's life, for securing payment of these debts respectively; and, (4.) That the free balance of the income arising from the trust funds should be paid over to Mr Clerk for behoof of Clanranald's creditors in the sequestration.

3d, That, upon the death of Clanranald, the capital of the trust funds should, in the first place, be applied in payment of the provision of L.20,000 to the younger children, and the remainder, with the islands and superiorities, should be made over in favour of Captain Ranald John Macdonald, and the other heirs and substitutes under the provisions of the marriage contract.

Clanranald made no appearance in this process, and he was no party to the joint minute.

Upon advising this joint minute, the Court, on 20th July 1850, appointed Mr Donald Lindsay, accountant in Edinburgh, to be judicial factor on the trust estate, and declared that the obligation to execute the entail was thereby laid upon him,—and Mr Brown afterwards conveyed the whole to him, by a deed dated 6th December 1850, and he was infeft thereon conform to instrument of sasine in his favour, recorded in the General Register of Sasines at Edinburgh 29th May 1851. Since the date of that conveyance, Mr Lindsay has been in the management of the whole trust, and has applied the yearly produce in the manner agreed upon by the joint minute before mentioned.

Matters remained in this situation until the end of the year 1855, when articles of agreement, in the English form, dated 22d December 1855, were entered into between Clanranald, of the first part, the three heirs of entail next in succession, entitled to succeed Clanranald under the entail provided to be made in terms of the marriage contract, of the second part, and Viscount Valletort and the Honourable George Henry Edgcumbe, of the third part,—whereby, after narrating the proceedings before mentioned, it was agreed that an application should be made, under the Entail Amendment Acts, praying the Court to grant warrant and authority to Mr Donald Lindsay, as judicial factor,—

1st, To execute, with concurrence of Clanranald, a disposition and deed of entail of the islands of Tirrim and of Risgay, and of the mid-superiorities before mentioned, in terms of the provisions of the contract of marriage.

2d, To make payment, out of the capital of the trust-funds, of the debts of L.5000 and L.2200, to Messrs Herries, Farquhar, and Company, and Sir James Horne Burnett, Baronet, respectively, and all interest due thereon, the creditors assigning their debts, and the policies of assurance effected for their security, to Lord Valletort and Mr Edgcumbe, in trust, for the purposes specified in the articles of agreement.

3d, To make payment to Mr Samuel Clerk, as trustee in the sequestration, of such sum as, with the other funds realised by him, might enable him to pay all the creditors ranked in the sequestration in full, with interest.

4th, To make payment out of the trust funds of the whole cost and expenses to be incurred in the matter; and—

Lastly, To make over the whole residue and remainder of the trust funds to Lord Valletort and Mr Edgcumbe, in trust, for the purposes expressed in the articles of agreement.

Macdonald v.
Lindsay.

In terms of that agreement, Clanranald presented a petition to the Court on 31st January 1856, setting forth in detail the whole of the above proceedings, and praying for warrant upon Mr Lindsay in terms of the deed of agreement, and for service and intimation, all in terms of the Acts 11th & 12th Victoria, chap. 36, and 16th & 17th Victoria, chap. 94.

On 10th March 1856, answers were lodged for Mr Donald Lindsay, the judicial factor, objecting to the prayer of the petition being granted, on the ground that there was no provision in the statutes for the acquisition of trust money or the conveyance of land subject to conditions, or subject to an arrangement for the ultimate disposal of such money or land to be sanctioned and authorised by the Court, and that the consents contemplated in the Act were only unconditional ones; that the Court could only authorise an unconditional disentail or surrender by a trustee of the free estate held in trust for the purpose of being entailed, or for the purchase of land to be entailed, after all prior claims on the trust-estate were provided for or discharged; that any disentail, while the preferable claims mentioned in the petition existed, could only take place upon such private arrangement with the trustee, or with the claimants on the trust-estate, as should be equivalent to a discharge of these claims so far as the trust was concerned; and that the Court could not entertain any such arrangements as formed the subject of the petition, as part of the proceedings under the statute.*

The Court, on 14th June 1856, without then disposing of the competency, remitted to the Lord Ordinary to inquire into the circumstances, and report. His Lordship remitted to Mr John Whitefoord Mackenzie, whose report contained the summary of the whole proceedings above given. Mr Mackenzie also stated that three minutes,—one for Messrs Herries, Farquhar, and Company, and Sir James H. Burnett,—one for Mr Clerk,—and the third for the trustees for the younger children and others, being the whole creditors entitled to the debts mentioned in Clanranald's affidavit,—had been lodged, stating that they were satisfied with the provision that had been made for their security, and consenting, so far as they were interested, to the prayer of the petition being granted.

Along with the minute for Mr Clerk, there was put into process a state of debts ranked in Clanranald's sequestration, signed for the trustee, and for Clanranald and his son, shewing the balance still to be provided for, and an award by Mr Lindsay, fixing the amount at L.1829, 19s. 5d. as on 30th June 1856.

As to the question of competency raised by the judicial factor, Mr Mackenzie stated that, "from the pleas set forth in the judicial factor's answers to the petition, it would appear he means to maintain that, before any application under the statutes 11th and 12th Vict., c. 36, and 16th and 17th Vict., c. 94, could be competently made, the matter as to the execution of the entail should have been settled otherwise, and arrangements made with the judicial factor for satisfying the creditors, while the application under the statutes should have been confined to obtaining an order for payment to Clanranald of the balance of the trust-funds, (L.17,000 or thereby,) which is directed to be invested in land,—and that without any condition whatever; all conditions, according to his view, being incompetent in the circumstances of this case.

* Section 43 of the statute enacts—"And where any money or other property, real or personal, has been, or shall be, invested in trust for the purpose of purchasing lands to be entailed, or where any lands are or shall be directed to be entailed, but the direction has not been carried into effect, such trust money or other property, and such lands, though still unentailed, may be dealt with under this Act in all respects as such lands might have been dealt with if entailed in terms of such trust or directions."

"The statute 11th and 12th Vict. certainly does contemplate cases in which consents may be given under conditions, limitations, and restrictions, and unless the Court shall be of opinion that consents must be unconditional in all cases, except those specially mentioned, the present may be held to be one where effect should be given to such conditions, as they are evidently for the benefit of, and consented to by, all parties having interest in the matter.

No. 121.

Feb. 21, 1857.
Macdonald v.
Lindsay.

"It may perhaps be maintained that, strictly speaking, the prayer for an order upon the judicial factor to execute an entail of the islands of Tirrin and Risgay, and of the superiorities, can scarcely be held as falling directly under the provisions of the statutes in question, which mean to provide for disentailing alone, and that the more correct way of proceeding would have been to have made a separate application to the Court, praying them to ordain the judicial factor to execute such an entail.

"Had this been done, it does not appear that any valid objection could have been stated against such a demand, as Clanranald was no party to any arrangement for postponing the execution of the entail till after his death, and those parties who contemplated this at the date of the joint minute in the multiplepoinding have now concurred in asking the Court to grant the present application.

"If, however, the Court shall hold that the heirs are entitled to adject conditions to their consents, and all the consents in this case being given under a stipulation that an entail of the islands and superiorities before mentioned shall be executed, the objection to the competency of this part of the petition may perhaps be held as obviated."

The Lord Ordinary reported the case. To-day it was advised.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The proposal made by the petitioner is, that these lands and feu-duties and mid-superiorities shall be entailed, and that the rest of the fund shall be applied to certain purposes mentioned, and the parties who would have been consenters to a disentail are consenters to this application of the funds. Therefore, the case is in this position, that part of the estate consists of funds, and part of it consists of land, and all of these are proposed to be entailed. Under section 43 it is competent to apply funds not yet entailed in the same way that would have been competent to deal with entailed land. Part of the land under the entail might have been sold for the accomplishment of certain purposes, and sold under such conditions as the parties chose to attach to their consent. Now, I think that under this clause all that applies to money as well as to land. Unless the conditions were such as to startle us, we cannot look to them. Now, what are the conditions attached? They are, in the first place, to secure the interest of the parties entitled to L.20,000, which was part of the trust-funds, but is not part of the entail. Then, as to the L.12,000, the condition attached is, that that sum shall be applied towards the payment of certain debts, and there is to be the purchase of a certain reversion. All parties consent to that. The conditions are very simple and very reasonable, and I dare say the consents could not have been got in any other way. There is no incompetency in this, and there is no such complication as to render any other mode of proceeding necessary, or to compel us to say to the parties, you must arrange all this among yourselves. It was suggested that the matter of the execution of the entail should have been settled otherwise, and arrangements made with the judicial factor for satisfying the creditors, while the application under the statutes should have been confined to obtaining an order for payment to Clanranald of the balance of the trust-funds, and let him apply it as he pleases. But I do not think so; and upon the whole, I am of opinion that this is a competent proceeding. I see no good objection to it. But there are other points behind, which we must remit to the Lord Ordinary, if your Lordships concur in that view of the competency.

LORD GUNNELL.—I take the same view of the case, and there is only one point on which I have the slightest hesitation. I have no doubt at all that the petitioner is in the predicament set forth in the Act as the party in whose favour an

No. 121. entail can be insisted to be made. These islands are part of the original estate, and the money arises out of the sale of lands which were directed to be entailed. Feb. 21, 1867. It was in consequence of the marriage-contract following the original deed of entail and the trust-deed that they have been sold. But still the residue of the funds that have been produced by that sale are still the subject of the same trust, so that I have no doubt at all that this money falls under the directions to entail in the trust which existed prior to 1848, and under which Clanranald is institute. So far as I can see, he has not done anything to preclude himself from insisting that he shall be put into this position, so that he shall have all the powers of an heir of entail in possession, or what is as good, of an institute. I have no doubt at all about that, nor in giving effect to these conditions here attached to the consents, because they are conditions in favour of creditors who have claims on this estate, whose interests the Act of Parliament requires us to have in view. My only hesitation is as to the construction of section 43. But, upon the whole, I think it is quite in conformity with the main object of the Act to give effect to a sale; and, therefore, I quite agree.

LORD DEAS.—The leading objection to the prayer of this petition is, that the case does not fall under sections 4 and 43 of the Entail Amendment Act, but exclusively under sections 3 and 27; and consequently, that no consents can competently be received except such as are unconditional. Now, I give no opinion as to whether consents under sections 3 and 27 must be unconditional or not; because I am of opinion that sections 4 and 43 are applicable to the present case. It has been explained by the Lord Ordinary,—and the accuracy of the explanation has not been called in question,—that the trust for executing the entails was constituted by the marriage-contract and relative trust-deed, which are dated and came into operation, in 1811 and 1812, and that the judicial factor is now in the position of having to carry out that trust. Now, we decided in the case of Dickson, 8th June 1855, that, in questions under the Entail Amendment Act, the date when the trust-deed, authorising the entail, came into operation, is to be held the date of the entail, and the person entitled to be heir of entail, whether lucratively or not, is to be held the heir of entail in possession. Consequently, the entail here must be held to have been executed as far back as 1812, and the heir of entail for the time to have been, since then, the heir in possession. This brings the petitioner within the category of heirs of entail described in sections 3 and 4 of the statute, and leaves only the question whether the effect of the latter part of section 43 be to place the trust-funds here in the same position with an entailed estate, and, consequently, under the provisions of section 4? I am of opinion that the enactment in section 43 has this effect. The words are absolute and unqualified. To read the enactment as the objectors propose to read it, you must supply nearly as many words as the enactment itself consists of. There is no authority for that, or for construing the words of such an enactment otherwise than according to their natural meaning. Nor could the object of the statute be otherwise carried out. Upon the whole, therefore, I concur with your Lordships that the prayer of this petition may be granted.

LORD IVORY absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—The Lords, on report of Lord Mackenzie, Ordinary, &c., on the motion of the petitioner, consented to by Mr Lindsay through his counsel at the bar,—Allow the petition, No. 1 of process, to be amended by inserting the word “January” after the words “dated 17th,” as one of the dates of the contract of marriage mentioned on the margin of the second page of the petition, and by introducing on the thirteenth page of the petition the concluding portion of the 43d section of the statute 11 & 12 Vict. cap. 36, as founded on by the petitioner; and these amendments on the petition having been made at the bar, and the counsel for the parties having been heard on the objections to the competency of the application not formerly disposed of, they repel the objections to the competency of the said petition, and find that the same is competent under the statute founded on: Further, they

Process—Jury trial—Issues—Reparation.—A tanner, who occupied a tenement on a water lead, raised against a dyer occupying a superior tenement, a process of declarator, interdict, and damages, alleging great increase of pollution by discharge of dye-stuffs, &c. Form of issues adjusted to try the question, under which held that the defenders might prove acquiescence.

Held, that the defender was not entitled to put in issue whether other tenants higher up the stream had increased the amount of pollution.

River.—Both leases contained the same clause, conferring the use of water under certain restrictions. Question, whether this inferred abandonment of rights at common-law, or whether it was to be held as in fortification of them.

HENRY EWEN, a tanner in Hawick, in 1855 raised this action of declarator, interdict, and damages, against the trustees of the deceased John Turnbull, a dyer. The interdict sought was to have the defenders "interdicted from carrying on all manufactures or operations whereby the water of the mill lead may be injured or rendered impure and unfit for the use of the pursuer's manufactory or work for skinning and tanning; and, in particular, the defenders ought and should be interdicted and prohibited, by decree foresaid, from discharging or emptying dye-stuffs, scouring residuum, or any other foul, dirty, or discoloured and deleterious liquid, matter,

Feb. 21, 1857.
Ewen v.
Turnbull's
Trustees.

Ewen alleged that he had in 1846 succeeded, under a disposition, his father, who had been the original tenant of one of the lots when first laid off in 1803, from which date to his death he had carried on the tanning trade, and that, from about 1830 downwards, John Turnbull and his successors had gradually been increasing dye works, which they carried on so as latterly to have rendered the water quite unfit for tanning, and the pursuer and his father had frequently complained. The defenders, on the other hand, alleged that the pursuer and his father had acquiesced in all the changes in their operations; and, farther, that the pursuer had acquired his rights only in 1851, and that by singular title, and so had no right to complain.

The other circumstances of the case, and pleas stated in defence, are thus stated by the Lord Ordinary in his note:—"The principal points argued at the debate were—(1st) The title of the pursuer to maintain this action under its declaratory and subordinate conclusions; and (2d), What is the true construction to be put on the clause in the lease of the defender, as regards the nature and extent of the obligation it imposes upon him towards the pursuer.

"The defender disputed the pursuer's title, on the ground that his right was that of mere tenancy—(1st plea)—and it was contended, that the Duke of Buccleuch, the landlord, had the only title to sue—(3d plea,) the parties each hold building leases of the endurance of ninety-nine years, granted by the Duke under the authority of the statute 10 Geo. III. The leases of both parties contain, in ipsissimis verbis, a clause of use of water in a mill-lead passing by or through the subjects leased, but that under certain conditions and restrictions, securing that the use taken shall not be prejudicial to manufactories or works above and below. The pursuer has on his subject a tannery and skinnery, and the defenders' subjects have upon them a dye work. The complaint is, that the defenders' present mode of use of the water is prejudicial to the pursuer's work.

"The defender did not profess to support, by any authority, the incompetency of an action of declarator by a tenant, under such a lease, in order to vindicate and establish the mutual obligations on the lessees of the contentious subjects, and the Lord Ordinary is not aware of any principle which should disallow to the tenant the right to raise this declarator. He has therefore sustained the pursuer's title, and repelled the pleas, so far as directed against its sufficiency.

"Upon the second point, the defender opposed the pursuer's motion to have an issue, although asked only before answer, and argued, that the clause common to their respective leases did not support the action. The clause is as follows—'The said' (each lessee) 'binds and obliges himself and his foresaids' . . . 'to uphold the banks of the mill dams within the bounds of his foresaid lot or area, at such a height as to prevent the water from overflowing, as well as to keep the bottom thereof clean, and to concur with his Grace's other tenants, who have the use of the water, in cleaning the same within the foresaid lot or area, so far as consistent with the carrying on of any manufactory or work already established upon it, but shall not be at liberty to divert any part of the water from its ordinary course, nor to erect any building or work which shall obstruct the free pa sage of it, so as to be prejudicial to, or to render the water unfit for, No. 122.

any other work previously established either above or below the said area.'

"The allegation of the pursuer is, that the water is so used by the defender as to be made prejudicial to, and be rendered unfit for the uses of the pursuer's works lower down. The defender contends, that the limitation imposed is only against diversion, or obstruction of the free passage of the water by the erection of a building or work, and which obstruction is the mode prohibited by which the water is to become prejudicial to, or be rendered unfit for other works. Were it necessary at this time to construe the clause in the abstract, the Lord Ordinary cannot say he should feel much difficulty in disregarding the construction of the defender. But the Lord Ordinary does not think that any finding is called for at this stage. He conceives that the whole facts of the case must be investigated, and an issue is the proper mode for ascertaining them—under which issue the Judge at the trial will give such directions on the construction of the clause, as applied to the facts, as well as on the other pleas on the merits, which may be necessary or required. The Lord Ordinary has therefore allowed the pursuer to lodge a draft issue on the whole cause, but under the qualification of being before answer."

Ewen v.
Trustees.

The following are the terms of the interlocutor to which this note was appended:—"Sustains the pursuer's title to maintain this action; repels the first and third pleas in law for the defenders; and, before farther answer, allows the pursuer to lodge a draft of the issue which he proposes for trial of the cause."

The defenders reclaimed, praying for absolvitor.

Issues were lodged by both parties.

The following was proposed by the pursuer:—

"It being admitted that the subjects, of which the pursuer and defenders respectively are lessees, are part of the new glebe of Hawick, and that a mill-lead or artificial run of water flows through or past the properties of the pursuer and defenders respectively, the property of the pursuer being farther down the said mill-lead than that of the defenders;—

"Whether, for some years prior to 25th September 1855, the defenders and the said John Turnbull wrongfully, and to the loss, hurt, and injury of the pursuer, were in the practice of discharging dye-stuffs, scouring residuum, filth, or foul and deleterious liquids or substances, into the said mill-lead, whereby the water thereof was polluted, and rendered unfit for, or prejudicial to, the pursuer's trade of a skinner and tanner, carried on in his said premises?

"Damages laid at L.1000."

The defenders, on the other hand, contending that the right maintained was purely artificial, and not at common law, proposed that the clause in the lease should be prefixed as an admission, and farther proposed the following counter issues:—

"Or, Whether the predecessors and authors of the pursuer acquiesced in the use made of the said mill-lead and water thereof by the defenders and their predecessors?

"Whether the pursuer acquired right to his said lease and subjects in or about the year 1851? and whether, at that time, the operations of the defenders complained of, were carried on to as great, or nearly as great an extent, as at the commencement of the present action?

"Whether, during the possession of the pursuer's said subjects by his predecessors and authors as a skinning and tanning work, or during a considerable part of said time, parties other than the defenders, having premises upon the said mill-lead, situated above those of the pursuer and defenders, were in the practice of using the said mill-lead and the water thereof for dyeing and scouring operations, and for manufacturing purposes, and of dis-

No. 122. charging into the same, dye-stuffs, scouring residuum, filth, or other foul liquids or substances, whereby the water of the said miln-lead was polluted to the same, or nearly to same extent, as complained of? And whether the predecessors and authors of the pursuer acquiesced in the said use of the said miln-lead and water thereof?"

Ewen v.
Trustees.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have carefully considered this case, with reference to its specialties, and with the recollection of a variety of cases in which questions of this nature have occurred. I think the issue proposed by the pursuer is the issue to try the cause, and under it the whole defence of the defender is open in reply to that issue.

In the first place, I am of opinion that we cannot compel the pursuer to take the issue proposed by the defender, with reference to the class of obligations imposed by the lease on the different parties, and on the defender, in regard to what they are to do as to this stream. The Duke of Buccleuch may or may not have imposed sufficient obligations on his feuars. They are bound to attend to these. It does not follow, however, that these obligations towards inferior heritors are limited by any such clause. I lay aside the question, whether this is a proper stream, or a portion of the river diverted. It is a stream in which each of these parties, upper and lower, have a clear interest and right.

It is very true that manufactures have from the first been allowed, and no party could complain that it had been rendered unfit for domestic use; for it is clear that there was no obligation to furnish water fit for those purposes, and that it was not intended to be preserved in that condition. I need not consider what might arise as to such a case, because it is not within the objects of the action.

But because the stream may have been intended to be employed in manufactures, it by no means follows that any party may begin to increase the pollution to the extent of injuring the lower tenant so as to destroy the manufacture he has hitherto carried on. And, therefore, independently of the obligation in the lease, he is entitled, at common law, to complain of any additional pollution. It may be that the landlord would have been responsible for that, as he might have been in the case of Hamilton of Barnes, and Dunn. What is alleged is an additional pollution which he has not sanctioned. The landlord here has not joined with his tenant in this defence, otherwise there might have been separate liability against him. Under the terms of the issue proposed by the pursuer, he must make out his averment, that for some years prior to the raising of the action, the defenders did pollute this stream more than they had done previously. If they, the defenders, make out that there was no injury to the works that was appreciable—that the water was just as unfit for the skinning trade before as now—the defence is complete. If the party fails to prove increase for some years, he does not prevail. As to the first counter issue, I observe that in it no period is set forth to which the acquiescence is to be applied by which it is to be contended that the pursuer lost his right. This issue proceeds on the very notion that there was an increase, but one which was acquiesced in. Now acquiescence in the pollution of the water to the extent to which it existed before that increase will be of no avail; and it is unnecessary to put in issue subsequent acquiescence, as the defender will be entitled to the full benefit of that in answer to the pursuer's case.

Then we come to the issue as to the state of the operations in 1851, when the pursuer acquired right to the subjects; but if this party, relying on the general repute of the stream, comes there in 1851, he is still entitled to complain if there has been any recent increase, because, on its repute, he was entitled to rely upon it being fit for the purpose for which he desired to use it. Then as to the next issue it is exactly the answer upon the facts on the whole case. Why, if two or three other manufacturers have increased the pollution, that does the defender no good but merely entitles the pursuer to proceed against each in detail. This point came out on Lord Gillies's ruling in a fishing case. This Court and the House of Lords held that the fact of the existence of dykes higher up the river where the salmon could be stopped, was no defence to an action for removing a lower one, as the pursuer might take steps separately against each individually, if he pleased.

I see no ground of defence which will not be open to this party under the issue proposed by the pursuer.

LORD MURRAY concurred.

LORD WOOD was absent.

LORD COWAN.—I have no objection to the course proposed. As to the issues proposed by the defender, it seems to me quite clear that acquiescence is not so stated, as matter of fact in the record, as to give rise to a separate issue; and as to the next issue, although the pursuer himself acquired right only in 1851, he succeeded to his father; and the son is entitled to urge all the pleas which the father could have competently done. Then as to the third issue proposed, every matter it embraces of any moment will be open for the defence, in answer to the pursuer's issue. It is the terms of that issue that create the only difficulty. Both parties hold under the same superior, and with the same clause in their leases, and this relative position may affect their mutual rights and obligations. All I wish to guard against is this, that, by sanctioning a general issue in the terms proposed, we do not foreclose the defender from founding at the trial on the fact that such a clause exists in the other leases as well as in his own. I think the titles of the parties may possibly enter into the question between the parties under the issue; and if the terms are such as leave all this open, I agree in the course suggested by your Lordship.

Sheriff-court — 16 & 17 Vict., cap. 80, sect. 22—Competency of advocacy.—Section 22 of the recent Sheriff-court Act, cutting off the right of review when the sum does not exceed L.25, applies to causes in dependence before the passing of the Act.—Where an action contains a money conclusion under L.25, and an alternative one ad factum præstandum, and where the Sheriff has decerned in terms of the money conclusion, the defender cannot advocate on the ground that the action is ad factum præstandum, when there was clearly no importance attachable to specific performance.

At a sale of John Cameron's cattle, William M'Pherson purchased two cows, one at L.8, the other at L.7, 6s. Being on a journey to the south, he did not settle for the price, but left the cows in the seller's hands till he could return and do so. Some time after, William Smith, the defender, called on the pursuer, and told him that M'Pherson had agreed to pass his purchase to him if he was satisfied with the cows; and, after looking at them, he left without saying whether he had made up his mind about them or not. A few days afterwards, he sent for them, and they were delivered. M'Pherson then returned, but he did not pay for the cows; and it was alleged that Smith had never paid him for them; and, M'Pherson being insolvent, Cameron raised against Smith the present action, concluding to have him ordered to redeliver to the pursuer, in the like good order and condition as in they were removed, two cows, the property of the pursuer; or otherwise, to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of L.15, 6s. sterling, being the price of said two cows, with the legal interest thereof."

The Sheriff-substitute (Gordon) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Decerns against the defender for the sum of L.15, 6s. sterling, with interest thereon from 30th April 1853: Finds the defender liable in expenses." To which, on appeal, the Sheriff-depute (Currie) adhered, except that he modified the sum. Smith then presented a note of advocacy, which was taken under the recent Act, to the Second Division, who pronounced the following interlocutor:—"16th January 1857.—The Lords having heard counsel, on the plea that this advocacy is incompetent under the 22d section of the Act 16 & 17 Victoria, cap. 80, in respect of the general importance of the question as to the construction and application of the said section, Appoint the said question to be argued before the Judges of this Division present at the argument with the Judges of the First Division."

At the argument, it was contended ;—That the main purpose of the statute founded on in exclusion of the advocacy was to introduce new regulations for the conduct of business, and in the forms of procedure in the Sheriff-court, although some other provisions, as those in section 22, were also introduced. It was very right that the former class of provisions should at once take effect in that court, but the case was quite different in regard to the other class, which could not be held to apply to existing processes. Least of all could any limitation of the right of review, which could only be taken away by express statute, be held to apply to existing processes which might be ripe for judgment. As for the words "pronounced or to be pronounced," they were a mere repetition of the same thing, and the one was as possibly future as the other. To have excluded the right to advocate, the words must have been "already pronounced." The right of appeal was a constitutional privilege, which could not be taken away by implication, or by anything short of positive statute. Cases had already been decided which shewed it was not the opinion of the Court that all the clauses of the Act applied to subsisting actions.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—I hold the clause of the statute does apply to this case although commenced before the Act passed. Its intention was to enact a prohibition which should take effect on the 1st of November in that year.

The other Judges concurred.

The Court then pronounced the following interlocutor :—" 13th February 1857.—Find, in conformity with the opinion of all the Judges who hear the case argued, that the 22d section of the Act 16 & 17 Victoria, cap. 80 applies to and must regulate all advocations brought after the date when the statute was to take effect, whether the cause so attempted to be advocated was in dependence before the said date or not."

It was then maintained that the advocacy was not struck at by the new Act, as its value was to be judged of not by the judgments of the Sheriff but by the conclusions of the libel, one of which was ad factum præstandum and therefore the value could not be fixed. The actual price of the cows was no criterion, as had been fixed in a case on all fours with the present.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I only dispose of this case upon the particular circumstances that arise in it. I cannot say that on the terms of the conclusion of the summons this is really a separate conclusion. The summons concludes for the sum of L.15—The price of these two cows is thus fixed, so far as the pursuer concerned. That is, the money value of his conclusion is fixed at L.15 by the pursuer himself. Then comes the question, what could this action resolve into but the price of the cows? Did the defender become liable for the cows or their price by taking them away, or did he merely act as a drover employed to do so by the actual purchaser? If the defender incurred any liability to the pursuer, he became liable for the price of these cattle, and nothing more. The conclusion, therefore for delivery of the cattle was not the real and substantial conclusion. The conclusion for money is the real ground of action, and is not to be overcome, or its consequences overruled, by throwing in an alternative conclusion for delivery of the subjects.

I wish to reserve, as not arising in this case, my opinion on the question whether where decree is given for delivery only, advocacy might not be competent. I also, I will not say that because the petitioner's conclusion is for a small sum money, the conclusion ad factum præstandum, where there is a particular object in acquiring the ipsissima corpora of what is claimed, may be barred from advocacy because only a small sum of money is claimed. No. 123.

LORD MURRAY.—On reading the conclusions of the summons, L.15 is the statement of the value of these cows. The original conclusion is in a manner passed from, and this is the real and substantial conclusion of the action, that the defender be decerned to pay the price of these cows. Feb. 24, 1857.
Rhind v. Commercial Bank of Scotland.

LORD COWAN.—I have no doubt; the only question is, do the terms of the conclusions of this summons fix the value of the cows? If the defender had paid L.15, 6s. the action would have been put out of Court. There are cases where it is a matter of great importance to procure delivery of the actual thing, for recovery of which, as its primary object, the action has been brought. I do not say what would be my opinion in such a case, but I think that the present is clearly a case to be decided on consideration of the money value sought by the pursuer. The explanation given by Lord Cringletie of the case of Cooper is very important.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords having heard counsel on the question which remains after the interlocutor of 13th February instant, viz., whether the advocacy can be sustained by the advocator resorting to the conclusion for delivery of the cows in question, Find that no specialties occur in this case to entitle the advocator to maintain the competency of the advocacy on that conclusion: Find the advocator liable in expenses, and modify the same," &c.

Writ—Res mercatoria—Bank Pass-book.—Held (altering judgment of Lord Ardmillan, abs. Lord Wood), that an entry in a pass-book to the credit of a depositor, duly initialed by the officers of the bank, being in re mercatoria, is a probative writ as against the bank.

JOHN RHIND, a farmer near Invergordon, had a cash account with the branch of the Commercial Bank there. Having drawn a cheque for L.50, which was dishonoured by the Bank, he raised this action against it, concluding for payment of L.66, 8s. 10d., which he alleged to be the balance due to him on his account; and he produced his pass-book, with the entries initialed by the officers of the Bank. Feb. 24, 1857.
2^d DIVISION.
Ld. Ardmillan

The Bank admitted the entries to be in the handwriting alleged, but said that by mistake a certain sum of L.80 had been entered twice over to the pursuer's credit, and that truly the pursuer was due L.13, 11s. 2d.

The entries to the pursuer's credit on the last page of his pass-book were as follows:—

" 1855.	Forward, .	L.467	2	6
June 5. Eighty pounds, . . .	A. M. G. MacG.	80	0	0
Eleven pounds, . . .	A. M. G. MacG.	11	0	0
6. Eighty pounds, . . .	A. M. G. MacG.	80	0	0
19. Twenty pounds, . . .	A. M. G. MacG.	20	0	0
July 12. Twenty-five pounds & 10d.,	A. M. G. MacG.	25	0	10"

The pursuer and defenders each gave a most minute account of what had passed between them about the time of these entries. The pursuer said he was in daily expectation of receiving from a Mr Williamson of Calrossie, near Tain, L.80, by an order through the post-office at Invergordon; and as he lived at some distance from the post-office, he mentioned to Mr M'Gregor, the accountant, and also to Mr Gauld, a clerk in the office, that he expected this remittance, and requested one of them to inquire at the post-office for the letter, to open it, and to place the amount to his credit. On the morning of the 5th June 1855, he had occasion to attend a market, and, on his way there, stopped at the Bank in Invergordon, and handed across the counter L.80 in bank notes, the size of which he specified, with the "paid-in slip" usual when money is paid, along with the pass-book, into which the amount was entered to the pursuer's credit, and the pass-book then returned to him. In the evening, when returning home, the pursuer called at the Bank a second time, and discounted a bill for L.11, 10s., which he had received at the market as the price of a cow sold by him. L.11, being the proceeds of the bill, was placed to his credit; that amount being, at the same time, entered in his pass-book as usual. On the following day, being the 6th of June, the pursuer happened to be again in the Bank, and was then informed that the order in his favour from Tain for L.80 had been received. The order was handed across the counter for the pursuer's indorsation, and the whole amount was regularly entered in his pass-book of that date.

The defenders denied the alleged payment of L.80 on the morning of the 5th June; but admitted that Mr Gauld had gone to the post-office in the evening, after the cash transactions for the day had been balanced, and got a letter to the pursuer from Mr Williamson, enclosing a remittance of L.80; and that on the same evening, after receipt of the letter, the pursuer had discounted the L.11, 10s. bill, as he alleged; and they said these two sums were then, on the 5th June 1855, and under that date, entered by the accountant in the pursuer's pass-book, the L.80 being entered first, and the L.11 last in order. In the scroll cash-book of the said Bank, these two sums are entered both under date the 6th of June, as received from the pursuer, or to his credit. In the Bank ledger, containing the pursuer's account with the Bank, the L.11 is entered first, and the L.80 last in order, to the pursuer's credit, both under date of 6th June 1855, because they had been paid into the Bank on the evening of the preceding day, after the cash had been balanced for that day.

The pursuer pleaded that the pass-book afforded sufficient evidence of his claim against the Bank, and could not be cut down otherways than scripto vel juramento; and that by producing it, he had discharged all the onus probandi which lay upon him.

The defenders pleaded, that in the circumstances the Bank pass-book did not afford sufficient evidence to substantiate the pursuer's claim; that the onus of proving his claim still lay upon him; and, at all events, that they were entitled to prove their averments prout de jure.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that this action has been instituted to enforce payment of an alleged balance, arising on an account-current with the defenders; that, in order to bring out such balance, the pursuer takes credit for two sums of L.80, said to have been paid into his account; and that the pass-book, No. 5 of process, has been produced by the pursuer to support the averments on which the action rests: Finds that the said pass-book is not per se probative and conclusive of the truth of the pursuer's averments, although it is a competent and important adminicle of evidence in support thereof: Finds that the grounds of action not being conclusively instructed by the mere production of the pass-book, the pursuer must support his claim, and the facts of the case must be investigated: Therefore repels the third plea in law for the pursuer; and appoints the pursuer to lodge such issues as he proposes within ten days.

and the defenders to lodge counter issues by the box-day in the vacation, if No. 124. so advised: Reserves all questions of expenses." *

The pursuer reclaimed. The pass-book afforded prima facie evidence of the debt. Banks were merchants, and signature of bank officials was the signature of the bank. He was, in fact, in possession of a holograph acknowledgment of his alleged debtor, which could not be redargued by parole proof, nor could it be set aside without reduction.¹

Feb. 24, 1857.
Rhind v. Commercial Bank of Scotland.

The defenders were quite willing to repeat a reduction, if their defence could not be admitted ope exceptionis. Substantial justice demanded that the Bank's averments, which truly amounted to a charge of fraud against the pursuer, should be admitted to probation. But the onus lay on the pursuer; these entries could not be dealt with as receipts, or as anything more than informal jottings. There was no decision of the Court granting the privileges of writs in re mercatoria to entries in a pass-book, without being docquetted and signed by both parties, and they were not readily to be attached to any new class of documents. But assuming that these entries were equivalent to two receipts, surely the Bank were entitled to prove that they had both been granted for the same sum of money.²

* "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary does not think that the pursuer is entitled to stand on this pass-book as conclusive proof of his claim, and excluding all inquiry into the facts.

"Apart from all agreement or explanation, the entries in the pass-book are not, na natura, necessarily probative; and the defenders' averments of fact, and particularly of error in one of these entries, in support of which they refer to the regular books of the Bank, and offer proof prout de jure, cannot, in hoc statu, be held as irrelevant.

"The pursuer, who alleges that he personally paid in both sums, is a competent witness; his own books may afford confirmation of his statements, or the reverse. The practice in regard to paid-in slips—the manner in which the pursuer spent the 5th June, as bearing on his averment of two separate visits to the Bank on that day—may all be important subjects of inquiry in the investigation which is necessary to get at the truth of the case.

"There has been no settlement or docqueting of accounts. There is no document necessarily and conclusively probative. The pass-book is admitted only under explanation, and subject to the defenders' denial of its correctness in regard to the disputed sum; and the Lord Ordinary has not been referred to any authority for the proposition maintained by the pursuer—that, under such circumstances, the pass-book must be taken pro veritate, and all investigation shut out. In the absence of direct authority applicable to the facts, the Lord Ordinary cannot hold the investigation which the defenders crave to be here excluded. An error is alleged by the Bank, and an explanation, not, perhaps, very satisfactory, but not impossible, is offered. Suppose it had been on the other side—suppose that the pursuer alleged he had paid in L.80, and only L.60 had been entered in the pass-book, while the paid-in slip supported the averment that L.80 had really been paid—could inquiry have been excluded? Suppose L.80 had been entered in the pass-book, and L.60 had appeared on the relative paid-in slip, could inquiry have been excluded? It is thought that except where the document founded on is in itself probative and conclusive, there is no rule of law to preclude an investigation into the facts where error is alleged; and since the pursuer, himself personally cognisant of the whole truth, is now a competent witness, the justice and equity of opening the door to inquiry is more abundantly manifest."

No. 124. At advising,—

Feb. 24, 1857.
Rhind v. Commercial Bank of Scotland.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In practical application this is perhaps the most important question that has ever come before the Court, and it is also one of much importance, although of no difficulty in point of principle.

The admitted facts are sufficient for the immediate decision of the case. These facts are few and simple.

The pursuer has for some years transacted business with the establishment of the Commercial Bank at Invergordon, lodging money and drawing out on the account so created. The “pursuer was, as usual, supplied with a pass-book.” Such is the admission. The bank agent is Mr Andrew Munro; the accountant is George M’Gregor. The pass-book goes back to the year 1851. When money is paid into the bank, the receipt given (and it is the only voucher given), to the pursuer, is an acknowledgment written by the bank in the pass-book, which is returned to the pursuer then or soon after, as suits the convenience of parties. That receipt bears the date of the payment of the money into the bank—the sum is written in words and in figures—both written by an officer of the bank—and then it is signed and authenticated by initials by both the bank agent and the accountant in separate columns. The only rational account of the signatures of both being adhibited is to prevent mistake; and whether de facto the agent satisfies himself that the money has been paid in by personal presence or immediate report, or by examination of the bank books, this is very clear, that to the mind of the customer the double signature—not only the accountant’s, but also that of the head officer,—is a direct representation that the latter has satisfied himself of the accuracy of the entry by the other, who probably will in general receive the money, and that the head officer therefore can issue the pass-book as a voucher of an actual deposit. What is done is not to adhibit, so far as this pass-book shows the course of procedure, the subscription of another clerk or party present, but the subscription, if at hand, of the agent, the head officer and manager of the branch agency. Then the sum so entered as deposited is written out fully in words, not in figures, and the pass-book, with such an entry so signed, is then given back to the party. Upon this principle the course of dealing with this party proceeded since the year 1851. He had no other voucher or acknowledgment from the bank as to any money deposited with them. But he was safe. The voucher is complete. The entry in the pass-book is the holograph acknowledgment of the bank. Nor is there any difference whatever in legal effect between this holograph acknowledgment, and what is termed a deposit or other receipt. The one is as complete, as a voucher, as the other, and its express declaration is, as to all substantial matters, as explicit and definite as in the case of a full receipt.

That it is signed by initials is of no importance in point of law. For, 1st, The initials are acknowledged to be those of the accountant and agent. 2d, That is the form of authenticating the vouchers given by the bank to the pursuer for a course of years, and cannot be disowned by them. 3d, Most complete and conclusive re intervenus followed during their course of dealing on this mode of subscription, and even two other deposits are made after the entry which is disputed. 4th, But the signature by initials to a holograph writing in re mercatoria, is by the law of Scotland quite sufficient, although not attested.

We had been surprised that no authority had been quoted on that point, although the cases are numerous, both as to regular deeds and as to writings in re mercatoria. The initials being acknowledged, the authentication of the voucher against the bank is complete.—Vide on this point Dickson on Evidence. The entry is not the less holograph writing of the bank that it is written by one officer, although signed by two. That point has occurred even where two separate parties, with adverse interests, had subscribed one writing—signed by both. But here the entry by a officer duly authorized, and acting within his competency and course of duty, is the proper holograph writing of the establishment. That it is also signed by another is for the protection of the bank, on the one hand, and as an additional assurance and representation, on the other hand, of the accuracy of the voucher.

In addition to this we have the course of dealing with this particular party, so the fact that, as he received in no instance any other voucher, so, on the other hand, the bank acknowledged the deposits, and, as the pass-book shows, he drew out the sums severally vouched by these entries.

In this state of facts, the bank dispute one of these entries when the pursuer No. 124. comes to claim the balance remaining due to him on the faith of these entries, after deducting the sums he has drawn out. I may here notice the attempt of the bank Feb. 24, 1857. altogether to destroy and render useless the entries so signed by the officers in the Rhind v. Commercial Bank pass-book, by trying to change the character of the book. It was said, This is of Scotland. only an account—a copy of an account from our books; accordingly, you are not claiming the L.80 vouched by this entry, but the balance of an account. This is quite futile. Of course the sums drawn out must be stated against the sums paid in, and the balance alone can be pursued for; but it is the balance arising from taking the entry in question, as well as all the others, in their proper character as vouchers for the deposit of the sums. The sums stated as drawn out are only the entries of the bank's statements, and the orders or cheques must be produced as the proper vouchers. But the other side of the pass-book is not limited to contra entries in an account. It consists of a series of separate receipts or acknowledgments, vouching, and being the only vouchers of, the sums deposited, and is exactly of the same character and effect as if a series of full receipts were written in the book when each sum had been paid in. If the pass-book had ever been intended to be merely a copy of the account in the bank books, and to be no receipt-book in favour of the depositor, why should the entries of the monies paid in by him be signed in so formal a manner by two officers of the bank, in order to be bank receipts in his favour? The effect of these entries cannot then be got rid of in this shorthand and easy way, viz. of treating it as a mere account-current, or copy of one. And, indeed, the argument of the bank on this head was quite inconsistent, for they gave up the doctrine of the Lord Ordinary, that the whole onus of proving the deposit was on the pursuer, and only contended in result that they ought to be admitted to prove in defence their averments against the receipt. But on that condition of the argument the acknowledgement is admitted to be good and effectual as a receipt until disproved; and, of course, the notion of the pass-book being merely the copy of an account at once falls to the ground. The finding in the interlocutor, which threw the whole burden of proving the deposit in support of this entry, taken as a mere adminicle of evidence, was indeed most startling; but it is unnecessary now to make any remarks on a point abandoned by the Bank. The origin of this notion of the pass-book being merely the copy of an account, is taken, I see, from the English notions as to a pass-book, which, as I shall explain, is in truth only an account, and contains no signed entries as to deposits.

Then we are brought to the effect of this holograph receipt delivered by the Bank, in an action for payment of the sum due to the pursuer, whether claiming that sum, or the amount remaining due, giving effect to that and other entries.

It may be a very important consideration in other proceedings, in regard to the character of such a voucher, what shall be the effect of such an acknowledgment if produced and shown to a third party, as proving the depositor's credit at the Bank, and as the foundation on which an onerous transaction was completed. No doubt there another onerous party is brought in; but if effectual to entitle him to rely upon the sum or sums so vouched being at the time in the bank, it might not be immaterial to consider whether such result (if the true result of the entries) would not proceed wholly on the character of the writings as deposit-receipts.

But merely glancing at that point, it is unnecessary to take it into consideration in the present action for payment.

It is now admitted that the depositor is not, in the first instance, under any burden of supporting the acknowledgment by proof of the payment. Then, on what principle is effect to be given to the voucher to that extent? Plainly on the ground that it is a voucher or receipt for the deposit of money; and if so, then the question is merely, whether it is a complete and sufficient voucher, in the simple action to enforce payment. Now, as I have said, it has every requisite for such; and it was delivered as complete and binding.

Then the principle on which all banking is carried on is, that the Bank acknowledges that they have at the credit of their customers the sums for which they have granted their receipts, and that they are to honour orders on his account to such amount. On the faith of such being the result all banking business proceeds,

But the defendants contend that such receipts are binding on them to the effect

No. 124. of enforcing payment in the first instance ; because they undertake, in defence, to show by their own books, and the evidence of their own officers—that is, of themselves—that they made a mistake in writing out that acknowledgment, and that they did not receive any such sum. Collusion between the pursuers and any of their officers they do not pretend. Neither do they allege any fraud or false representation or deception practised on their officers, whereby they or either of them were induced and misled into making this entry. They simply propose, in the way I have mentioned, ope exceptionis, to resist payment. Whether they would contend that such a plea would be good against a third party bringing an order, onerously obtained, for an amount due according to the tenor and result of the vouchers in the pass-book, we have not heard.

Feb. 24, 1857.
Rhind v. Commercial Bank
of Scotland.

But in the actual case, as between a customer and the Bank, the latter are precluded by their own writ from resisting payment on any such defence as that stated on this record. I hold the document to be a complete acknowledgment that they hold for the pursuer, and must pay the money so vouched as received and held by them for him ; against which writ by themselves, of so important and emphatic a character, it is not competent for them to plead, ope exceptionis, their own mistake, and to refer to their own books, and the evidence of their own officers, to prove mistakes. Whether, contrary to the law of England on this very point, and contrary to our law, the Bank can refer to their own books in any other proceedings, I need not at present consider.

The result is, that in this action they must pay in terms of their receipt.

I may add, that any such defence is, in my opinion, even less competent against such entries made in a pass-book—when the whole comes on each occasion under the sight and review of both the officers, and their attention is called both to each entry, and also to the state of the account—than it would be as to a single and separate deposit-receipt, as to which I can understand a case of mistake being more plausibly averred than in regard to separate acknowledgments written in a pass-book, the whole entries in which can at all times be examined ; and, indeed, each time any money is drawn out, the attention of the officers ought and must be directed to the state of the balance according to all the entries. Two entries of deposits are made after the one averred to be a mistake, before it is pretended that such mistake was discovered,—one on the 19th of June, the other on the 12th July—while sums are drawn out and entered in the pass-book by the Bank on seven occasions up to the 21st July. The matter might have gone to the end of the year, or to the balancing of the bank books.

It is unnecessary at present to consider whether the non-accounting to the Bank of the money acknowledged may not be either the mistake or the dishonesty of the officer, rather than the more remarkable sort of mistake in both officers signing the receipt for payment ; or whether the evidence of the Bank themselves, by their own book, or by their own officers, can be, in any form, available against their own regular writ.

In this action they must pay. But I would reserve to the Bank to institute any action they may be advised to adopt for cutting down or setting aside, in any form, the receipt in question, with the defences against the same, and reserving to the Bank, in the event of success, to seek restitution of the sum, for which at present decree must be given ; or the Bank may, if they choose, refer to oath.

Of course, if they had produced a plain written acknowledgment by the pursuer that he had not paid in the sum in question, his action would have been at an end.

In conclusion, I have only to add, that I was not able to understand what character and effect the defenders ascribed to the holograph entry in the pass-book, when they abandoned the broad ground taken by the Lord Ordinary, that the onus of proving the payment in support of that entry lay on the pursuer. When that ground is laid aside, then the writing must be looked to in reference to its import. Now, it is an express acknowledgment, duly authenticated, of money received by the Bank and held for the pursuer. It is their writ to that effect. And then, on the clearest principles of law, they must cut down that writ. Until they do so it is effectual.

The Bank are judges of their own interest, and if they wish, distrusting the accuracy of their branch agencies, to make out that they are only due the sums admitted in their own books, and to shake themselves free of all the receipts in all their pass-books, they may in one sense have an interest, as it was said, to raise this question. But I doubt whether other banks will thank them for stirring such a point, unless, indeed, it leads depositors to resort to the banks which admit the validity of the receipts in the pass-books. We have understood that in England, of late years, they have been trying to introduce the Scotch principles of banking. In this instance the defenders seem to have got some glimmering views of the practice in the English banks in regard to pass-books, and to wish to take the origin and character of their pass-books, without being aware of the effect in England even of the unsigned entries in such pass-books of monies paid into the bank.

LORD MURRAY.—I entirely agree with your Lordship in thinking that this is one of the most important cases that has occurred since I sat here.

The first point here is the pass-book, of which we have a printed excerpt. That is admitted to be the book of the Bank delivered by them as a pass-book. Secondly, the sums paid in are written in words, and there is also a column in which they are in figures. Now I never saw sums written in words except where they are intended to be receipts. Thirdly, they are initialed by the Bank officials. Fourthly, there is no allegation on the part of the Bank that there was any forgery or fraud committed in regard to this book. Well, these are the facts. There is only one point on which parties differ, and that is as to a sum of L.80 duly entered there, and entered in words. The Bank say it was never received at all: they allege no dishonesty, but a mistake. Well, what is the law in regard to such documents? It is well stated by Mr Bell in his Commentaries, third edition, published in 1819, p. 305. He there says that mercantile writs are privileged, and in the fifth edition he says, subscription by initials or a mark is enough. There can be no dispute that this is the law of Scotland, and has been so ever since 1624, if we may trust the case of Ramsay v. Hay, reported by Durie, of 17th July of that year. (Mor. Dict., 16,245.) It will not be denied that this is a very common kind of transaction, not a day passing without some hundreds of such entries being made. Now that being the case, I wonder at the Bank stirring the question;—of course the Bank know their own interest best, but I should not like to deal with a bank if they dispute a receipt signed by their own officers, and say it was a mistake, and they are not bound by it. Many very large sums are sent up by clerks and servants, and when the book is brought back, signed by initials, everything is considered right. I think the law is clear. It is stated by Bell, and is confirmed by the practice of the country for a very long period; and, in truth, the practice secures every efficiency consistent with extreme despatch. I consider this entry just as good a receipt as a bond or bill. There may be grounds for setting it aside, but as it stands it seems to me as good a receipt as any other, and is as much entitled to efficacy.

In these circumstances, I am at no loss what decision we ought to give, and I entirely agree with your Lordship. I think the Court have no choice left but to give effect to this document.

LORD WOOD absent.

LORD COWAN.—The Lord Ordinary has found that the document produced by the pursuer is a mere adminicle of evidence in support of his claim; that it is not proof by writ of the debt claimed, requiring to be redargued by writ or oath; but that he is bound to take a general issue of resting-owing, leaving the defenders, if they choose, to take a counter issue.

I cannot acquiesce in that view of the pursuer's legal position under this record.

The action, although concluding for a balance of account, resolves into a special claim on the part of the pursuer for a sum of L.80, paid into the Bank on the 6th June 1855; and the whole averments and pleas in the record relate to the verity of that claim. In support of it reference is made to the entry in his pass-book of that date, in the handwriting of the accountant of the Bank, of L.80, placed to the credit of the pursuer, and to which are adhibited the subscriptions, by initials, both of the accountant and of the agent of the Bank. This entry occurs in a pass-book, which has been current between the pursuer and the Bank since 1851. A multitude of similar entries are contained in the book, which bears to have been periodically ~~initialed~~, but not docketed, in October of each year.

The ~~genuineness~~ of the entry is not disputed. On the contrary, the subscription

No. 124. of the Bank officials by initials is admitted; and the defence is rested on the entry in the pass-book having been made by mistake. It is alleged to have been a double entry of a sum of L.80, entered as received on the 5th June 1855; and various statements are made to show at once the probability of this alleged mistake, and the fraud attempted to be practised by the pursuer, in standing upon the receipt of the Bank officials as establishing the truthfulness of his claim.

of Scotland.

This defence it was proposed at the hearing to establish by proof under an issue to be taken by the defenders. It was allowed that the onus at least lay upon them, the interlocutor to that extent being admittedly erroneous. But I concur with your Lordships in holding that such an issue ought not to be given under this record, and that the case stated is competent only by way of reduction.

Had it been proposed to support the defence by repeating a reduction in initio litis, there might have been room for allowing the investigation to proceed under the reduction as the leading process. But no such action has even yet been raised, and although the summons was brought into Court in October 1855, it is only at the last stage of these proceedings that the proposal is made, that this action should be sisted to enable the Bank to set aside the written evidence of the pursuer's claim by reductive process. I am very clear that this proposal ought not to be acceded to, and that the pursuer is entitled to have the effect of the entry in his pass-book now disposed of by the Court.

On the important question as to the legal import and effect of this pass-book entry, I cannot view it otherwise than as in all respects tantamount to a written acknowledgment of the sum having been received by the Bank in deposit, and for which they must account when demanded. The words can bear no other construction than what imports an acknowledgment of debt under the hands of the bank officials—equally effectual as the more formal deposit-receipt given to customers who have no pass-book.

The full subscriptions of the agent and accountant are not annexed to the entry; but their initials are admitted; and that this is the usual mode adopted by them for instructing such receipts by the Bank is not only not disputed, but is shown beyond contradiction by this very pass-book. That initials, in such circumstances, are equivalent to full subscription cannot be doubted. There are many decisions to that effect; and it was no part of the argument of the defenders to dispute that proposition.

What is contended for is, that this is not a formal acknowledgment of a loan of money, entitled to effect as such, but a mere jotting or memorandum, not affording per se evidence of the money having been received, but requiring to be supported aliunde. The answer to this appears to me conclusive, that this writing—for it is the written acknowledgment of the payment, and the only one received by the Bank customer—is a privileged writ as in re mercatoria.

It was said that this character of such entries, initialed though they be by the officials of the bank, has never received the sanction of express decision. I do not think it has ever previously been disputed. This may account for the absence of express decision. But if the doctrine of privileged writ, on account of the matter about which it is granted being in re mercatoria, is to be recognised at all, it appears to me to apply here. Mr Bell treats of the subject in these terms.—Bell's Com. i. 325.

It seems to me that these entries in pass-books are in every respect equivalent to deposit-receipts. Some of the customers of banks have not numerous transactions and they take separate receipts; others have so many that in place of formal receipts they have current pass-books; but the same principles are applicable to both classes of vouchers. The deposit-receipt is not probative under the Act 1681, any more than the pass-book, and they may just as well be disputed on the ground of mistake. All receipts in the pass-book are vouched by the bank officers, and the customers are entitled to rely on them as no less effectual than the more formal but no less improbativ deposit-receipt.

The defence is not that the sum has been paid. It is against the constitution of the claim altogether, on the ground that the entry is a mistake, and that the receipt is nothing. It is this which gives its great importance to the case. Is this pass-book receipt to be dealt with as evidence of a payment to the Bank till it is redargued habili modo? That is the only question we have to decide; and no other principle can be applied to it than if the payment had been vouched by a deposit-receipt. No. 124.

Caledonian
Railway Co.
v. Lockhart.

The distinction taken is, that the entries in pass-books are only one side of the account between the Bank and their customer, while deposit-receipts are evidence of specific payments. To this there are two answers. 1. In one sense this may be so, but the entries in the pass-book are all vouched in writing, and the customer is entitled to rely on them as evidence of the sums paid in by him to the bank. And as to the other side of the account, the entries there are supported by vouchers, which will receive their legitimate effect when produced at the periodical settlement and interchange of vouchers. But, 2. This plea is inapplicable to the pleadings in the case. The defence is not payment or counter entries in account. The objection is to the constitution of the claim altogether.

Had written evidence against this entry been recovered, or proposed to be recovered, that would have been another case; but are we to hold this receipt not entitled to any effect? I think it clear, that in the absence of written evidence, or of an offer to prove it a mistake by the oath of the pursuer, the pass-book must be taken hoc statu as good evidence of the debt. I express no opinion on the relevancy of the statements here made to reduce this receipt. There may be grounds or not; I would only say, if there be such grounds, either on the head of essential error or fraud, that is a matter which can only be brought before us in a reclusion.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I may state that, in the preface to the fourth edition of Mr Bell's Commentaries, he expresses his obligation to my father, the late President. It so happened, that during the preparation of this edition Mr Bell was staying for a month with him, and they went over every page of the work, and every statement has their joint authority.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Alter the interlocutor complained of: Find, in point of law, that the claim insisted on in this action is legally and sufficiently proved, and must be given effect to in this action: Find that no defence relevant to be proponed in this action has been stated on record: Therefore, repel the defences: Find that the defenders are liable in payment of the sum concluded for in this action; and therefore decern against the defenders for payment of the sum of L.66, 8s. 10d. sterling, with interest due thereon, in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Find the defenders liable in expenses," &c.

Arbitration—Submission—Statute 8 Vict. c. 19, sec. 35.—A submission was entered into between an heir of entail and a railway company to assess the value of land required for railway purposes—to fix the intersectional and other damage to land—to determine the sum of money for injury to the amenity of the mansion-house—the value of wood and the construction of various works. The submission proceeded on the narrative of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, and contained a declaration that the arbiter should conduct the proceedings "in strict conformity with the rules and regulations under the provisions and conditions specified in the foresaid Act, and of the Acts 8 & 9 Vict. cap. 17 and cap. 33." The statute provides (sec. 24) that a submission under the Act shall not fall by the death of either of the parties; and (sec. 35) that if decree is not pronounced within three months from the date of the submission, "the question of compensation shall be settled by the verdict of a jury." Decree was not pronounced within the statutory period, and the submission was prorogated by joint minute to the day of . . . ceeded with, on the ground that the above minute rendered it no longer a statutory but a common law submission, which therefore fell by the death of either of the parties. The note was refused. The submission was proceeded with, and interim and final decrees pronounced. In a reduction of these decrees at the instance of the railway company;—Held (1.) that the judgment in the Bill-chamber was not res judicata in an action of reduction; (2.) that the submission was statutory in so far as it was to be conducted according to the statutory procedure; but that in so far as the parties had themselves modified the provision, limiting its endurance to three months, it was a submission at common law, embodying some though not all of the statutory provisions. Therefore, that it did not fall by the death of one of the parties, and was not reducible by reason of the proceedings not being conducted in strict conformity with the statute—(diss. Lord Deas).

Opinion, that the submission was statutory; and Observed, that the minute of prorogation left it in doubt whether it was intended to constitute a common law submission, adopting some of the provisions of the statute, or to engraft certain common law provisions upon an existing statutory submission, and also to what extent the common law was to regulate and to what extent the statute, which was a sufficient reason for holding that neither the one thing nor the other had been effectually done.

THE late Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart of Carnwath, Lee, and Covington, died in 1849. This action was directed by the Caledonian Railway Company against the present Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart, the heir of entail in possession of the estates of Carnwath, Lee, and Covington, and also against the trustees and executors of the late Baronet. It concluded for reduction of two decreets-arbitral, pronounced in an arbitration entered into between the late Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart and the pursuers to Lavid Low, Professor of Agriculture in the University of Edinburgh.

The first article of the pursuer's revised condescendence was as follows.—The line of the Caledonian Railway passes through and intersects the lands and estates of Carnwath, Lee, and Covington, in the county of Lanark which belonged to the late Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart, Baronet; and in order to the formation of the Railway and works connected therewith, it became necessary for the pursuers to acquire certain portions of these estates. They accordingly, in terms of the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act 1845, and in the manner thereby prescribed gave notice to the said deceased Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart, the heir of entail in possession, of their intention to take and acquire certain portions of the said lands and estates, as particularly described in the notice and relative plans delivered to him, for the purposes of the Caledonian Railway Act. And they further required from him the particulars of his interest in the said lands so to be taken, and of the claims made by him in respect thereof.

Article second was as follows:—In obedience to this requisition, the late Sir Norman gave in a claim detailing the compensation claimed by him in respect of the taking of the said lands, and for the damage done by severance, with other claims. The pursuers having declined to pay the amount of compensation claimed, and being unable to come to any agreement with Sir Norman on the subject, an arrangement was entered into for having the claims of Sir Norman disposed of by arbitration.

The deed of submission, after designing the parties, being the pursuers and the late Sir Norman, was as follows:—“That is to say, the said parties considering that by the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act 1845 entitled ‘An Act for consolidating in one Act certain provisions usually inserted in Acts authorising the taking of land for undertakings of a public nature in Scotland,’ which is incorporated in and forms part of the Caledonian Act, it is enacted that, subject to the provisions of the said Act, it shall be lawful for the promoters of the undertaking to agree with the owners &c.; and that if no agreement be come to between the promoters of the undertaking and the owners of or parties by the said Acts enabled to sell or convey any lands taken or required for, or injuriously affected by the execution of the undertaking, or any interest in such lands as to the value of such lands or of any interest therein, or as to the compensation to be made in respect thereof, it shall be lawful for the parties to refer the same to arbitration, &c. &c. Therefore the said Caledonian Railway Company and the said Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart have submitted and referred, and hereby submit and refer to the amicable decision, final sentence, and decret-arbitral of David Low, professor of agriculture in the University of Edinburgh, as sole arbiter mutually chosen by the said parties, all claims for the value of said lands and others to be taken, used, and occupied by the said Caledonian Railway Company, and in general all claims or demands whatever competent to the said Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart against the said Caledonian Railway Company, by or in consequence of the said Caledonian Railway Company making, using, or injuring any part of the said lands for the said railway, or the works or operations of the said Railway Company, in any manner of way whatever, in so far as may be authorised by the foresaid Acts, including accesses and every other claim competent to him against the said Company: Declaring that the said arbiter shall conduct the proceedings to follow hereon, and determine the matters hereby submitted to him, in strict conformity with the rules and regulations under the provisions and conditions specified in the foresaid Act, and of the Acts 8th & 9th Vict. cap. 17 and cap. 33; and the said parties consent to the registration hereof, and of the interim and final decret-arbitral to follow hereon, in the books of Council and Session, and others competent, that letters of horning on six days charge, and all other execution, may pass on a decret to be interponed hereto, in form as follows," &c.

The deed of arbitration was subscribed by Sir Norman, and by Mr D. Rankine, on behalf of the Caledonian Company, as secretary.

The arbiter accepted of the submission on 19th March 1846, and appointed questions and answers, with the plans of the line of railway and grounds to be intersected by the railway, to be lodged with him.

The 35th section provides, that "if, when the matter shall have been referred to arbitration, the arbiter or their umpires shall for three months have failed to make their or his award, the question of such compensation shall be settled by the verdict of a jury."

No award was pronounced in the submission entered into between Sir Norman and the Railway Company within the statutory period of three months. The submission was repeatedly prorogated first by letters or missives of the agents, and then by the following formal minute, dated 6th and 7th November 1846 :—"We, the parties to the within submission, consider that it has been already prorogated from time to time, conform to letters addressed to the arbiter by our agents on our behalf respectively, dated 20th and 22d May, 1st June, 18th of July, and 5th day of October last respectively; and also considering that it is necessary again to prorogate the said submission, and that we have agreed that the arbiter shall have power to prorogate the same in future as hereinafter set forth; do hereby prorogate the time for determining the matter submitted, to the day of _____, and of new submit to the arbiter within named the whole matters raised under the within submission; and whatever the said arbiter shall determine in the premises, in whole or in part, by interim or final decret-arbitral to be pronounced by him within the above period, or on or before any other day to which he may prorogate the submission, which he is hereby empowered to do at pleasure, both parties bind and oblige themselves to acquiesce in and fulfil to each other under the penalty within expressed; and we do hereby homologate and confirm the prorogations granted by our agents respectively above referred to." Mr Rankine subscribed this minute on behalf of the Railway Company as treasurer.

The arbiter thereafter subscribed minutes bearing to prorogate the submission on the 4th November 1847, the 31st October 1848, and the 17th October 1849. In each case the period was prorogated "to the day of next."

On the 22d January 1848, after various proceedings in the submission and notes issued of his views regarding the compensation to be awarded, the arbiter pronounced an interim decret-arbitral, whereby he awarded L.6000 against the pursuers, and also disposed of certain portions of Sir Norman's claim as to accesses or other works. The draft of this interim decret was submitted to the agents for the parties, who suggested various remarks or alterations.

On 9th May 1849, Sir Norman Lockhart died. The tutors of the deceased Sir Norman, and the trustees and executors of the late Sir Norman, the proposed to sist themselves as parties to the submission, which the pursuers opposed on the ground that the submission had fallen by Sir Norman's death. This objection was over-ruled by the arbiter, who sisted the tutors and trustees, and appointed the decret-arbitral to be completed. The pursuers thereupon presented a note of suspension and interdict, in which they pleaded that no award or decret-arbitral having been pronounced and delivered by the arbiter in the submission within three months of its being entered into, nor within three months from the date of the minute of prorogation at renewal, the submission, in terms of the 35th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, had fallen and become inoperative. Farther, that the submission by the various prorogations, and more particularly by the minute prorogating to the day of next, and giving the arbiter power to prorogate at pleasure, was taken out of the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act, and became a submission, subject to the rules of common law, and fell by the death of Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart.

The Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Fullerton) refused the note, and his judgment was adhered to by the Judges of the Second Division on 12th December 1849.¹

On 20th June 1850 thereafter, the arbiter issued his final decret-arbitral. In that decret-arbitral there is the following passage:—"In respect of the sums found due by this and my interim decret-arbitral aforesaid, including inter alia the sum of L.4000 awarded to the said deceased Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart, as compensation for the damages occasioned to his property by the operations of the said Company in carrying their line of railway across the valley of the Clyde, I find that the said Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart, and the succeeding heirs of entail, shall relieve the said Railway Company of any claims which his present tenants, whose farms are intersected by the said railway, may be enabled to establish against the said Company in consequence of their said operations, to the extent of the interest accruing on the said sum of L.4000 from and after the date hereof, calculated at the rate of 3½ per cent per annum, but under deduction of the sum of L.16, 4s. per annum, included in the abatement of L.49, 15s. allowed by Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart to the tenant of Wester Pitts, in terms of my said interim decret-arbitral; and I decern accordingly."

In these circumstances the pursuers brought this reduction of the interim and final decreets. They set forth the above facts, and detailed the pro-

dures which had taken place before the arbiter. Their pleas in law were as follows:—

"1st, The arbitration and alleged prorogation thereof being informal, and not duly stamped or authenticated or authorised by the shareholders, are not binding on the Company.

v. Lockhart.

"2d, The arbitration cannot be held as statutory, or protected by the provisions of the statute—(1.) Because the subject of the submission goes beyond the matters as to which arbiters are empowered to decide under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act, and the arbiter did truly deal with such matters. (2.) Because a statutory arbitration terminates by the lapse of the periods prescribed by the Act for disposal of the case, with or without the prorogations rendered competent by statute. An attempt to give an arbiter a power of indefinite prorogation constitutes a new and different kind of arbitration from that which the statute renders competent, and if effectual deprives the proceeding of its statutory character.

"3d, If, on the other hand, the arbitration is to be held as statutory, it fell by the lapse of the statutory period, and the case, under the peremptory provisions of the 35th section, fell to be disposed of by a jury.

"4th, If regarded otherwise than as a statutory arbitration, it fell by the death of Sir Norman Lockhart, one of the parties submitters, and the whole subsequent proceedings were null and void.

"5th, A refusal of a suspension and interdict in the Bill-Chamber forms res judicata as to the merits of the case in which the interdict has been effectually craved.

"6th, Upon the assumption that the arbitration was statutory, the decret-arbitral is otherwise void and null,—In particular, because (1.) It was ultra vires and incompetent for the arbiter to proceed by way of interim and final decrees-arbitral: it was incompetent to pronounce any interim decret-arbitral. (2.) It was farther ultra vires and incompetent for the arbiter, under the arbitration or the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act, to give decree for damages entirely prospective and contingent. (3.) It was farther ultra vires and incompetent for him to give decree in favour of Sir Norman Lockhart for damages which were assumed as likely to be incurred by tenants whose lands were not traversed by the railway, and who were not parties to the submission, and which were also of the nature of prospective and unascertained damage; and these damages being inseparably mixed up with the damages payable to the defenders, the award is bad in toto. (4.) It was farther incompetent to order the execution of works, or to enforce their execution by pecuniary penalties for their non-execution. (5.) It was farther incompetent to decern for sums without discriminating and specifying the parties who were to take under the decree.

"7th, The decrees are farther reducible as having proceeded from corrupt partiality and bias, and being in direct opposition to the truth and to the evidence led and adduced in the case, and the proceedings having been regularly and incompetently conducted.

"8th, Generally, the grounds of reduction being well founded, decreets are to be pronounced in terms of the conclusions of the action."

The defenders pleaded;—"1. The judgment in the suspension and interdict forms res judicata against the pursuers, in so far as they now seek to re-plead the points decided by the Court in the suspension and interdict. The pursuers have not set forth any facts relevant or sufficient to support challenge of the decret-arbitral on any of the grounds pleaded or indicated in their pleas in law. 3. In particular, the pursuers have failed to aver or substantiate either that the arbiter exceeded his powers, or that any of the proceedings are incompetent under the submission. 4. There exist no valid grounds, either in fact or in law, for setting aside the decret-arbitral now challenged."

No. 125. The Lord Ordinary, on 14th July 1854, pronounced an interlocutor, reporting the case to the Lords of the First Division.*

Feb. 25, 1857.

Caledonian
Railway Co.
v. Lockhart.

* "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary has thought it fitting to report this case to the Inner House. The pursuers seek substantially a review of a decision in a suspension brought by them several years ago, having agitated the same point of law in the reduction since raised. They contend it is open to them to do this, as an interlocutor in a suspension does not form a res judicata. And perhaps they are right in this as a general proposition, though it may require consideration whether, under the circumstances of this case, where the only point in the suspension was that now attempted to be revived in the reduction, they are not disentitled from questioning it as being a concluded issue between the parties. The pursuers might, it is conceived, have carried the judgment in the suspension before the highest tribunal whereas they submitted. The point was as purely raised in the suspension as it is now stated in the reduction.

"If, however, the pursuers shall be held as not foreclosed by the result of the suspension, the question they renew is one with which the Lord Ordinary, after due consideration, has thought it scarcely suitable for a single Judge to deal; for the dispute the law laid down in the suspension on the ground of a judgment of the House of Lords in a later case between other parties, which they represent as overruling the principles of the decision in the suspension.

"There are other grounds of reduction pleaded to upset the decree-arbitral but they can scarcely be separated from the objection to the validity of the submission itself and its continuing in force, which were the precise points adjudicated in the suspension. Unless the pursuers should be now successful in obtaining a decision on these points in this reduction, in disregard of the law laid down by the Court in determining the process of suspension, it is thought that the decree-arbitral is not open to any formidable ground of challenge on the objections which otherwise are stated to it.

"The circumstances of the case are shortly as follows:—The Caledonian Railway Company, before entering upon the lands of Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart, entered into a submission with him to Professor Low as sole arbiter. The subject-matter of submission are stated in very wide terms, comprehending all claims and demands whatever competent to Sir Norman against the Company, including accessions. It was declared that the arbiter shall conduct the proceedings and determine all matters submitted to him in strict conformity with the rules and regulations and provisions and conditions contained in the Lands Clauses Act and Railway Clauses Act. Power is given to pronounce interim or final decrees-arbitral. There was no specified term of duration of the submission. It was treated as falling under the three months clause, and was prorogated or extended by the parties for successive periods of three months or under, till a general prorogation was executed by the parties to the day of the death of Sir Norman, and a power of further prorogation bestowed on the arbiter himself. This he exercised, continuing the submission till he had pronounced an interim and final decree-arbitral. The first was issued before the death of Sir Norman, the latter after that event.

"The Company attempted to break up the submission on Sir Norman's death and raised this dilemma:—that it must be held to be either a statutory arbitral or one at common law;—if the former, it was invalid by reason of the proceedings not having been brought to a close within the statutory period, treating the prorogations as absolutely null, being unauthorised by the statute;—and if treated as an ordinary submission at common law, it had fallen by the death of one of the parties. In either view, they pleaded that the submission had come to an end. They presented a note of suspension against the submission being proceeded with, and took judgment upon these points.

"Their note was refused by Lord Fullerton, whose interlocutor was adhered to by the Inner House.

"The pleas thus disposed of by a deliberate judgment are attempted to be revived in this process. The encouragement to it is a case determined in the House of Lords in 1850. The circumstances of that case—the Glasgow Barrhead and Newton Railway Company v. the Nitshill Coal Company—are, as the Lord Ordinary thinks, very different from the present. The judgment of this Court was reversed.

No. 125.

Caledonian
Railway Co.
v. Lockhart.

On 26th May 1855,¹ the Court repelled the plea of res judicata, in so far as the pleas disposed of in the Bill-Chamber were now revived in this action of reduction. The pursuers now farther pleaded :—(1), That this was not a statutory submission. The subject matter of reference was not merely compensation in the ordinary sense of the term, but also every other claim competent to Sir Norman Lockhart under the Act of Parliament. Now an important class of claims was for accommodation works. Such claims were not disposed of by the statute in the same way as claims for compensation. The Sheriff was constituted the proper judge in the matter, to whom alone parties were by the statute directed to resort. The defenders themselves, in art. 1 of their revised statement, described the submission in question as embracing, (1.) Sums for land taken from the estates of Carnwath, Lee, and Covington; (2.) Sums on account of intersectional and other damages due to land; (3.) A sum for injury to the amenity of the mansion-house of Carnwath; (4.) Value of wood; and lastly, The construction of various works, such as roads, bridges, accesses, and embankments, required to be executed by the pursuers for the proper use and protection of Sir Norman's grounds.

That was a description of accommodation works. The submission was entered into for determining that claim. Therefore it was a submission not to determine compensation merely, but also accommodation works. Again, art. 3, the defenders stated that "the nature of the claim, and course of procedure under the submission, were such as necessarily required a considerable period of time;" and again, in art. 5, "The very purpose of the agreement and power thereby conferred upon the arbiter was to continue to enable him to continue the submission until the whole matter referred should be finally determined."

The next question was, whether an heir of entail could enter into an

the appeal was argued on grounds different from those pleaded in this Court, arising from the reports of the case in the Session Reports and Scottish Jurist. The reversal proceeded on the arbitration being held to be purely under the statute; (2) the oversman was not duly appointed;—it being held that the prorogation of the parties was to be viewed as a renewed submission, and while it renewed the powers of the arbiters, could not revive the previous appointment by the arbiters of an oversman, which was to be done by a new act of the arbiters themselves, under renewed powers. These were the special points on which the reversal was based. But in moving the judgment, views were expressed regarding submissions entered into under the Railway Acts, of more general application, and which of course must be received with the utmost deference.

This reversal was brought under the notice of the First Division in a suspension—the Dundee Perth and Aberdeen Railway Company v. Sir John Richardson, in which it was founded on to affect the validity of the submission and decree entered into in that case. The Court held it to have no application, on the ground of the strictly statutory character of the Nitshill arbitration; while in Sir John Richardson's case the submission was considered as being in the ordinary terms, though by declaration of parties there was imported into it all the statutory effects entered into under the Lands Clauses and Railway Clauses Acts. The judgment of the Court, however, may be held to have rested on acts of homologation and acquiescence in the decree-arbitral after it had been pronounced. The difficulty in the present case, as the Lord Ordinary apprehends, lies in the terms of the submission itself being apparently statutory and being treated as such by the early prorogation or renewals, till there was afterwards grafted upon it powers of prorogation proper only, as is conceived, to the ordinary common law submission. What this shall be held to have effected in its character, appears to the Lord Ordinary, with all humility, to be a question, regard being given to the Nitshill case, ought to be brought directly under consideration of the Inner House,—and abstains from expressing any opinion of his own."

arbitration for the purpose of determining matter of compensation, except a statutory arbitration; and, (2), whether he could enter into any arbitration whatever in reference to accommodation works. He could do neither. By the common law, an heir of entail could not dispose of any portion of his estate, and therefore, by the common law, the Railway Company could not pass through his estate. But the statute interposed, and conferred authority upon them to take land from entailed estates, and empowered heirs of entail to sell portions of their land for the purposes of the Railway. The conditions upon which that capacity was given must be strictly construed. Therefore, if the pursuer's construction of the statute be right, and if this be not a statutory but a common law submission, then no farther argument was required to establish the soundness of the reasons on which the present reduction was founded.¹

The defenders now admitted that the submission was not statutory, but pleaded:—That it was competent for the parties to a common law submission to import into it the machinery of the Lands Clauses Act, for the purpose of regulating the proceedings. Nothing more had been done in the present instance. The parties had imported the machinery under the statute to a certain extent, but not so absolutely as to make an absolute adherence to its form of procedure imperative. Thus the limited endurance of a submission to three months was dispensed with, and the submission, therefore, being of that mixed nature, was not open to the technical objections now taken to it.

As to the objection founded on Sir Norman's position as an heir of entail, that was a plea which was competent to the succeeding heir of entail, to which he, having waived, the pursuers had no title to adopt.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case we formerly disposed of the fifth plea stated by the pursuers—that is the plea as to the judgment in the Bill-Chamber being judicata in this case. The first, the seventh, and the eighth pleas we have heard nothing about, and I presume they are merely formal, and are not now insisted on. All the others remain.

This is an action of reduction at the instance of the Caledonian Railway Company, directed against the representatives of the late Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart; and the pursuers call for production of two decreets-arbitral, one dated January 1848, which is an interim decree-arbitral, and the other, which is a final decree-arbitral, dated 20th June 1850. These decreets were pronounced by Professor Low, under a submission entered into in 1846 between the Caledonian Railway and Sir N. M. Lockhart, who was then alive. Sir Norman died after the interim decree-arbitral was pronounced, but before the final decree-arbitral was pronounced. His representatives had assisted themselves as parties to the proceedings before the final decree had been pronounced. This action is now brought to reduce and set aside these decreets.

It appears that the Caledonian Railway Company acquired certain portions of lands belonging to Sir Norman Lockhart. It is stated in article 1 of the purchase deed, that they gave the requisite notices of their intention to take the land, and required from Sir Norman the particulars of his interests, and of the claims made by him in respect thereof. Sir Norman, in compliance with the regulation, gave in a claim; but the pursuers having declined to give compensation claimed by him, an arrangement was entered into by which the claim was disposed of by arbitration. By a submission entered into, various matters were referred to Professor Low. It was a condition as to the proceedings being conducted in terms of the Lands Clauses Act. In the course of the proceedings there were several decrees pronounced; and, in particular, a minute of proceedings was passed, in which it was decided that the pursuers were entitled to the land; and, in particular, a minute of proceedings was passed, in which it was decided that the pursuers were entitled to the land.

the arbiter to prorogate the submission was signed in November 1856. Interim decree-arbitral was pronounced after various proceedings, and after various orders, by Professor Low, and bears date 22d January 1848. It appoints a certain sum to be paid in a certain way. In 1849 Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart died. His representatives proposed to sist themselves at that stage of the proceedings; but the Caledonian Railway Company interposed, and refused to allow the submission to proceed, and presented a note of suspension against the proceedings, on the ground that the submission had fallen. That note was refused, and is the note referred to in the fifth plea in law for the pursuers, which I have already mentioned.

In 1850 Professor Low pronounced his final decree, in which it is said that certain of the findings are on matters not submitted to him; and which it was therefore not within his power to decide.

This summons of reduction was raised in March 1852. Among the grounds of reduction argued, there was one to this effect, that in this case the submission, if it was not a submission precisely in terms of the statute, and conducted in exact conformity with the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act, was an incompetent proceeding, inasmuch as Sir Norman, as an heir of entail, was under disability under the statute, and had no power to agree to the price of land to be taken, except either under a submission conducted in terms of the Lands Clauses Act, or by a jury, or by certain valuers to be appointed, in terms of the statute, to fix the amount of the price. That the proceedings here were not proceedings in terms of the Lands Clauses Act at all; that there was no verdict of a jury, and no valuation; and therefore that the whole proceedings were null and void, on the ground of Sir Norman being an heir of entail under disability. A proposal was made at the debate to insert a plea in law to that effect, on the assumption that the statements in the record were sufficient to bring out the facts, and that all that was wanting was a plea in law applicable to them. I think that after the course this case has taken, it is out of the question to admit any such plea; and I am of opinion that there is no ground of reduction founded on the disability of Sir Norman to be a party to the submission. I shall not detain your Lordships by examining the statements on record. They are not calculated to lay a foundation for such a plea; but they are not here in form as a ground of reduction, and that part of the argument I hold to be out of the case which we are called on to decide.

Being of that opinion in regard to what is not before us, I do not express any opinion on what would be the merits of such a ground of reduction if it were here, nor do I hold that the pursuers are excluded from afterwards founding upon it. I pronounce no opinion at all, and do not wish to be misunderstood as expressing aught on the one side or the other. I do not say that I have no opinion, but I do not express it. Neither is it pleaded as a ground of reduction, that the Railway Company have no power to settle the price of land taken by them by any kind of arbitration except an arbitration in terms of the statute. I pronounce no opinion on that point. Such a plea might perhaps amount to a repudiation of a great deal done by the Railway Company in this submission. Although I may have an opinion on that subject too, I do not express it.

These two elements being out of the case, I proceed to examine the case as presented to us; and to consider whether the grounds of reduction stated are sufficient for setting aside the decrees-arbitral, interim and final, pronounced under the submission, or whether they are not. The pleas in law which embody the grounds of reduction, are the 2d, 3d, 4th, and 6th. These grounds of reduction are put forward in an alternative form: It is said that the submission was either a statutory submission, or it was not. The pursuers put this dilemma. They say, if it was a statutory submission, it fell by the lapse of time, and by reason of the procedure not being conformable to the statute. If it was not a statutory submission, it fell by reason of the death of one of the parties submitters. There are subordinate questions raised as to whether the arbiter exceeded his powers; and substantially, these are the views now submitted to us.

The first view taken by the Railway Company is this, that the submission cannot be held to be statutory, or protected by the statute, because of certain things:—"1st, because the subject of the submission goes beyond the matters as to which arbiters are empowered to decide under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act, and the arbitrator did truly deal with such matters. 2d, Because a statutory arbitration terminates by the lapse of the periods prescribed by the Act for disposal of the case, with or without the prorogations rendered competent by statute. An attempt to give an arbitrator a power of indefinite prorogation constitutes a new and different kind of arbitration from that which the statute renders competent, and if effectual deprives the proceeding of its statutory character." Upon these grounds the pursuers hold that the submission cannot be regarded as statutory. The submission itself is peculiarly expressed. I am not prepared to differ from the statements set forth here, that it goes beyond matters as to which arbitrators are empowered to decide under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act; and I am not prepared to say that it may not be competent in a statutory submission as to the price of land to introduce other matters, if the parties choose to have these matters so regulated. But I think that this submission does go beyond the matters which arbitrators are empowered to decide under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act. It goes beyond the matter of fixing the price, and the compensation to be made generally for the taking of land. It embraces, in particular, the matter of accesses. That is expressly made the subject of submission. I have not seen the claim made by Sir Norman, which formed the subject of the reference. There is a statement of the import of the claim, in the first article of the statement for the defenders; but the claim itself is not here, and I do not see that he demanded an arbitration under the statute. The statement bears that he made a certain claim, and, the Railway Company not being disposed to pay the sum, that it was agreed to enter into the submission now before us; and it was entered into, embracing matters, as the Railway Company say, beyond the scope of the statutory arbitration. I am not at all surprised that the parties should have adopted that course, because it appears from the proceedings in the submission, that a great many other things required to be adjusted in the making of the railway, and that it depended on whether these were done one way or other, what should be the amount of compensation to be awarded to Sir Norman, or whether there should be any compensation at all. At various stages of the proceedings, the arbitrator gave the Railway Company the choice to say whether they would perform certain operations suggested by him, so as to avoid the necessity of compensation, or whether they would abstain from performing them; in which case there would be a certain award of damages. All that implied that the consideration of these things formed the condition of the discussion before the arbitrator, embracing also the question as to accesses, which I think the parties had power to submit if they chose. There is nothing to prevent them. On the contrary, it is competent for the Railway Company to compound for part of the amount of compensation to which Sir Norman might be entitled in place of accesses, and if they could not agree, they could refer it to arbitration. Therefore I see nothing incompetent in settling that by arbitration; but I agree that it is not within the Lands Clauses Act, nor the proper matter of this submission. But here it was made matter of submission, and the arbitrator could regulate the compensation according to what he might think were the accesses the party should get. When a case goes to a jury, it is common for the parties to settle what are the accesses in order that the jury may know precisely what they are doing. That is done constantly.

All these things were brought under the consideration of this arbitrator in a general submission. The words of the submission are very broad. Everything that could arise between the parties is referred. The submission also contains a clause of registration, and a clause consenting to letters of horning on six days' charge, and consequences which the statute does not attach to a decree-arbitral.

Looking to that, I am rather disposed to think that the Railway Company are right in their contention that this was not a strict statutory submission, and I think I see a reason for that in the number of matters referred. There is a great deal to be said for these things being submitted to an arbitrator such as Professor Low; and I may mention, that the proceedings under this submission go on very much in a way that indicates that the parties did not regard it as strictly a statutory submission. There is a clause in it that the arbitrator shall proceed in conformity with the rules and conditions of the statute. I know nothing in the common law of Scotland in regard to submissions which would prevent the parties from introducing a condition of this kind into a submission, although they did not hold it to be a strictly statutory submission.

mission. They might choose to limit the period for issuing the award to three months. They might choose to provide in that way that the submission should not fall by the death of one of the parties. They might choose to provide for various other events provided for by the statute, although they might not make it a strictly statutory submission. They might choose to add to it conditions as to issuing letters of horning, and so forth. This is differently expressed in many respects from the submission in the case of the Nitshill Company. Upon looking into the terms of that submission, I observe that it is knitted up with the statutes in a way that does not occur here. This one is merely connected with the statute by a declaration that the arbiter shall conduct it in terms of the statute.

In the case of Nitshill, a good deal of discussion took place elsewhere as to whether that was a statutory submission or not. It was held to be statutory, and the proceedings were there set aside on grounds which were not argued in this Court. These grounds were stated in substance in the note of suspension presented in the Bill-Chamber, but no argument as to these grounds was submitted to the Court here, when the case came before this Court on the reclaiming note against the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. All argument as to the formality of the proceedings was abandoned, and we had to address ourselves to other grounds. In the House of Lords that was revived, and there was a separate additional ground, which was the ground of judgment, and which was not argued here at all. But that was essentially a different submission from the present.

The parties here conducted the proceedings without regard to the statute. No doubt the arbiter was tied down to the rules of the statute at first, but the parties prorogated the endurance of the submission from time to time. I am not prepared, however, to say that that is incompetent in a statutory submission: That has not been decided, and I express no opinion upon it, nor whether parties can revive such a submission by merely saying they wish to revive it after the three months have elapsed. I give no opinion upon the absence of a clause in regard to that. But here the parties do prorogate from time to time, and in prorogating they enter into that minute of 6th and 9th November 1846, which gives the arbiter a power to prorogate, which was plainly contemplated from the beginning. At length he pronounces his award. Being of opinion that the Railway Company are right in their contention that this was not a statutory submission, I think it is to be judged of as being not a statutory submission; and we have now to inquire, whether, viewing it in that light, the submission has fallen by reason of the arbiter acting beyond the powers conferred upon him, or whether it has fallen by reason of any thing else.

When the parties attached to the submission the condition that the arbiter should proceed, and that the submission should be conducted in the manner prescribed by the Lands Clauses Act, I think they imported into it all the forms of procedure, as well as the effect of endurance that that statute provides. But being not a statutory submission, they had the power, of themselves, as in a court of their own making, and giving the law for the decision of their own case—to relax the condition, and depart from it—and they did depart from the statutory necessity of deciding within three months: They gave power to the arbiter to prorogate. The arbiter, acting on that power, issued a decree-arbitral, and there was no objection to that decree now as not being statutory. Then came the death of Sir Norman Lockhart, and the question arose, if this is not to be judged as a statutory submission, then did it fall by his death? and this is another branch of the Railway Company's dilemma. Now I do not think that a result necessarily follows. Like many other dilemmas, this is not so sharp in its horns when narrowly examined. I think the parties imported into the submission all these conditions of the Lands Clauses Act, but that they had the power to relax these by mutual consent. They did relax the condition as to the necessity of deciding within three months—but they did not depart from the provision which preserves the submission alive, notwithstanding the death of one of the parties. They allowed it to stand on the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act, and therefore remained, with this condition, that it was a submission not to lapse by the death of a party; and that being so, I think that horn of the dilemma is not fatal to the proceedings under this submission. That was the view taken by Lord Fullerton in the Bill-Chamber when the suspension was before him, and the other Division of the Court took the same view. They were of opinion that the submission did not fall by the death of Sir Norman, and pronounced judgment to that effect. We held, and I see no reason to doubt the soundness of that judgment, that that decision is res judicata here. It was not on a passed note; the decision only went the length of refusing the note; but still it is the expression of opinion of Lord Fullerton and the other Division in that matter, and not to be disregarded altogether as the expression of opinion of the Court. Therefore I come to the conclusion, that the death of Sir Norman was not fatal to these proceedings. The condition of importing the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act remained entire as to this matter, never having been abrogated by the consent of parties.

The next plea is the 3d, which I have already spoken to. The 4th I have also spoken to. Then comes the 6th plea, embracing several heads, which all proceed on the assumption that the submission was statutory. But I am not of opinion that the submission was statutory, and therefore I cannot go into this plea, which is conditional upon the assumption that it is statutory.

The first head of the plea is, that "it was ultra vires and incompetent for the arbiter to proceed by way of interim and final decreets-arbitral: it was incompetent to pronounce any interim decret-arbitral." If so, then as this submission in its commencement contemplated interim decrees-arbitral, as is expressed in the registration clause,—if that be the view which the Railway Company had of what it was competent or not under the statute, it goes far to support their second plea, that this was never intended to be a statutory submission.

Second, "It was farther ultra vires and incompetent for the arbiter, under the arbitration or the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act, to give decree for damage entirely prospective and contingent." I do not know very well what damage other than prospective, a jury could deal with in estimating the injury to be done to land. It is always prospective damage for amenity. But this applies to some anticipated results of throwing water on the lands. I do not think that it was incompetent to award damage on this head, for the arbiter must determine the damage done, and to be done to the estate.

The third branch of the plea is, "It was farther ultra vires and incompetent for him to give decree in favour of Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart for damages which were assumed as likely to be incurred by tenants whose lands were not traversed by the railway, and who were not parties to the submission, and which were all of the nature of prospective and unascertained damage; and these damages being inseparably mixed up with the damages payable to the defenders, the award is bad in toto."

This statement looked perplexing at first; but I have gone through the whole proceedings on that point, and I do not think that there was any incompetency in the award. This plea is put on the footing of the submission being statutory, but I rather think it might have equally applied to a common law submission, if the award be really ultra vires of the arbiter. But I do not think it is so. It is a reference to the injury done to Sir Norman Lockhart's estate, which is traversed by the railway—to parts of it, no doubt, through which the railway does not go, but that does not make it incompetent, for it is the injury done to the estate which makes the award competent. The tenants of these parts not traversed by the railway would find difficulty in making a claim against the Railway Company, but Sir Norman would not, for it is his estate that is damaged. It could not be said that the railway did any injury to the tenants. But Sir Norman's estate suffered. I do not see how the tenants could have answered the statement, we never touched your farm. But Sir Norman's estate was touched, and all the injury done to it was matter for inquiry.

The fourth branch is, "It was farther incompetent to order the execution of works, or to enforce their execution by pecuniary penalties for their non-execution." I think that that is an inaccurate statement of what the arbiter did. It is a perversion of the terms used by him. The arbiter did not enforce the execution of works by pecuniary penalties. He said this, "If you execute certain works, I am of opinion that certain consequences will follow to the estate. The cost of the works will be so and so. If not made, the damages to the estate will be so and so. Now, before I fix the award for damages to that amount, I give you an opportunity of saying whether you will execute these works." I think that was quite right.

The fifth branch is, "It was farther incompetent to decern for sums without discriminating and specifying the parties who were to take under the decree." That sufficiently distinguishes between the tenants. This is substantially the same thing as that with regard to the tenants whose lands the railway did not run through. But this leads to what I have spoken to already. Therefore, I do not think that in regard to these matters of detail they are grounds for reducing this decree, whether considered as statutory or not. But the plea is only put on the footing of the submission being statutory. Some of the pleas equally apply to any other submission, but I do not think they are valid.

Feb. 25, 1857.
Caledonian
Railway Co.
v. Lockhart.

Such being my view, and being of opinion that this action does not embrace as a ground of reduction Sir Norman's disability of entering into any but a statutory submission; and being of opinion that the submission was truly not a statutory submission, I think that the parties were entitled to attach to it the conditions which the statute provides for the mode of conducting such submissions, and entitled to depart from those conditions by mutual agreement if they chose; that they did attach these conditions, and did depart from some of these, but not from others, and therefore that the decree-arbitral is not reducible on any ground here stated.

LORD IVORY.—I have come to the same result as your Lordship. The first question arises incidentally, how far the record is sufficient to raise the question of disability in the case of an heir under strict entail? If necessary to rest the judgment on that point, I should have had some doubt. Sir Norman is set forth as "heir of entail,"—the very words used in the statute in regard to an heir under disability,—and it is such an expression as might have forced the Court to look into the entail, and the proceedings before the arbiter, to obtain light by which the clear meaning of the record might have been construed. If so, I doubt not that it would have been discovered that Sir Norman was an heir under a strict entail. But farther, even if the general description of Sir Norman as heir of entail could be held fairly to raise the question of his disability, the record is not in proper shape to make that disability a substantive ground of reduction. Indeed the main argument of the pursuers would rather indicate that it was not in that respect that the case was meant to be insisted in. For they say the submission was not a statutory submission, because the subject of it went beyond the matter which the arbiter was empowered by the statute to decide. Then, if it was not a statutory submission, there is little need to call into play that argument as to disability, because any objection that would otherwise have been raised would not apply any more to an heir under a strict entail, than to an heir with plenary right. But I take it on the ground on which your Lordship has rested it, that that is not to be taken as one of the elements on which the present discussion is to rest.

As to the further question, whether the submission is in proper parlance to be held a statutory submission, or a submission at common law, or a mixed submission, there might also be room for difference of opinion. I agree with your Lordship on the whole matter, that it is to be considered as a submission not under the statute, at least not wholly and absolutely under it, but a submission principally deriving its strength and validity from common law, and into which certain statutory privileges have been imported by the voluntary agreement of the parties, acting within their own power at common law, either to narrow or extend the limits of the submission.

This brings me to consider the three principal heads upon which the reasons of reduction were argued. The first of these turned upon the objection that the submission had fallen by reason of the lapse of three months before the award had been pronounced. Now, unquestionably, it does seem to have been the intention of parties, in entering into this submission, that the provisions of the statute as to the endurance of it should be imported into the contract; and I think that, if anything farther had taken place, it would have been held that the endurance of the submission in its primary constitution, as a common law submission into which the provisions of the statute were imported, was limited, and was intended to be limited, to three months. But whilst that was the case, it does not necessarily follow that, because the endurance of the submission in its conception was limited to three months, that therefore, by the time the arbiter came to pronounce his awards, interim

No. 125. and final, the same character applied to it. By that time the parties had unquestionably given their consent to the enlargement of the endurance of the submission
 — by the joint-minute, in which they authorised the arbiter to deal with the matter at
 Feb. 25, 1857. any time between the day of , and thereafter to appoint Caledonian such prorogation as he should think fit. That made the submission, from that Railway Co. time forward, precisely the same in respect of endurance as it would have been, if,
 v. Lockhart. in its original form, it had been expressly declared to be a submission to endure in the ordinary common law form, with power to the arbiter to pronounce decree between and the day of , with a power of prorogation given to the arbiter himself to exercise as he might think right.

This raises a very important question, whether it was within the power of the parties—a proprietor of land on the one hand, not being a proprietor under disability, and the Railway Company on the other hand—to enter into any other than a statutory submission, with the statutory limited endurance of three months. I see nothing under the Lands Clauses Act to limit the common law powers of either party in this respect. By force of his natural rights, the proprietor might dispose of his land as he pleased, or he might refuse to dispose of it. He is controlled in the exercise of his right by the compulsory power against him contained in the statute. But there is nothing in the statute to prevent him transacting or entering into a submission with the Railway Company, in such terms as they might mutually agree to. The statute contains no restriction upon the power of either. No doubt, if they do not agree, there are within the statute powers of compulsion given to the one party, and against the other. But if these statutory provisions are not called to the aid of any disagreement as to the mode of settlement, all the plenary rights of parties at common law remain untouched, and certainly one of them is the power of a fee-simple proprietor on the one hand, and a statutory company on the other, to enter into a submission of unlimited endurance, and with unlimited power to the arbiter to deal with all matters without or within the statute. The only limit of the arbiter's power, then, would be the measure of the power given to him by the mutual agreement of parties. Probably there might be so large a portion of an estate taken, and under such circumstances taken possession of at different times, that it might be utterly impossible to deal with the question between the parties within three months, or in any submission which did not give the arbiter full powers to deal from time to time with all contingencies. If the parties had entered into such submission,—which I assume is with a fee-simple proprietor,—setting forth that, because of the peculiarities of the requirements of the Railway Company on the one hand, and the time at which they were to enter into possession on the other hand, and the delays in executing the works, it was impossible to enter into a statutory submission with statutory limitations, that it was necessary to give enlarged powers to the arbiter, and therefore, giving him all the powers of an arbiter at common law, I cannot imagine there is anything in the statute to prevent parties entering into such a submission. If so, and if, in point of fact, not seeing all the difficulties before them, they have entered into a submission, and assumed, but assumed erroneously, that matters might be brought to a bearing in three months, and so have limited the submission to three months, the same inherent power which would have enabled them, if they had seen better, to enter into a submission with longer endurance at first, would equally enable them afterwards to enlarge the powers which they had made originally too narrow. As they might at the outset have entered into a submission with unlimited endurance, so now, finding that the statutory endurance will not suffice for the purpose which it was the object of the submission to accomplish, it is equally competent to them, in the course of the submission, to follow out the purpose which has been partially executed, by extending the submission, enlarging the powers of the arbiter, and so enabling him to decide under these larger powers.

Even under the statute, the consent of parties may do a great deal. Section 24, dealing with a statutory submission, says, in effect, that parties may revoke the appointment of an arbiter, or proceed to the appointment of another, if they consent. I allude to this clause to shew that “consent of parties” is an element which the Legislature contemplate might come into operation; and dealing here with a statutory submission, in which, if consent is not given, the statutory limitation must operate, I draw the inference that the consent of parties was very much in the view of the Legislature as what would regulate their rights. The same thing is alluded to in the case of Mitchell. It is said by Lord Brougham, in the judgment delivered in that case, that he will not speak of the question whether parties might not renew a submission. These are very much his words. But I infer from the context in which these words are found, that it did press on his Lordship's mind, that if the parties there had done nothing but renewed the submission, that was a matter not beyond their power; and it was the object of the judgment to distinguish between what parties might have done of consent, and what had not been de facto done. Therefore, both from the statute and the judgment of the House of Lords, I draw the inference that wherever this element of consent comes into play, it is a most important element to be dealt with in this class of questions in regard to the powers of an arbiter, and the rights of parties.

I was a good deal struck with the observation—and at first I thought there was more ingenuity than solidity in it, but now I think the reverse—that there is a distinction to be taken under the enactments of this statute between what is properly a compulsory submission, and what is a voluntary submission. The statute says, in the 20th section, that disputes as to compensation may be referred to arbitration. By the 23d section the compensation claimed may be settled by arbitration if the claimant desires; and, by the 35th, if the arbitration or award be not made within three months, “the question of such compensation shall be settled by the verdict of a jury.” In that case, either party may originate the proceedings before the jury. The only clause which speaks of a submission into which the Railway Company may be compelled to enter is the 23d, and there it is left in the choice of the landed proprietor to compel them. Now, if placed in such a position, of course they can only be compelled by force of the statute, and the submission therefore must and can only be a statutory submission. If the landed proprietor insists that the Railway Company must enter into a submission by force of the statute, then he cannot compel them beyond the statute, because the Railway Company are at all times entitled to say, our liability is limited to that period authorised by the statute, and upon that period expiring, our position rebounds into one of entire liberty; and, therefore, as you could only compel us to enter into a submission of limited endurance—that limited period having expired, we are by force of that same statute no longer bound at all. So also in a submission under the 20th clause by mutual agreement of parties. The mutual agreement, of course, is the measure of obligation on either side. It implies that the Railway Company are consenting. But whilst in treaty, they might refuse to consent to anything but a submission with statutory conditions, and of statutory endurance, and then it would be not by force of statute, but of the agreement, that these are introduced. But if both parties had said, neither of us want this statutory endurance, we must have a longer submission, in order that all matters between us may be exhausted, and therefore we import into the submission all the forms of the statute otherwise, and which can be available to strengthen the hands of the arbiter; but, in the matter of the three months' endurance, we are satisfied it will not do, and therefore we make the submission of longer endurance;—then the element of consent comes in, and the parties are on both sides bound by force of the contract, it being a contract into which both parties had power at the date of it to enter, and which is not prohibited by anything in the statute.

Such is the conclusion at which I arrive with reference to a submission between railway company and a fee-simple proprietor; that is, in the case in which the argument of disability on the part of a proprietor is excluded. But if the question of disability had been here, I do not wish to commit myself to any absolute opinion as to it; but entertaining a doubt how far that element is raised in the record, I nevertheless feel bound to say that if it had been here, I should not have been much disturbed by it in reference to any general doctrines on which to proceed. The disability is a disability under the statute to sell. The enabling clause is a clause which enables an heir of entail, or other party under disability, to sell, and not only to sell, but there are these important words in the clause:—“It shall be lawful for all parties being possessed of any lands, or any such right or interest therein, to contract for, sell, convey, and dispose of such lands, or of such right therein, to the promoters of the undertaking, and to enter into all necessary agreements for these purposes.”

No. 125. Feb. 25, 1857. Caledonian Railway Co. v. Lockhart. proceeded with, on the ground that the above minute rendered it no longer a statutory but a common law submission, which therefore fell by the death of either of the parties. The note was refused. The submission was proceeded with, and interim and final decrees pronounced. In a reduction of these decrees at the instance of the railway company;—Held (1.) that the judgment in the Bill-chamber was not res judicata in an action of reduction; (2.) that the submission was statutory in so far as it was to be conducted according to the statutory procedure; but that in so far as the parties had themselves modified the provision, limiting its endurance to three months, it was a submission at common law, embodying some though not all of the statutory provisions. Therefore, that it did not fall by the death of one of the parties, and was not reducible by reason of the proceedings not being conducted in strict conformity with the statute—(diss. Lord Deas).

Opinion, that the submission was statutory; and Observed, that the minute of prorogation left it in doubt whether it was intended to constitute a common law submission, adopting some of the provisions of the statute, or to engraft certain common law provisions upon an existing statutory submission, and also to what extent the common law was to regulate and to what extent the statute, which was a sufficient reason for holding that neither the one thing nor the other had been effectually done.

THE late Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart of Carnwath, Lee, and Covington, died in 1849. This action was directed by the Caledonian Railway Company against the present Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart, the heir of entail in possession of the estates of Carnwath, Lee, and Covington, and also against the trustees and executors of the late Baronet. It concluded for reduction of two decreets-arbitral, pronounced in an arbitration entered into between the late Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart and the pursuers, to Lavid Low, Professor of Agriculture in the University of Edinburgh.

The first article of the pursuer's revised condescendence was as follows:—The line of the Caledonian Railway passes through and intersects the lands and estates of Carnwath, Lee, and Covington, in the county of Lanark, which belonged to the late Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart, Baronet; and in order to the formation of the Railway and works connected therewith, it became necessary for the pursuers to acquire certain portions of these estates. They accordingly, in terms of the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act 1845, and in the manner thereby prescribed, gave notice to the said deceased Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart, the then heir of entail in possession, of their intention to take and acquire certain portions of the said lands and estates, as particularly described in the notices and relative plans delivered to him, for the purposes of the Caledonian Railway Act. And they further required from him the particulars of his interest in the said lands so to be taken, and of the claims made by him in respect thereof.

Article second was as follows:—In obedience to this requisition, the late Sir Norman gave in a claim detailing the compensation claimed by him in respect of the taking of the said lands, and for the damage done by severance, with other claims. The pursuers having declined to pay the amount of compensation claimed, and being unable to come to any agreement with Sir Norman on the subject, an arrangement was entered into for having the claims of Sir Norman disposed of by arbitration.

The deed of submission, after designing the parties, being the pursuers and the late Sir Norman, was as follows:—“That is to say, the said parties, considering that by the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act 1845, entituled ‘An Act for consolidating in one Act certain provisions usually inserted in Acts authorising the taking of land for undertakings of a public nature in Scotland,’ which is incorporated in and forms part of the Caledonian Act, it is enacted that, subject to the provisions of the said Acts, it shall be lawful for the promoters of the undertaking to agree with the owners, &c.; and that if no agreement be come to between the promoters of the

undertaking and the owners of or parties by the said Acts enabled to sell or convey any lands taken or required for, or injuriously affected by the execution of the undertaking, or any interest in such lands as to the value of such lands or of any interest therein, or as to the compensation to be made in respect thereof, it shall be lawful for the parties to refer the same to arbitration, &c. &c. Therefore the said Caledonian Railway Company and the said Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart have submitted and referred, and hereby submit and refer to the amicable decision, final sentence, and decret-arbitral of David Low, professor of agriculture in the University of Edinburgh, as sole arbiter mutually chosen by the said parties, all claims for the value of said lands and others to be taken, used, and occupied by the said Caledonian Railway Company, and in general all claims or demands whatever competent to the said Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart against the said Caledonian Railway Company, by or in consequence of the said Caledonian Railway Company taking, using, or injuring any part of the said lands for the said railway, or the works or operations of the said Railway Company, in any manner of way whatever, in so far as may be authorised by the foresaid Acts, including accesses and every other claim competent to him against the said Company: Declaring that the said arbiter shall conduct the proceedings to follow hereon, and determine the matters hereby submitted to him, in strict conformity with the rules and regulations under the provisions and conditions specified in the foresaid Act, and of the Acts 8th & 9th Vict. cap. 17 and cap. 33; and the said parties consent to the registration hereof, and of the interim and final decret-arbitral to follow hereon, in the books of Council and Session; or others competent, that letters of horning on six days charge, and all other execution, may pass on a decret to be interponed hereto, in form as effects," &c.

The deed of arbitration was subscribed by Sir Norman, and by Mr D. Rankine, on behalf of the Caledonian Company, as secretary.

The arbiter accepted of the submission on 19th March 1846, and appointed claims and answers, with the plans of the line of railway and grounds to be intersected by the railway, to be lodged with him.

The 35th section provides, that "if, when the matter shall have been referred to arbitration, the arbiter or their umpires shall for three months have failed to make their or his award, the question of such compensation shall be settled by the verdict of a jury."

No award was pronounced in the submission entered into between Sir John Lubbock and the Railway Company within the statutory period of three months. The submission was repeatedly prorogated first by letters or minutes of the agents, and then by the following formal minute, dated 6th and 7th November 1846 :—“ We, the parties to the within submission, considering that it has been already prorogated from time to time, conform to letters addressed to the arbiter by our agents on our behalf respectively, dated 20th and 22d May, 1st June, 18th of July, and 5th day of October last respectively ; and also considering that it is necessary again to prorogate the said submission, and that we have agreed that the arbiter shall have power to prorogate the same in future as hereinafter set forth ; do hereby prorogate the same for determining the matter submitted, to the day of 1st January 1847. We now submit to the arbiter within named the whole matters submitted in the within submission ; and whatever the said arbiter shall pronounce on the premises, in whole or in part, by interim or final decreet—and shall be pronounced by him within the above period, or on or before

Mr Rankine subscribed this minute on behalf of the Railway Company as treasurer.

On the 22d January 1848, after various proceedings in the submission, and notes issued of his views regarding the compensation to be awarded, the arbiter pronounced an interim decret-arbitral, whereby he awarded £6000 against the pursuers, and also disposed of certain portions of Sir Norman's claim as to accesses or other works. The draft of this interim decret was submitted to the agents for the parties, who suggested various remarks or alterations.

On 9th May 1849, Sir Norman Lockhart died. The tutors of the pretest Sir Norman, and the trustees and executors of the late Sir Norman, then proposed to sist themselves as parties to the submission, which the pursuers opposed on the ground that the submission had fallen by Sir Norman's death. This objection was over-ruled by the arbiter, who sisted the tutors and trustees, and appointed the decret-arbitral to be completed. The pursuers thereupon presented a note of suspension and interdict, in which they pleaded, that no award or decret-arbitral having been pronounced and delivered by the arbiter in the submission within three months of its being entered into, nor within three months from the date of the minute of prorogation and renewal, the submission, in terms of the 35th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, had fallen and become inoperative. Farther, that the submission by the various prorogations, and more particularly by the minute prorogating to the day of next, and giving the arbiter power to prorogate at pleasure, was taken out of the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act, and became a submission, subject to the rules of common law, and so fell by the death of Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart.

v. Lockhart.

“2d, The arbitration cannot be held as statutory, or protected by the provisions of the statute—(1.) Because the subject of the submission goes beyond the matters as to which arbiters are empowered to decide under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act, and the arbiter did truly deal with such matters. (2.) Because a statutory arbitration terminates by the lapse of the periods prescribed by the Act for disposal of the case, with or without the prorogations rendered competent by statute. An attempt to give an arbiter a power of indefinite prorogation constitutes a new and different kind of arbitration from that which the statute renders competent, and if effectual deprives the proceeding of its statutory character.

“3d, If, on the other hand, the arbitration is to be held as statutory, it fell by the lapse of the statutory period, and the case, under the peremptory provisions of the 35th section, fell to be disposed of by a jury.

“5th, A refusal of a suspension and interdict in the Bill-Chamber forms no res judicata as to the merits of the case in which the interdict has been ineffectually craved.

“6th, Upon the assumption that the arbitration was statutory, the decret-arbitral is otherwise void and null,—In particular, because (1.) It was ultra vires and incompetent for the arbiter to proceed by way of interim and final decreets-arbitral: it was incompetent to pronounce any interim decret-arbitral. (2.) It was farther ultra vires and incompetent for the arbiter, under the arbitration or the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act, to give decree for damages entirely prospective and contingent. (3.) It was farther ultra vires and incompetent for him to give decree in favour of Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart for damages which were assumed as likely to be incurred by tenants whose lands were not traversed by the railway, and who were not parties to the submission, and which were also of the nature of prospective and unascertained damage; and these damages being inseparably mixed up with the damages payable to the defenders, the award is bad in toto. (4.) It was farther incompetent to order the execution of works, or to enforce their execution by pecuniary penalties for their non-execution. (5.) It was farther incompetent to decern for sums without discriminating and specifying the parties who were to take under the decree.

“7th, The decrees are farther reducible as having proceeded from corrupt partiality and bias, and being in direct opposition to the truth and to the evidence led and adduced in the case, and the proceedings having been irregularly and incompetently conducted.

The defenders pleaded;—“1. The judgment in the suspension and interdict forms no res judicata against the pursuers, in so far as they now seek to re-plead the points decided by the Court in the suspension and interdict. 2. The pursuers have not set forth any facts relevant or sufficient to support a challenge of the decret-arbitral on any of the grounds pleaded or indicated in law. 3. In particular, the pursuers have failed to aver or establish either that the arbiter exceeded his powers, or that any of the decrees are incompetent under the submission. 4. There exist no valid grounds, either in fact or in law, for setting aside the decret-arbitral now challenged.”

No. 125. The Lord Ordinary, on 14th July 1854, pronounced an interlocutor, reporting the case to the Lords of the First Division.*

Feb. 25, 1857.

Caledonian
Railway Co.
v. Lockhart.

* "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary has thought it fitting to report this case to the Inner House. The pursuers seek substantially a review of a decision in a suspension brought by them several years ago, having agitated the same point of law in the reduction since raised. They contend it is open to them to do this, as an interlocutor in a suspension does not form a res judicata. And perhaps they are right in this as a general proposition, though it may require consideration whether, under the circumstances of this case, where the only point in the suspension was that now attempted to be revived in the reduction, they are not disentitled from questioning it as being a concluded issue between the parties. The pursuers might, it is conceived, have carried the judgment in the suspension before the highest tribunal; whereas they submitted. The point was as purely raised in the suspension as it is now stated in the reduction.

"If, however, the pursuers shall be held as not foreclosed by the result of the suspension, the question they renew is one with which the Lord Ordinary, after due consideration, has thought it scarcely suitable for a single Judge to deal; for they dispute the law laid down in the suspension on the ground of a judgment of the House of Lords in a later case between other parties, which they represent as overruling the principles of the decision in the suspension.

"There are other grounds of reduction pleaded to upset the decree-arbitral, but they can scarcely be separated from the objection to the validity of the submission itself and its continuing in force, which were the precise points adjudicated in the suspension. Unless the pursuers should be now successful in obtaining a decision on these points in this reduction, in disregard of the law laid down by the Court in determining the process of suspension, it is thought that the decree-arbitral is not open to any formidable ground of challenge on the objections which otherwise are stated to it.

"The circumstances of the case are shortly as follows:—The Caledonian Railway Company, before entering upon the lands of Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart, entered into a submission with him to Professor Low as sole arbiter. The subjects of submission are stated in very wide terms, comprehending all claims and demands whatever competent to Sir Norman against the Company, including accesses. It was declared that the arbiter shall conduct the proceedings and determine the matters submitted to him in strict conformity with the rules and regulations and provisions and conditions contained in the Lands Clauses Act and Railway Clauses Act. Power is given to pronounce interim or final decrees-arbitral. There was no specified term of duration of the submission. It was treated as falling under the three months clause, and was prorogated or extended by the parties for successive periods of three months or under, till a general prorogation was executed by them to the day of and a power of further prorogation bestowed on the arbiter himself. This he exercised, continuing the submission till he had pronounced an interim and final decree-arbitral. The first was issued before the death of Sir Norman, the latter after that event.

"The Company attempted to break up the submission on Sir Norman's death, and raised this dilemma:—that it must be held to be either a statutory arbitration or one at common law;—if the former, it was invalid by reason of the proceedings not having been brought to a close within the statutory period, treating the later prorogations as absolutely null, being unauthorised by the statute;—and if to be treated as an ordinary submission at common law, it had fallen by the death of one of the parties. In either view, they pleaded that the submission had come to an end. They presented a note of suspension against the submission being proceeded with, and took judgment upon these points.

"Their note was refused by Lord Fullerton, whose interlocutor was adhered to by the Inner House.

"The pleas thus disposed of by a deliberate judgment are attempted to be revived in this process. The encouragement to it is a case determined in the House of Lords in 1850. The circumstances of that case—the Glasgow Barrhead and Neilston Railway Company v. the Nitshill Coal Company—are, as the Lord Ordinary thinks, very different from the present. The judgment of this Court was reversed

v. Lockhart.

On 26th May 1855,¹ the Court repelled the plea of res judicata, in so far as the pleas disposed of in the Bill-Chamber were now revived in this action of reduction. The pursuers now farther pleaded :—(1), That this was not a statutory submission. The subject matter of reference was not merely compensation in the ordinary sense of the term, but also every other claim competent to Sir Norman Lockhart under the Act of Parliament. Now an important class of claims was for accommodation works. Such claims were not disposed of by the statute in the same way as claims for compensation. The Sheriff was constituted the proper judge in the matter, to whom alone parties were by the statute directed to resort. The defenders themselves, in art. 1 of their revised statement, described the submission in question as embracing, (1.) Sums for land taken from the estates of Carnwath, Lee, and Covington; (2.) Sums on account of intersectional and other damages done to land; (3.) A sum for injury to the amenity of the mansion-house of Carnwath; (4.) Value of wood; and lastly, The construction of various works, such as roads, bridges, accesses, and embankments, required to be executed by the pursuers for the proper use and protection of Sir Norman's grounds.

That was a description of accommodation works. The submission was entered into for determining that claim. Therefore it was a submission not to determine compensation merely, but also accommodation works. Again, in art. 3, the defenders stated that "the nature of the claim, and course of procedure under the submission, were such as necessarily required a considerable period of time;" and again, in art. 5, "The very purpose of the agreement and power thereby conferred upon the arbiter was to continue and enable him to continue the submission until the whole matter referred to should be finally determined."

but the appeal was argued on grounds different from those pleaded in this Court, judging from the reports of the case in the Session Reports and Scottish Jurist. The reversal proceeded on the arbitration being held to be purely under the statute; and so the oversman was not duly appointed;—it being held that the prorogation by the parties was to be viewed as a renewed submission, and while it renewed the powers of the arbiters, could not revive the previous appointment by the arbiters of the oversman, which was to be done by a new act of the arbiters themselves, under their renewed powers. These were the special points on which the reversal was rested. But in moving the judgment, views were expressed regarding submissions entered into under the Railway Acts, of more general application, and which of course must be received with the utmost deference.

"This reversal was brought under the notice of the First Division in a suspension,—the Dundee Perth and Aberdeen Railway Company v. Sir John Richardson, in which it was founded on to affect the validity of the submission and decree-arbitral in that case. The Court held it to have no application, on the ground of the strictly statutory character of the Nitshill arbitration; while in Sir John Richardson's case the submission was considered as being in the ordinary terms, though by declaration of parties there was imported into it all the statutory effects once entered into under the Lands Clauses and Railway Clauses Acts. The judgment of the Court, however, may be held to have rested on acts of homologation and quiescence in the decree-arbitral after it had been pronounced. The difficulty in the present case, as the Lord Ordinary apprehends, lies in the terms of the submission itself being apparently statutory and being treated as such by the early prorogation or renewals, till there was afterwards grafted upon it powers of prorogation belonging only, as is conceived, to the ordinary common law submission. What change this shall be held to have effected in its character, appears to the Lord Ordinary, with all humility, to be a question, regard being given to the Nitshill case, which ought to be brought directly under consideration of the Inner House,—and abstains from expressing any opinion of his own."

arbitration for the purpose of determining matter of compensation, except a statutory arbitration; and, (2), whether he could enter into any arbitration whatever in reference to accommodation works. He could do neither. By the common law, an heir of entail could not dispose of any portion of his estate, and therefore, by the common law, the Railway Company could not pass through his estate. But the statute interposed, and conferred authority upon them to take land from entailed estates, and empowered heirs of entail to sell portions of their land for the purposes of the Railway. The conditions upon which that capacity was given must be strictly construed. Therefore, if the pursuer's construction of the statute be right, and if this be not a statutory but a common law submission, then no farther argument was required to establish the soundness of the reasons on which the present reduction was founded.¹

The defenders now admitted that the submission was not statutory, but pleaded:—That it was competent for the parties to a common law submission to import into it the machinery of the Lands Clauses Act, for the purpose of regulating the proceedings. Nothing more had been done in the present instance. The parties had imported the machinery under the statute to a certain extent, but not so absolutely as to make an absolute adherence to its form of procedure imperative. Thus the limited endurance of a submission to three months was dispensed with, and the submission, therefore, being of that mixed nature, was not open to the technical objections now taken to it.

As to the objection founded on Sir Norman's position as an heir of entail, that was a plea which was competent to the succeeding heir of entail, but which he, having waived, the pursuers had no title to adopt.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case we formerly disposed of the fifth plea stated for the pursuers—that is the plea as to the judgment in the Bill-Chamber being res judicata in this case. The first, the seventh, and the eighth pleas we have heard nothing about, and I presume they are merely formal, and are not now insisted in. All the others remain.

This is an action of reduction at the instance of the Caledonian Railway Company, directed against the representatives of the late Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart; and the pursuers call for production of two decreets-arbitral, one dated 22d January 1848, which is an interim decreet-arbitral, and the other, which is a final decreet-arbitral, dated 20th June 1850. These decreets were pronounced by Professor Low, under a submission entered into in 1846 between the Caledonian Railway and Sir N. M. Lockhart, who was then alive. Sir Norman died after the interim decree-arbitral was pronounced, but before the final decree-arbitral was pronounced. His representatives had sided themselves as parties to the proceeding before the final decree had been pronounced. This action is now brought to reduce and set aside these decreets.

It appears that the Caledonian Railway Company acquired certain portions of the

the arbiter to prorogate the submission was signed in November 1856. Interim decree-arbitral was pronounced after various proceedings, and after various orders, by Professor Low, and bears date 22d January 1848. It appoints a certain sum to be paid in a certain way. In 1849 Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart died. His representatives proposed to sist themselves at that stage of the proceedings; but the Caledonian Railway Company interposed, and refused to allow the submission to proceed, and presented a note of suspension against the proceedings, on the ground that the submission had fallen. That note was refused, and is the note referred to in the fifth plea in law for the pursuers, which I have already mentioned.

No. 125.
Feb. 25, 1857.
Caledonian
Railway Co.
v. Lockhart.

In 1850 Professor Low pronounced his final decree, in which it is said that certain of the findings are on matters not submitted to him; and which it was therefore not within his power to decide.

This summons of reduction was raised in March 1852. Among the grounds of reduction argued, there was one to this effect, that in this case the submission, if it was not a submission precisely in terms of the statute, and conducted in exact conformity with the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act, was an incompetent proceeding, inasmuch as Sir Norman, as an heir of entail, was under disability under the statute, and had no power to agree to the price of land to be taken, except either under a submission conducted in terms of the Lands Clauses Act, or by a jury, or by certain valuers to be appointed, in terms of the statute, to fix the amount of the price. That the proceedings here were not proceedings in terms of the Lands Clauses Act at all; that there was no verdict of a jury, and no valuation; and therefore that the whole proceedings were null and void, on the ground of Sir Norman being an heir of entail under disability. A proposal was made at the debate to insert a plea in law to that effect, on the assumption that the statements in the record were sufficient to bring out the facts, and that all that was wanting was a plea in law applicable to them. I think that after the course this case has taken, it is out of the question to admit any such plea; and I am of opinion that there is no ground of reduction founded on the disability of Sir Norman to be a party to the submission. I shall not detain your Lordships by examining the statements on record. They are not calculated to lay a foundation for such a plea; but they are not here in form as a ground of reduction, and that part of the argument I hold to be out of the case which we are called on to decide.

Being of that opinion in regard to what is not before us, I do not express any opinion on what would be the merits of such a ground of reduction if it were here, nor do I hold that the pursuers are excluded from afterwards founding upon it. I pronounce no opinion at all, and do not wish to be misunderstood as expressing a doubt on the one side or the other. I do not say that I have no opinion, but I do not express it. Neither is it pleaded as a ground of reduction, that the Railway Company have no power to settle the price of land taken by them by any kind of arbitration except an arbitration in terms of the statute. I pronounce no opinion upon that point. Such a plea might perhaps amount to a repudiation of a great deal done by the Railway Company in this submission. Although I may have an opinion on that subject too, I do not express it.

These two elements being out of the case, I proceed to examine the case as presented to us; and to consider whether the grounds of reduction stated are sufficient for setting aside the decrees-arbitral, interim and final, pronounced under the submission, or whether they are not. The pleas in law which embody the grounds of reduction, are the 2d, 3d, 4th, and 6th. These grounds of reduction are put forward in an alternative form: It is said that the submission was either a statutory submission, or it was not. The pursuers put this dilemma. They say, if it was a statutory submission, it fell by the lapse of time, and by reason of the procedure not being conformable to the statute. If it was not a statutory submission, it fell by reason of the death of one of the parties submitters. There are some subordinate questions raised as to whether the arbiter exceeded his powers; but, substantially, these are the views now submitted to us.

The first view taken by the Railway Company is this, that the submission cannot be held to be statutory, or protected by the statute, because of certain things:—"1st, because the subject of the submission goes beyond the matters as to which arbiters are empowered to decide under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act, and the arbitrator did truly deal with such matters. 2d, Because a statutory arbitration terminates by the lapse of the periods prescribed by the Act for disposal of the case, with or without the prorogations rendered competent by statute. An attempt to give an arbitrator a power of indefinite prorogation constitutes a new and different kind of arbitration from that which the statute renders competent, and if effectual deprives the proceeding of its statutory character." Upon these grounds the pursuers hold that the submission cannot be regarded as statutory. The submission itself is peculiarly expressed. I am not prepared to differ from the statements set forth here, that it goes beyond matters as to which arbitrators are empowered to decide under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act; and I am not prepared to say that it may not be competent in a statutory submission as to the price of land to introduce other matters, if the parties choose to have these matters so regulated. But I think that this submission does go beyond the matters which arbitrators are empowered to decide under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act. It goes beyond the matter of fixing the price, and the compensation to be made generally for the taking of land. It embraces, in particular, the matter of accesses. That is expressly made the subject of submission. I have not seen the claim made by Sir Norman, which formed the subject of the reference. There is a statement of the import of the claim, in the first article of the statement for the defenders; but the claim itself is not here, and I do not see that he demanded an arbitration under the statute. The statement bears that he made a certain claim, and, the Railway Company not being disposed to pay the sum, that it was agreed to enter into the submission now before us; and it was entered into, embracing matters, as the Railway Company say, beyond the scope of the statutory arbitration. I am not at all surprised that the parties should have adopted that course, because it appears from the proceedings in the submission, that a great many other things required to be adjusted in the making of the railway, and that it depended on whether these were done one way or other, what should be the amount of compensation to be awarded to Sir Norman, or whether there should be any compensation at all. At various stages of the proceedings, the arbitrator gave the Railway Company the choice to say whether they would perform certain operations suggested by him, so as to avoid the necessity of compensation, or whether they would abstain from performing them; in which case there would be a certain award of damages. All that implied that the consideration of these things formed the condition of the discussion before the arbitrator, embracing also the question as to accesses, which I think the parties had power to submit if they chose. There is nothing to prevent them. On the contrary, it is competent for the Railway Company to compound for part of the amount of compensation to which Sir Norman might be entitled in place of accesses; and if they could not agree, they could refer it to arbitration. Therefore I see nothing incompetent in settling that by arbitration; but I agree that it is not within the Lands Clauses Act, nor the proper matter of this submission. But here it was made matter of submission, and the arbitrator could regulate the compensation according to what he might think were the accesses the party should get. When a case goes to a jury, it is common for the parties to settle what are the accesses, in order that the jury may know precisely what they are doing. That is done constantly.

All these things were brought under the consideration of this arbitrator in a general submission. The words of the submission are very broad. Everything that could arise between the parties is referred. The submission also contains a clause of registration, and a clause consenting to letters of horning on six days' charge,—consequences which the statute does not attach to a decree-arbitral.

Looking to that, I am rather disposed to think that the Railway Company are right in their contention that this was not a strict statutory submission, and I think I see a reason for that in the number of matters referred. There is a great deal to be said for these things being submitted to an arbitrator such as Professor Low; and I may mention, that the proceedings under this submission go on very much in a way that indicates that the parties did not regard it as strictly a statutory submission. There is a clause in it that the arbitrator shall proceed in conformity with the rules and conditions of the statute. I know nothing in the common law of Scotland in regard to submissions which would prevent the parties from introducing a condition of that kind into a submission, although they did not hold it to be a strictly statutory submission. They might choose to limit the period for issuing the award to three months. They might choose to provide in that way that the submission should not fall by the death of one of the parties. They might choose to provide for various other events provided for by the statute, although they might not make it a strictly statutory submission. They might choose to add to it conditions as to issuing letters of horning, and so forth. This is differently expressed in many respects from the submission in the case of the Nitshill Company. Upon looking into the terms of that submission, I observe that it is knitted up with the statutes in a way that does not occur here. This one is merely connected with the statute by a declaration that the arbiter shall conduct it in terms of the statute.

In the case of Nitshill, a good deal of discussion took place elsewhere as to whether that was a statutory submission or not. It was held to be statutory, and the proceedings were there set aside on grounds which were not argued in this Court. These grounds were stated in substance in the note of suspension presented in the Bill-Chamber, but no argument as to these grounds was submitted to the Court here, when the case came before this Court on the reclaiming note against the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. All argument as to the formality of the proceedings was abandoned, and we had to address ourselves to other grounds. In the House of Lords that was revived, and there was a separate additional ground, which was the ground of judgment, and which was not argued here at all. But that was essentially a different submission from the present.

The parties here conducted the proceedings without regard to the statute. No doubt the arbiter was tied down to the rules of the statute at first, but the parties prorogated the endurance of the submission from time to time. I am not prepared, however, to say that that is incompetent in a statutory submission: That has not been decided, and I express no opinion upon it, nor whether parties can revive such a submission by merely saying they wish to revive it after the three months have elapsed. I give no opinion upon the absence of a clause in regard to that. But here the parties do prorogate from time to time, and in prorogating they enter into that minute of 6th and 9th November 1846, which gives the arbiter a power to prorogate, which was plainly contemplated from the beginning. At length he pronounces his award. Being of opinion that the Railway Company are right in their contention that this was not a statutory submission, I think it is to be judged of as being not a statutory submission; and we have now to inquire, whether, viewing it in that light, the submission has fallen by reason of the arbiter acting beyond the powers conferred upon him, or whether it has fallen by reason of any thing else.

When the parties attached to the submission the condition that the arbiter should proceed, and that the submission should be conducted in the manner prescribed by the Lands Clauses Act, I think they imported into it all the forms of procedure, as well as the effect of endurance that that statute provides. But being not a statutory submission, they had the power, of themselves, as in a court of their own making, and giving the law for the decision of their own case—to relax that condition, and depart from it—and they did depart from the statutory necessity of deciding within three months: They gave power to the arbiter to prorogate. The arbiter, acting on that power, issued a decree-arbitral, and there is no objection to that decree now as not being statutory. Then came the death of Sir Norman Lockhart, and the question arose, if this is not to be regarded as a statutory submission, then did it fall by his death? and this is the other branch of the Railway Company's dilemma. Now I do not think that that result necessarily follows. Like many other dilemmas, this is not so sharp in the horns when narrowly examined. I think the parties imported into the submission all these conditions of the Lands Clauses Act, but that they had the power to relax these by mutual consent. They did relax the condition as to the necessity of deciding within three months—but they did not depart from the provision which preserves the submission alive, notwithstanding the death of one of the parties. They allowed it to stand on the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act, and therefore it remained, with this condition, that it was a submission not to lapse by the death of a party; and that being so, I think that horn of the dilemma is not fatal to the proceedings under this submission. That was the view taken by Lord Fullerton in the Bill-Chamber when the suspension was before him, and the other Division of the Court took the same view. They were of opinion that the submission did not fall by the death of Sir Norman, and pronounced judgment to that effect. We held, and I see no reason to doubt the soundness of that judgment, that that decision is not res judicata here. It was not on a passed note; the decision only went the length of refusing the note; but still it is the expression of opinion of Lord Fullerton and the other Division in that matter, and not to be disregarded altogether as the expression of opinion of the Court. Therefore I come to the conclusion, that the death of Sir Norman was not fatal to these proceedings. The condition of importing the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act remained entire as to this matter, never having been abrogated by the consent of parties.

The next plea is the 3d, which I have already spoken to. The 4th I have also spoken to. Then comes the 6th plea, embracing several heads, which all proceed on the assumption that the submission was statutory. But I am not of opinion that the submission was statutory, and therefore I cannot go into this plea, which is conditional upon the assumption that it is statutory.

The first head of the plea is, that "it was ultra vires and incompetent for the arbiter to proceed by way of interim and final decrees-arbitral: it was incompetent to pronounce any interim decret-arbitral." If so, then as this submission in its commencement contemplated interim decrees-arbitral, as is expressed in the registration clause,—if that be the view which the Railway Company had of what is competent or not under the statute, it goes far to support their second plea, that this was never intended to be a statutory submission.

Second, "It was farther ultra vires and incompetent for the arbiter, under the arbitration or the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act, to give decree for damages entirely prospective and contingent." I do not know very well what damages, other than prospective, a jury could deal with in estimating the injury to be done to land. It is always prospective damage for amenity. But this applies to some anticipated results of throwing water on the lands. I do not think that it was incompetent to award damage on this head, for the arbiter must determine all damage done, and to be done to the estate.

The third branch of the plea is, "It was farther ultra vires and incompetent for him to give decree in favour of Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart for damages which were assumed as likely to be incurred by tenants whose lands were not traversed by the railway, and who were not parties to the submission, and which were also of the nature of prospective and unascertained damage; and these damages being inseparably mixed up with the damages payable to the defenders, the award is bad in toto."

This statement looked perplexing at first; but I have gone through the whole proceedings on that point, and I do not think that there was any incompetency in the award. This plea is put on the footing of the submission being statutory, but I rather think it might have equally applied to a common law submission, if the award be really ultra vires of the arbiter. But I do not think it is so. It is in reference to the injury done to Sir Norman Lockhart's estate, which is traversed by the railway—to parts of it, no doubt, through which the railway does not go, but that does not make it incompetent, for it is the injury done to the estate which makes the award competent. The tenants of these parts not traversed by the railway would find difficulty in making a claim against the Railway Company, but Sir Norman would not, for it is his estate that is damaged. It could not be said that the railway did any injury to the tenants. But Sir Norman's estate suffered. I do not see how the tenants could have answered the statement, we never touched your farm. But Sir Norman's estate was touched, and all the injury done to it was matter for inquiry.

The fourth branch is, "It was farther incompetent to order the execution of works, or to enforce their execution by pecuniary penalties for their non-execution." I think that that is an inaccurate statement of what the arbiter did. It is a perversion of the terms used by him. The arbiter did not enforce the execution of works by pecuniary penalties. He said this, "If you execute certain works, I am of opinion that certain consequences will follow to the estate. The cost of the works will be so and so. If not made, the damages to the estate will be so and so. Now, before I fix the award for damages to that amount, I give you an opportunity of saying whether you will execute these works." I think that was quite right. It

The fifth branch is, "It was farther incompetent to decern for sums without discriminating and specifying the parties who were to take under the decree." That sufficiently distinguishes between the tenants. This is substantially the same thing as that with regard to the tenants whose lands the railway did not run through. But this leads to what I have spoken to already. Therefore, I do not think that in regard to these matters of detail they are grounds for reducing this decree, whether considered as statutory or not. But the plea is only put on the footing of the submission being statutory. Some of the pleas equally apply to any other submission, but I do not think they are valid.

Such being my view, and being of opinion that this action does not embrace as a ground of reduction Sir Norman's disability of entering into any but a statutory submission; and being of opinion that the submission was truly not a statutory submission, I think that the parties were entitled to attach to it the conditions which the statute provides for the mode of conducting such submissions, and entitled to depart from those conditions by mutual agreement if they chose; that they did attach these conditions, and did depart from some of these, but not from others, and therefore that the decree-arbitral is not reducible on any ground here stated.

LORD IVORY.—I have come to the same result as your Lordship. The first question arises incidentally, how far the record is sufficient to raise the question of disability in the case of an heir under strict entail? If necessary to rest the judgment on that point, I should have had some doubt. Sir Norman is set forth as "heir of entail,"—the very words used in the statute in regard to an heir under disability,—and it is such an expression as might have forced the Court to look into the entail, and the proceedings before the arbiter, to obtain light by which the clear meaning of the record might have been construed. If so, I doubt not that it would have been discovered that Sir Norman was an heir under a strict entail. But farther, even if the general description of Sir Norman as heir of entail could be held fairly to raise the question of his disability, the record is not in proper shape to make that disability a substantive ground of reduction. Indeed the main argument of the pursuers would rather indicate that it was not in that respect that the case was meant to be insisted in. For they say the submission was not a statutory submission, because the subject of it went beyond the matter which the arbiter was empowered by the statute to decide. Then, if it was not a statutory submission, there is little need to call into play that argument as to disability, because any objection that would otherwise have been raised would not apply any more to an heir under a strict entail, than to an heir with plenary right. But I take it on the ground on which your Lordship has rested it, that that is not to be taken as one of the elements on which the present discussion is to rest.

As to the further question, whether the submission is in proper parlance to be held a statutory submission, or a submission at common law, or a mixed submission, there might also be room for difference of opinion. I agree with your Lordship on the whole matter, that it is to be considered as a submission not under the statute, at least not wholly and absolutely under it, but a submission principally deriving its strength and validity from common law, and into which certain statutory privileges have been imported by the voluntary agreement of the parties, acting within their own power at common law, either to narrow or extend the limits of the submission.

This brings me to consider the three principal heads upon which the reasons of reduction were argued. The first of these turned upon the objection that the submission had fallen by reason of the lapse of three months before the award had been pronounced. Now, unquestionably, it does seem to have been the intention of parties, in entering into this submission, that the provisions of the statute as to the endurance of it should be imported into the contract; and I think that, if nothing further had taken place, it would have been held that the endurance of the submission, in its primary constitution, as a common law submission into which the provisions of the statute were imported, was limited, and was intended to be limited, to three months. But whilst that was the case, it does not necessarily follow that, because the endurance of the submission in its conception was limited to three months, therefore, by the time the arbiter came to pronounce his awards, interim

No. 125. and final, the same character applied to it. By that time the parties had unquestionably given their consent to the enlargement of the endurance of the submission by the joint-minute, in which they authorised the arbiter to deal with the matter at any time between the day of , and thereafter to appoint such prorogation as he should think fit. That made the submission, from that time forward, precisely the same in respect of endurance as it would have been, if, in its original form, it had been expressly declared to be a submission to endure in the ordinary common law form, with power to the arbiter to pronounce decree between and the day of , with a power of prorogation given to the arbiter himself to exercise as he might think right.

This raises a very important question, whether it was within the power of the parties—a proprietor of land on the one hand, not being a proprietor under disability, and the Railway Company on the other hand—to enter into any other than a statutory submission, with the statutory limited endurance of three months. I see nothing under the Lands Clauses Act to limit the common law powers of either party in this respect. By force of his natural rights, the proprietor might dispose of his land as he pleased, or he might refuse to dispose of it. He is controlled in the exercise of his right by the compulsory power against him contained in the statute. But there is nothing in the statute to prevent him transacting or entering into a submission with the Railway Company, in such terms as they might mutually agree to. The statute contains no restriction upon the power of either. No doubt, if they do not agree, there are within the statute powers of compulsion given to the one party, and against the other. But if these statutory provisions are not called to the aid of any disagreement as to the mode of settlement, all the plenary rights of parties at common law remain untouched, and certainly one of them is the power of a fee-simple proprietor on the one hand, and a statutory company on the other, to enter into a submission of unlimited endurance, and with unlimited power to the arbiter to deal with all matters without or within the statute. The only limit of the arbiter's power, then, would be the measure of the power given to him by the mutual agreement of parties. Probably there might be so large a portion of an estate taken, and under such circumstances taken possession of at different times, that it might be utterly impossible to deal with the question between the parties within three months, or in any submission which did not give the arbiter full powers to deal from time to time with all contingencies. If the parties had entered into such submission,—which I assume is with a fee-simple proprietor,—setting forth that, because of the peculiarities of the requirements of the Railway Company on the one hand, and the time at which they were to enter into possession on the other hand, and the delays in executing the works, it was impossible to enter into a statutory submission with statutory limitations, that it was necessary to give enlarged powers to the arbiter, and therefore, giving him all the powers of an arbiter at common law, I cannot imagine there is anything in the statute to prevent parties entering into such a submission. If so, and if, in point of fact, not seeing all the difficulties before them, they have entered into a submission, and assumed, but assumed erroneously, that matters might be brought to a bearing in three months, and so have limited the submission to three months, the same inherent power which would have enabled them, if they had seen better, to enter into a submission with longer endurance at first, would equally enable them afterwards to enlarge the powers which they had made originally too narrow. As they might at the outset have entered into a submission with unlimited endurance, so now, finding that the statutory endurance will not suffice for the purpose which it was the object of the submission to accomplish, it is equally competent to them, in the course of the submission, to follow out the purpose which has been partially executed, by extending the submission, enlarging the powers of the arbiter, and so enabling him to decide under these larger powers.

Even under the statute, the consent of parties may do a great deal. Section 24, dealing with a statutory submission, says, in effect, that parties may revoke the appointment of an arbiter, or proceed to the appointment of another, if they consent. I allude to this clause to shew that “consent of parties” is an element which the Legislature contemplate might come into operation; and dealing here with a statutory submission, in which, if consent is not given, the statutory limitation must operate, I draw the inference that the consent of parties was very much in the

I was a good deal struck with the observation—and at first I thought there was more ingenuity than solidity in it, but now I think the reverse—that there is a distinction to be taken under the enactments of this statute between what is properly a compulsory submission, and what is a voluntary submission. The statute says, in the 20th section, that disputes as to compensation may be referred to arbitration. By the 23d section the compensation claimed may be settled by arbitration if the claimant desires; and, by the 35th, if the arbitration or award be not made within three months, “the question of such compensation shall be settled by the verdict of a jury.” In that case, either party may originate the proceedings before the jury. The only clause which speaks of a submission into which the Railway Company may be compelled to enter is the 23d, and there it is left in the choice of the landed proprietor to compel them. Now, if placed in such a position, of course they can only be compelled by force of the statute, and the submission therefore must and can only be a statutory submission. If the landed proprietor insists that the Railway Company must enter into a submission by force of the statute, then he cannot compel them beyond the statute, because the Railway Company are at all times entitled to say, our liability is limited to that period authorised by the statute, and upon that period expiring, our position rebounds into one of entire liberty; and, therefore, as you could only compel us to enter into a submission of limited endurance—that limited period having expired, we are by force of that same statute no longer bound at all. So also in a submission under the 20th clause by mutual agreement of parties. The mutual agreement, of course, is the measure of obligation on either side. It implies that the Railway Company are consenting. But whilst in treaty, they might refuse to consent to anything but a submission with statutory conditions, and of statutory endurance, and then it would be not by force of statute, but of the agreement, that these are introduced. But if both parties had said, neither of us want this statutory endurance, we must have a longer submission, in order that all matters between us may be exhausted, and therefore we import into the submission all the forms of the statute otherwise, and which can be available to strengthen the hands of the arbiter; but, in the matter of the three month's endurance, we are satisfied it will not do, and therefore we make the submission of longer endurance;—then the element of consent comes in, and the parties are on both sides bound by force of the contract, it being a contract into which both parties had power at the date of it to enter, and which is not prohibited by anything in the statute.

Such is the conclusion at which I arrive with reference to a submission between a railway company and a fee-simple proprietor; that is, in the case in which the argument of disability on the part of a proprietor is excluded. But if the question of disability had been here, I do not wish to commit myself to any absolute opinion in regard to it; but entertaining a doubt how far that element is raised in the record, I nevertheless feel bound to say that if it had been here, I should not have felt much disturbed by it in reference to any general doctrines on which to proceed. This disability is a disability under the statute to sell. The enabling clause is a clause which enables an heir of entail, or other party under disability, to sell, and not only to sell, but there are these important words in the clause:—“It shall be lawful for all parties being possessed of any lands, or any such right or interest therein, to contract for, sell, convey, and dispose of such lands, or of such right therein, and to enter into all necessary agreements for the purposes.”

No. 125.

Feb. 25, 1857.
Caledonian
Railway Co.
v. Lockhart.

It appears to me that there is nothing in that enabling clause which bears on the question of arbitration. Arbitration is but one of the kinds of machinery by which a disputed question of compensation may be determined. But it is a mere piece of machinery by which the thing may be done. It is not essential to enable the proprietor to sell. He may sell, if he pleases, and at a price fixed by himself. Of course the price must be agreed to on the other side. He may sell by a common-law arbitration, if the other party consent. And I do not read the word arbitration in section 9, which provides for the ascertaining of compensation in the case of parties under disability, as different from the agreements spoken of in section 7, which empowers parties possessed of lands, or having right or interest therein, to sell the same to the promoters of a railway scheme, and to enter into all necessary agreements. I think that a submission is one of those agreements which the seventh section authorises. A proprietor under disability may enter into arbitration, and the terms of that arbitration may be as full as if he were a fee-simple proprietor, provided they are agreed to on the other side. Holding that to be the construction, I do not think that section 9 merely applies to an arbitration that is necessarily a statutory arbitration, but may be of that kind which becomes one of the "agreements" by which a sale may be carried out, and under which, as by an "agreement," the price between the parties may be settled. It is not necessary to have an after proceeding of testing that price by two valuers. But if I were wrong in that, there is another mode in which the terms of the statute may be satisfied, namely, that the parties not being at one as to the price, may agree that it be settled by a neutral party, in whom they have confidence, and so place themselves in the hands of an arbiter. I do not say that in such a case, if they were to make the arbitration of that limited character, they would bring the matter to a further point than if they had settled the price between themselves. The price, in that case, would still require to be tested by the valuation of two valuers, in terms of section 9, and shewn not to be less than the value of the subject. But it might be so much more; and, in the present case, it is clear that the Railway Company could not obtain benefit in that way by valuation, for their complaint is that they have been mulcted too severely. But be that as it may, what I point at is, that it is an answer to a reduction of a decree-arbitral, as a decree, if it went no further than settling the price of the compensation. Because, whilst the price of it falls below the test, it would not be binding on the heirs; if above the test, it will be binding. The parties would be entitled to have the statutory test of valuation applied, but not entitled to have the award struck down de plano, without the application of the statute.

With reference to this matter of the three months' limitation, there is certainly nothing in the statute to show that it was ever intended to have a different application with reference to different classes of proprietors. If it is not to have a restrictive operation against a fee-simple proprietor, it does not appear that it is to have any restrictive application against a proprietor under disability. A proprietor under disability must be unable to sell. But when you come to deal with arbitration as applied to his case, it is to be dealt with as in the case of a proprietor with ability to sell. He is entitled by the statute to sell; and arbitration in his case, as a piece of machinery for arriving at the price, is precisely the same as the statute has given, and chiefly given for the case of a fee-simple proprietor. And that was what I meant to say, when I observed that a proprietor under disability was not affected by that three months' clause more than the other.

Upon the whole, therefore, so far as regards the limitation of three months, I am perfectly satisfied that the parties had the power to enter into a submission, of which there should be no limitation; and having entered into a submission, in which it may be argued that it was meant there should be a limitation,—having power to do so, they have been pleased, by their own act, to withdraw the limitation, and extend the submission into one of such endurance as they had the power to execute from the first; and that being the case, the lapse of the three months has nothing to do with the matter.

I should have had little or no hesitation in regard to the result of my deduction, had it not been for the use in the argument of the decision in the case of Nithill. In that case, as I read it, I can make no more out of the judgment of the House of Lords than this. The case was one in which there had been a submit-sion entered into (as was ultimately assumed on all hands), on the ground of its being a statutory submission, and one, therefore, which was to be followed out in terms of the statute. I entirely agree with the line of judgment, that, being a statutory submission, you must treat it as such out and out. But even as a statutory submission, it was a submission as to which the judge who delivered the judgment seemed to say that he did not dispute the powers of the parties to renew the submission,—to have done something by consent which would disturb its existence as a statutory submission. That goes a great way. But the ground on which the judgment was rested was this, that when the parties came to renew the submission, they only renewed the power of the arbiters; but already they had named an oversman, and when the deed had expired, and was revived, they did not reappoint the oversman, which was the first step they ought to have taken; and therefore the award being the award, not of the arbiters, but of an oversman appointed under an expired statutory submission which had fallen to the ground, and not nominated by the parties, and not consented to at all, there was no jurisdiction in the oversman under the statute, and therefore that the whole proceedings must fall to the ground. That is the whole extent of that judgment, and, so limited, I quite agree with it. But that does not apply to the present case. There were here not two arbiters, and no oversman. There was a single arbiter, and nothing had to be revived but his power; and therefore, even if this had been a question more approaching that of Nitshill, the elements on which that case was decided are not here, and the case comes nearer our own case of Richardson, where the matter was dealt with as a matter which the parties themselves had under control, and which they might waive, just as they might waive any other proceeding under the statute. And so, if the case had gone to a jury trial, there are many things under the statute which they might enforce, and which they might waive. It is not a statutory matter, in that absolute sense, that if not done in a particular way, the party shall not have it in his power to waive it as if it were a statutory solemnity. This three months clause is a provision inserted for the benefit of parties, to avoid delays which might be very prejudicial to them, but not to disturb their primary powers, where necessity arises to prorogate of consent, so as to enable the arbiter to deal with the questions submitted to him in the way that shall be most advantageous to the parties.

There are two cases in the English books which arose under English civil law procedure,—of no force as direct authority; but which present an analogy to submissions having a three months clause. In one of them there was power given to the parties to submit their case in Court, to be decided within three months, unless the parties, by written consent, should prorogate the time. The three months elapsed, and the parties, without a statutory consent, yet de facto consented to prorogations. The award was pronounced, and a challenge was brought, on the ground that this was entirely a statutory submission, that the party had no power to deal with it, inasmuch as he had no written act of the parties to authorise him, and that it was therefore out of his jurisdiction. But the Court held that the party, having de facto consented, and gone on with the submission, was not entitled to take the plea that he had not consented in writing, and that there was a want of statutory technicality; that consent being a matter which prorogated jurisdiction, and having been given really, or rebus et factis, and the party not being able to repudiate the fact that the consent was so given, was barred from afterwards challenging the proceedings. Just so here. There is a radical jurisdiction in the submission, as originally entered into. There is consent to prorogate, and the award has been pronounced under that prorogation; and on that ground it is impossible to hold that the result ought to be other than your Lordship has arrived at.

The next point for consideration is whether this submission, not being statutory, is bound by the death of one of the parties. Now, unquestionably it is a general rule of submission law, that, in an ordinary submission, in ordinary circumstances, if one of the parties dies, the submission falls. But it seems to me, as to your Lordship, that there are specialties, which take the present case out of that category.

In the first place, it is perfectly clear that parties may provide, under a common law submission, that it shall exist notwithstanding the death of one of them. And, secondly, competent for them, by reference, to import the provision of a statute which stipulates that the submission shall survive, notwithstanding the death of one of the parties. They have done so here. The judgment in the suspension was authority of the strongest kind for that; and the result is, that notwithstanding the death of Sir Norman Lockhart, the submission subsists, and is still binding upon his representatives and the Railway Company.

Apart from that, there is a great deal, in the special circumstances of this case, upon which to hold that the death of one of the parties does not cause the fall of the submission. The matters which it was intended to settle implied continuous arrangement between the parties for the purchase and sale of land. In the meanwhile, before the submission was brought to a close, the understanding was,—and the contract of parties shewed that that understanding was carried into effect,—that the Railway Company should enter into possession, and have the disposal of the lands, and change their whole structure and state of existence. It appears, farther, that in consequence of the railway operations, and whilst proceedings were taking place, year after year, in this submission, there were progressive and connected arrangements with reference to the land; and now the land has been so converted into the property or possession of the Railway Company, that it is impossible to obtain restitutio in integrum. There is no ground of title or right in the Railway Company, except possession obtained in this way, and none at all independent of the submission. The disability which they now call into their own aid only seems to me to complicate and aggravate their position; for if they never had a good submission, they got into possession by the act of one heir, but they have no title with the new heir; and though he is willing, they will not abide by the settlement arranged with his predecessor; and, therefore, are the Company, in this situation, to remain in possession for ever? It is impossible to say that that is a position in which they are entitled to say that the submission is to fall by the death of one of the parties. I hold the submission to have been for the purchase and sale of lands under which possession was to be given instantly, and I hold that that formed an integral part of the larger contract of sale. If it had stood there alone, I should have held that the death of one of the parties did not put an end to the submission; but I am quite satisfied with the footing on which your Lordship has been pleased to put it.

On the third head, I have never felt satisfied that I quite understood the ground on which the pursuers went. I concur in your Lordship's views as to the alleged prospective nature of the damage for which compensation was awarded. The pursuers have not made it clear to me upon what ground they rested this branch of their case; but it appears to me that a good deal in regard to it has been done by the arbiter, in such a shape as might have been done otherwise. If the operations are to be gone into, and allowances to be made to the tenants, then a certain result is to follow. If the operations are not to be gone into, then the proprietor is to obtain a larger compensation. The arbiter has provided for both alternatives, and I think that was quite within his power. I concur entirely with your Lordship's views on this branch as on the other branches of the case.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—Your Lordship having fully stated the facts of the case, I shall proceed at once to state the grounds in law on which my opinion is rested.

There are some things, with which the only question before us has been unduly confounded in argument, and which, being quite irrelevant to that question, it is desirable to clear away. In the first place, what are here challenged are only the interim decree-arbitral pronounced on 22d January 1848, and the final decree-arbitral pronounced 20th June 1850. These are the only things of which reduction is craved. The submission, on which these awards proceeded, is not challenged, and no reduction of it is concluded for. I therefore deal with the decrees-arbitral as pronounced under a submission which we must hold to be valid and effectual.

In the next place, I think we have only to deal with those reasons of reduction which have been pleaded. There is a long list of reasons of reduction, some stated absolutely, others alternatively; but several of them were not argued, and it was stated by the pursuers' counsel that those only are insisted in which were pleaded at the hearing.

And, thirdly, we are not to deal with any reason of reduction which is not on the record. I make this remark, because, at the last debate, a new ground of reduction was introduced, viz., that one of the parties submitters, the late Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart, was under disability to enter into such an arbitration, in respect he was an heir of entail. But, although it is stated incidentally in the 1st and 16th articles of the condescendence that Sir Norman was an heir of entail, this is nowhere set forth as a ground of reduction of the decrees-arbitral under challenge. As in this action there is only a challenge of the actings of the arbiter under an unchallenged submission, a very explicit statement of facts and pleas in law would be requisite to shew that the fact of one of the submitters having been an heir of entail disabled the arbiter from pronouncing decrees-arbitral under such a submission. Even if an action of reduction of the submission itself had been instituted on the ground of Sir Norman having been disabled by the entail of his estate from entering into it, the pursuers must have set forth on the record that the entail contained some prohibition which imposed such disability, and which is fenced with proper irritant and resolute clauses; for, unless this were the case, he would not have been disabled from even selling the estate,—far less from entering into a submission of this kind. And, when what is challenged is not the submission itself, nor any act of the parties submitters, but only the actings of the arbiter under the unchallenged submission, a still more particular statement and pleas would be necessary to shew how the fact of Sir Norman being an heir of entail has any relevancy to that challenge. But there is nothing of that kind in the record in this case. And, without setting the Judicature Act at defiance in a manner that would make our judgment a nullity, we are not entitled to take that plea into consideration. And, accordingly, it appears from the Lord Ordinary's note that this plea was not stated to him. It has been resorted to only at the last debate in the Inner House. And however it may be dealt with if an action of reduction of the submission itself and the proceedings following on it should be instituted on this ground, it is not within the present action; and I have formed and shall now state my opinion on the merits of this case upon that footing.

Of the pleas which are on the record, only four have been insisted in; and these, when viewed apart from the extraneous matters above mentioned, are not attended with difficulty. 1. The first is, that the submission, as is alleged, was limited in its endurance to three months, and that everything done after that date was null and void. It is said,—not that there is any such limitation expressed in the deed of submission itself, or at common law,—but that, under the 35th section of the Lands Clauses Act, such submissions as are there referred to come to an end if the final award be not pronounced within three months. Even supposing that to be the true construction of the enactment, the answer made to it is satisfactory,—namely, that the parties themselves enlarged the time. I think that they did so both by their prorogations and by their continued pleading after the three months. Even had there been nothing but such continued pleadings, it would have been sufficient, as was decided in the case of Fleming, 7th July 1827. In the present case, there was much more than such implied prorogations. In November 1846, long after the three months had expired, the parties entered into a new written agreement. There they narrate the agreement that had been originally entered into, and then they say,—“We have agreed that the arbiter shall have power to prorogate the same in future, as hereinafter set forth.” That is not all: they proceed thus,—“And the parties of new submit to the said arbiter within named the whole matters embraced under the within submission,” and so forth. Therefore, even supposing there had been originally introduced into this submission the three months limitation clause in the 35th section, here the parties, by a most express deed, departed from that limitation, and conferred on the arbiter express power to determine not only within a period which is construed as extending to a year, but within any further time to which he might think proper to prorogate the submission. This being the footing on which the parties contracted, their contract is binding upon them, unless it was unlawful; and there is nothing stated in the record which could prevent the parties from so contracting.

It is said that this was a statutory submission. Even had it been so, I would not be prepared at present to dissent from the view stated by Lord Ivory on this subject. All that the clause in the statute says is, that if the arbiter shall not determine the matter within three months, it shall be settled by a jury. It is not a necessary inference from this use of the words “shall be settled” that the parties may not enter into a submission, or may not prorogate as long as they think proper. The words “shall be settled,” are repeatedly used in this statute, but never in the sense of a statutory submission. The 19th section declares that the amount of the price and compensation, if not settled by agreement within twenty-one days, "shall be settled" in the manner prescribed for settling disputed claims. But could it be maintained that the parties, although after the lapse of that period they should come to an agreement as to the amount of the price and compensation, would not have power to settle in conformity with their agreement, and would be compelled either to have an arbitration, or a jury trial? I do not think that can be maintained. Again, the 28th section says,—“If, when a single arbiter shall be appointed, such arbiter shall die or become incapable to act before he shall have made his award, the matters referred to him shall be determined by arbitration, under the provisions of this and the special act, in the same manner as if such arbiter had not been appointed.” Now, could it be maintained, on the contingency here spoken of, that it would not be competent for the parties either to settle by agreement or by jury trial? These are two examples where the use of the words “shall be settled” do not warrant the construction put upon them by the Railway Company.

Although I make these remarks as to what might be the effect of this if it were a statutory submission, I do not think that this was its character. Indeed the parties appear to be agreed as to this,—the pursuers having pleas in law to this effect, and the defenders at the debate having pleaded on the same footing. It comprehended matters which were not competent in a statutory submission, at least under a compulsory statutory submission. It referred to those matters of accesses which are to be dealt with only under the Railway Clauses Act, and could be settled by compulsion only in the manner therein pointed out. But, whatever the original submission may have been, it was not under it that the decrees-arbitral were pronounced. This was done under the new submission entered into in November 1846, wherein the parties not only lengthened the time, but conferred on the arbiter himself the power to prorogue, which is not competent under a compulsory statutory submission. Then it stipulates that summary diligence should pass; a matter also incompetent under such statutory submission. The submission, therefore, under which the decrees-arbitral were pronounced not having been a compulsory statutory submission, and the parties having expressly authorised the prolongation of its endurance this reason of reduction is groundless.

2. The next ground is, that the submission expired by the death of Sir Norman. Here again I am not at present prepared to differ from the general views stated by Lord Ivory, although I think they are attended with difficulty. The submission was entered into for the purpose of ascertaining the price and damages arising under a compulsory sale of land. This was a contract of sale where implement had been given on one side by the pursuers being put into possession, and by certain things being done which could not be rescinded. And the principle under which it has been held that an arbitration entered into as part of a contract of sale subsists, notwithstanding the death of either of the contracting parties, may be applicable to a case of this kind.

I do not, however, rest my opinion on that ground. My ground is this: Although by the common rules of law, a submission may expire by the death of one of the parties, it is competent for the parties to stipulate that it shall not expire. That such stipulation is binding and effectual is settled by the case Ewing, 19th December 1820. The parties here did enter into such an agreement. They did so, not indeed in express words,—but by incorporating as the condition of their submission the rules of certain Acts of Parliament, including the Lands Clauses Act. One of the rules for conducting submissions is contained in the 24th section of that Act, whereby it is enacted that the submission shall not expire by the death of either of the parties. The case of Richardson, 31st January 1851, is an authority for holding that a submission framed in this way renders the rules so referred to and adopted conditions of the submission. Therefore the reason of reduction appears to me also to be groundless.

Other two grounds of reduction, although not anxiously pressed, were adverted to at the debate, and therefore we must dispose of them. They are stated on record only on the footing of the submission being statutory, and as I hold that assumption to be groundless—and indeed both parties, as already stated, pleaded the case upon this footing—it may not be necessary for me to say more as to the pleas. I will just, however, state what my views are on their merits.

3. One of these pleas is, that the interim award was qualified by the declaration—“Secundo, I find that on implement by the said Railway Company of preceding finding, the said Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart and the heirs of entail succeeding to him in the estates shall, out of the rents payable to him and them, grant to the several tenants under named, on the said estates of Carnwath, Lee, and Covington, the following annual abatements or deductions respectively," for the remainder of their leases which were current when the Railway Company entered into possession of the ground, and that pro tanto of the sums found due to them in a separate decree-arbitral. It is said to have been incompetent for the arbiter to pronounce his award on that footing. I see no incompetency in the matter at all; for what does the finding amount to? Several of these tenants, through whose lands the railway had gone, were entitled to damages, and they entered into similar submissions with the Railway Company to the same arbiter; and the arbiter having thus the whole matter before him, found the tenants entitled to indemnification, by getting annual deductions from the rents payable by them to the landlord. And that being so settled, it was properly found in the submission with the landlord that the compensation payable by the Company for these damages should be paid, not to the tenants who thus received their indemnification from the landlord and his successors, but to the landlord and his successors. The amount is assessed in the clearest and most precise terms, and there is no uncertainty about it.

4. The only remaining ground is, that the final decree-arbitral was incompetent, because there is the following finding:—(see supra, p. 530).

The compensation which is here awarded is for damage done to the defender's estate. His estate is a unum quid, and the damage done to that whole estate amounts to so much. That he is entitled to. The condition annexed to this finding was to protect the pursuers against the risk of any claims for indemnification from a different set of tenants, whose farms on the estate were not intersected by the railway, it not having been then a settled point whether or not parties in that predicament are entitled to compensation. But it is now settled that parties whose possessions are not touched by the railway at all are not entitled to compensation. The pursuers accordingly do not allege that any claim has been made, or even threatened, against them by any tenant of farms so situated. On the contrary, the pursuers expressly state on the record that no such damage is claimable. According, therefore, to their own pleading, this reservation in their favour was unnecessary. At all events, the introduction of that precautionary reservation in their favour cannot be founded upon by them as affecting the validity of the decree-arbitral.

The pursuers say that even the landlord is not entitled to compensation for damage alleged to be done to that part of his estate. But, with regard to him the case is quite different. His estate, being a unum quid, was damaged by the railway, and the compensation awarded was for the damage which the arbiter found to be done to the whole estate. That finding of the arbiter being final, cannot be reviewed by us; and there being no allegation in the record that the pursuers, or any other party, have any claim under the precautionary reservation in their favour, there is no legal ground for disturbing the decree-arbitral.

LORD DEAS.—I should be glad if I could concur in the judgment proposed to be pronounced by your Lordships. For, I daresay this action has been instituted mainly because the result of the submission has not been in accordance with the pursuer's views and expectations. But, after the best consideration I can give to the case, I have been unable to find legal grounds for holding the decreets-arbitral to be binding upon the parties.

Upon one point I have formed my opinion without difficulty, and that is, that the submission must be held to have been entered into under and with reference to the Lands Clauses (Scotland) Act, 1845, and other Acts incorporated therewith. The submission proceeds upon the narrative of that Act, and of the power contained in it to refer to arbitration, as well as on the narrative of the special Act. It refers to arbitration all claims for the value of lands taken and for injury done to the lands, by the works or operations of the Railway Company, "in so far as may be authorised by the foresaid Acts, including accesses, and every other claim competent to him" (the claimant) "against the said Company, declaring hereby that the arbitrator shall conduct the proceedings to follow hereon, and determine the matters submitted to him, in strict conformity with the rules and regulations, and the provisions and conditions specified in the foresaid Acts," and in the Lands Clauses Act and Railways Clauses Act; all of which Acts, your Lordships know, are incorporated with each other.

Railway Co.
v. Lockhart.

I cannot look upon this as anything else than a statutory submission. The main, if not the only, reason urged at the bar, for holding it not to be so, was that it includes all claims connected with accesses, which, it was said, can only be disposed of by the Sheriff or two Justices, under section 61 of the Railways Clauses Act. But I do not so read that enactment, which appears to me to contemplate the case of parties being willing, or having agreed, or of one or other of them insisting that the Railway Company shall actually proceed to execute the accommodation works necessary, and then a difference arising as to "the kind or number of any such accommodation works, or the dimensions or sufficiency thereof, or respecting the maintaining thereof,"—but that it does not prevent the parties from including, if they please, all claims connected with accommodation works, or arising from the want of them, in the statutory submission. And I am confirmed in this by the subsequent sections of the Railways Clauses Act, from 62 to 66 inclusive, with reference to works executed by the owner himself, and the effect, upon his rights, of his "having received, or agreed to receive, compensation for, or on account of, any such communications, instead of the same being formed," as well as by the terms of the Lands Clauses Act, which appear to me to connect the matter of arbitration, under section 20, with the matter of notice by the Company under section 17, so as to enable the parties to include in the arbitration everything included in the notice, which demands from the owners "the particulars of their interest in such lands, and of the claims made by them in respect thereof," and intimates the readiness of the Railway Company to treat for all such claims. Nor am I prepared to hold, supposing this were otherwise, that, by including in the submission all claims connected with accesses, or, (as the words of this submission may equally well import) all claims for compensation for the want of accesses, this would convert the submission into a common law submission, or prevent it from being a statutory submission as to matters falling within the statute. Acting upon it as a statutory submission the arbiter, in his minute of acceptance, appointed copies of the Acts of Parliament to be lodged with the clerk,—obviously for the purpose of being guided by these Acts in his proceedings.

And here it appears to me that in construing the deed of submission, we cannot lay out of view the fact, stated in article 1st of the revised condescendence, that Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart, who entered into it, and who is now dead, was "the then heir of entail in possession" of the estate, with reference to which the submission was entered into. It is true we have no plea in the record founded on the incapacity of an heir of entail to enter into any other than the statutory submission; and the plea tendered, to that effect, by the Railway Company, has not been received by your Lordships. But we have the fact stated and admitted that Sir Norman was the heir of entail in possession, which means, I think, the heir in possession under a strict entail; and is, indeed, just the phraseology used in the statute to describe such an heir. And, although, in the absence of any plea to that effect, we cannot set aside the decreets-arbitral in so far as they may be held to proceed upon a common law submission, on the ground that it was ultra vires of an heir of entail to enter into such submission, I do not think we can overlook either the fact or the law applicable to such an heir in considering whether the submission and the minute which followed on it, or either of them, can fairly be construed as a common law submission.

Now it humbly appears to me that to suppose Sir Norman to have entered into a common law submission for fixing the price of land taken and compensation for permanent injury to the entailed estate, would be to suppose him to have done what he had no power to do:—a supposition not readily to be adopted.

It is true that by sections 6 and 7 of the Lands Clauses Act it is declared lawful for the promoters to agree for the purchase, and for all parties, including heirs of entail, to sell to the promoters, the lands required for the purposes of the undertaking. But all this, as is provided in the outset of section 6, is "subject to the provisions of this and the special Act," and, consequently, to the provision in section 9 that the purchase money or compensation for lands, &c., to be purchased or taken from persons under disability, shall not, except where determined by the Sheriff or a jury, or by arbitration (meaning, obviously, I think, the statutory arbitration), or by a valuator appointed by the Sheriff, "be less than shall be determined by the valuation of two able practical valuers," one to be named by each party, and, if they disagree, then by a third valuator appointed by the Sheriff,—a certain declaration being to be annexed to the valuation, and the money being appointed to be consigned for the benefit of those interested.

No. 125.

Caledonian
Railway Co.
v. Lockhart.

It is also true that certain subsequent sections, commencing with section 17, are introduced by the words,—“And with respect to the purchase and taking of lands otherwise than by agreement, be it enacted as follows:” But this, obviously, does not imply that the preceding sections are applicable exclusively to lands taken by agreement. On the contrary, it has been seen, that the provisions of section 9 are applicable equally whether the lands be “purchased” or whether they be “taken from any party under any disability;” and, in either case, the price is to be fixed in one or other of the compulsory modes subsequently prescribed, or to be not less than shall be determined by a valuation made and certified in the manner already referred to.

Nor is it surprising that the Legislature should thus have protected the interests of heirs of entail. On the contrary, it would, I think, have been surprising had a power been conferred on the heir in possession to deal with and dispose of the estate without some safeguard being provided for the protection of the interests of subsequent heirs.

Holding, then, the submission to have been statutory, the next question is whether its nature was changed, and, if so, to what effect, by anything afterwards done by the parties?

If changed at all, this must have been done by the mutual minute of 6th and 9th November 1846:—for there is no other writing, under the hands of the parties, which can possibly be said to have had this effect.

Now, laying aside the technical objection, that Mr Rankine, who had signed the original submission as secretary, signs this minute as treasurer, and, assuming the minute to be duly subscribed on the part of the Railway Company, as well as by the owner, I am not able to regard it as having the effect, which is now attempted to be attributed to it, of converting the submission into a common law submission, and, at the same time, retaining, in that common law submission, all the provisions of the statute, except in so far as these were inconsistent with the extension of the period of endurance and with the indefinite power of prorogation said to have been thereby conferred upon the arbiter.

If the original submission was statutory, and if the heir of entail had no power to enter into any other than a statutory submission, it is not easy to suppose that the object of the minute, of 6th and 9th November 1846, was to convert this statutory submission, which was valid and binding on the parties, into a common law submission, which, being ultra vires of one of them, would be binding upon neither. It is still less easy to suppose that the object was to convert it into a common law submission, in which certain provisions of the statute, different from the common law rules, should be inferentially held to be embodied and others to be superseded or rejected;—a species of submission of which we have, hitherto, had no example, even between parties under no legal disability.

In place of its being clear that this was the object of the parties, I profess myself unable to tell, with any certainty, from the terms of this minute, what was their object. The minute narrates that “the within submission”—that is to say the statutory submission—had been prorogated by certain letters, on looking to which we see that the professed object of these letters was simply to prolong the time within which the arbiter, to whom they were addressed, might act upon his statutory powers. The minute farther narrates “that it is necessary again to prorogate the said submission”—that is to say the statutory submission,—“and that we have agreed that the arbiter shall have power to prorogate the same in future”—that is to say the same statutory submission; and then it goes on to the effect that they do prorogate the time to the day of , and of new submit the matter to the arbiter, and empower him to prorogate the submission at pleasure.

Judging from the language here employed, I should rather be disposed to say that the object was to engraft upon the statutory submission certain provisions not in the statute, than to say that the object was to enter into a common law submission which should embody some, though not all of the statutory provisions, by force of the consent of parties. Accordingly the minute is written upon the same sheet of paper with the statutory submission. It is admittedly not stamped as a separate

v. Lockhart.

and common law submission; and, while unstamped, I do not know how your Lordships can look at it as such. The fact of its being on the same sheet, and without stamp, rather indicates that the object was to prolong the statutory submission, than that the object was to enter into a common law submission, in which some things were to be borrowed from the statute, and others not.

I do not say it was beyond the power of parties, under no disability, to take this last course. But I think the deed of submission, by which it was done, would require to be expressed in very clear and appropriate terms. We have had no instance of such a deed; and it will be time enough to judge of it when it comes. I cannot hold, from the terms of it, that this minute was intended to form such a deed. Nor, if so intended, can I hold that the thing intended has been aptly and effectually done. Moreover, I should say that, even if regarded in the light contended for, the fair inference, from the terms of the minute, would be, that the endurance of the submission was altogether taken out of the statutory provisions, and brought under the common law, whether such endurance depended upon the lapse of time, or upon the survivance of the parties, or of the arbiter, for the deaths of whom, respectively, provision is made by sections 24, 25, and 28 of the statute. In dealing with the matter of endurance, must not the minute be held to regulate everything relating to the endurance, whether depending upon lapse of time or upon survivance? Can it be held that such language as is here employed would confer the power to prorogate, indefinitely, not merely on the existing arbiter, or arbiters, but upon any arbiter or arbiters who might come in his or their place, by force of sections 25 and 28 of the statute? I cannot arrive at that conclusion; and yet this must be implied in holding that the minute, although professing to regulate the endurance, does not regulate the endurance in all respects, as I think it must be held to do if it can be read at all as a common law submission, which embodies certain of the provisions of the statute, and not others.

The other view of it,—that the object of the minute was not to adopt some of the statutory provisions into a common law submission, but to engraft certain common law provisions upon an existing statutory submission,—would be still more difficult to extricate; for not only has this not been expressed, as it would require to be, in terms leaving no room to doubt the meaning of the parties, but I do not well see how it could be done at all consistently with the terms of the statute, which confers powers and privileges, and gives certain effects to the procedure under and in virtue of the statutory submission, but not to procedure under and in virtue of another and a different submission which the parties may compound out of the common law and the statute. Moreover, if common law provisions were held to be here engrafted on the statutory submission, the observation would again occur that the common law, being introduced to regulate the matter of endurance, must regulate that matter in all respects, whether depending on the lapse of time or survivance.

But the mere fact that we are left in doubt, on the face of this minute, whether it was intended to constitute a common law submission adopting some of the provisions of the statute, or to engraft certain common law provisions upon an existing statutory submission,—together with the fact that, whichever of these may have been intended, it is left in doubt to what extent the common law was to regulate, and to what extent the statute, seem to me to be sufficient to prevent us from holding that either the one thing or the other has been effectually done here. If the thing could be done at all, it would require to be done in clear and unambiguous language, very different from what is employed in this minute.

The minute might perhaps be construed as a new statutory submission;—reading “the day of ,” as authorising a new statutory period of endurance, and the power to prorogate as importing merely the statutory power to prorogate. But this would not serve the defenders’ purpose, and it is unnecessary therefore to speculate upon it. For supposing that the statutory submission could be, and had been, competently renewed, the submission would still have fallen equally by reckoning the time from the date of the minute, as by reckoning it from the date or acceptance of the original submission. If, again, the common law be the rule, there can be no question that the submission fell by the death of one of the parties.

If the minute did not effectually prorogate or renew the submission, it seems clear enough that nothing which intervened between the date of that minute and the date of the decreets-arbitral can have that effect. Even in a common law submission, neither the actings nor the letters or writings of agents, not specially authorised, would have this effect, or be binding on the parties. This (as Mr Parker observes, p. 83), has been repeatedly decided. The case of Fleming, referred to by Lord Curriehill, was a case in which both parties appeared personally, and pleaded before the oversman after the lapse of the period, and the party who afterwards objected to the award had written holograph letters to the oversman, asking farther delay. As to homologation of the decreets-arbitral, whether interim or final, it is admitted that nothing of that kind has taken place here. On the contrary, before the interim decreet-arbitral had been issued, or had even been seen by the Railway Company, Sir Norman Lockhart, who entered into the submission, had died, and the Railway Company had, thereupon, intimated their objection to all farther proceedings under it.

Nor can I give any effect to the argument that the submission, here, was part of a contract of sale, and so endured indefinitely, notwithstanding the death of either of the parties. It was not the deed of submission, but the statutory notice given by the Company, under section 17, of what they were to take, which formed the contract of sale. The price might, thereafter, be fixed in various ways. But the submission to fix the price, whether it be regarded as a statutory or common law submission, has no resemblance to an agreement to buy lands at a price to be fixed by arbiters, where the fixing of the price in that particular manner is part of the contract of sale, without which the contract cannot be carried into effect. It is only in cases of that kind that a submission forms and subsists as a part of the contract, in place of falling like an ordinary submission.

I have only to add, that, although the defender's whole argument was rested upon the footing that this submission was originally, or, (alternatively) that it became, by the minute of November 1846, either wholly or partially, a common law submission, I can find neither statement nor plea, upon the defender's part, to that effect in this record. On the contrary, his second statement bears that the submission was entered into in virtue of the Lands Clauses Act. I do not, therefore, see how a view so special as that which is now relied on could be given effect to, under this record, even if it were well founded in itself, which I humbly think it is not.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords, on report of Lord Handyside, Find that the 1st, 7th, and 8th pleas in law for the pursuers are not now insisted on, and that their 5th plea in law has been in effect already disposed of by the Court's interlocutor of 26th May 1855; and having heard counsel for the parties on the remaining parts of this cause, and considered the whole cause, and the procedure therein, Repel the reasons of reduction, and assoilzie the defenders from the whole conclusions of the summons, and decern: Find the pursuer liable in expenses to the defenders, with the exception of the expenses incurred in the discussion on the 1st plea in law for the defenders in May 1855: Find the defenders liable to the pursuers in the expenses of that discussion: Appoint accounts to be put in, and remit to the Auditor to tax the same and to report."

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Handyside
I.

IN 1841, the Earl of Buchan, through his agent, Mr Patrick Forbes, W.S., entered into communings with the Scottish Widows' Fund and Life Assurance Society, with a view to obtaining a loan of L.35,000 on redeemable annuity, secured over various estates of which he was heir of entail in possession. Policies of insurance had been previously opened on the Earl's life in various offices, to the amount of L.22,900. These were to be assigned in security of the advance, and new policies were to be opened to cover the difference, and the premiums were to be met out of the rents of the estates.

According to the defenders' averment, which, however, was not admitted, "the premiums of insurance on some of the policies became payable before any annuity could be received by the defenders under the bond to be granted by the pursuer, and in order to protect them from risk of loss," it was agreed "that it should be provided in the bond, that in the event of redemption there should be paid to the defenders, in addition to a fine of one quarter's annuity, twice the amount" of the proportions of the premium effeiring to the period between the time when they fell due and the completion of the transaction.

A redeemable bond of annuity and disposition in security in favour of the trustees of the Assurance Company by the Earl, with consent of Lady Buchan, was accordingly prepared, containing the usual clauses applicable to such transactions, the clause of redemption declaring—"that the foresaid annuity and the foresaid lands, &c., shall be redeemable by me from the said trustees, and their foresaids, . . . by my making payment of or tendering to them or . . . consigning for their behoof, but at my charge and risk, in the hands of the manager for the time of the British Linen Company, within their banking office in Edinburgh, the sum of

with all and every sum or sums of money which shall be due," &c. The bond contained no clause touching the fine of a quarter's annuity, or any other penal or other sum in addition to the provision for repayment of the money advanced, interests and premiums and charges, and no sum of redemption money. It was prepared by Messrs Gibson-Craig, Dalziel, and Brodie, W.S., the law-agents of the defenders; and after being extended, was by them laid before the pursuer, and signed by him and the Countess, his wife, in Edinburgh, on 28th January 1842, and the deed was immediately after ratified by the Countess.

The pursuer alleged, "the bond was then carried away by these gentlemen, the defenders' law-agents, and was never farther or otherwise in the pursuer's or in Mr Forbes' possession. The deed was continuously in the hands of Messrs Gibson-Craig, Dalziel, and Brodie, the defenders' law-agents, or of some party acting for the defenders, after the same was executed." And in Art. 17 of his condescendence, he alleged—"Sometime after 9th March 1842, the defenders, or their agents, without any authority from the pursuer or the Countess of Buchan, who was a consenter to the deed, and without the knowledge even of any person assuming to act on their behalf, took upon themselves to insert, or cause to be inserted, in the blank in the redemption clause, the words, 'Thirty-seven thousand seven hundred and fifty-eight pounds, fifteen shillings, and tenpence sterling.'"

Buchan v.
Scottish Widows' Fund

The defenders, on the other hand, alleged in their 8th statement of facts, "Although the bond of annuity was signed by the pursuer on the 28th January 1842, several policies of insurance had not been opened at that date, and the transaction was not completed till on or about the 11th March 1842. In consequence of all the policies not having been opened, and the requisite calculations having been made when the bond was signed, a blank was left in it for the amount of the redemption-money; but before the transaction was completed, and before the bond was delivered by Mr Forbes, the pursuer's agent, to the defenders, the blank was filled up by inserting the sum of L.37,758, 15s. 10d. with Mr Forbes' consent and approbation—the redemption-money having been calculated in the manner above explained,* and on the principles previously agreed upon. After the deed had been so completed in terms of the agreement, it was delivered by Mr Forbes, as agent for the pursuer, in exchange for the advance of L.35,000 on the 11th March 1842."

The money having been thus advanced, the interest and premiums were duly paid till 1852, when notice of redemption was given, and it was in the course of making the necessary arrangements for that purpose that the present dispute arose between the defenders and the pursuer's new agents, Messrs Graham and Webster, who contended that the Earl of Buchan was entitled to redeem on payment of L.35,000, which sum was accordingly assigned in the British Linen Company's Bank, and the Earl brought the present action of declarator of redemption on payment of the L.35,000, and reduction as regards the words L.37,758, 15s. 10d.

After unsuccessful attempts to get parties to make such admissions as to the facts as would enable him to dispose of the case without any proof being adduced, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the parties are at issue on the following questions, viz.:—Whether the bond of annuity, though signed by the pursuer on or about 28th January 1842, was left with his agent Mr Forbes, and was not delivered by him to the defenders till on or about 11th March 1842? Whether, before delivery, the blank in the bond, referred to in article 8th of the defenders' revised statement of facts, had been filled up, by inserting the sum of L.37,758, 15s. 10d., with Mr Forbes' consent and approbation? And that it is proper that proof before answer should be allowed on these points, allows a proof accordingly; and appoints the trial of these questions to take place before the Lord Ordinary without a jury, and that," &c.

The defenders reclaimed, praying that a proof generally of the facts still in dispute might be allowed, or that issues should be ordered with a view to a trial, which last course was adopted, and the pursuer proposed the following issues:—

1. Whether the words 'Thirty-seven thousand seven hundred and fifty-eight pounds fifteen shillings and tenpence sterling,' contained in the clause of redemption of the bond of annuity granted by the pursuer, the Right Hon. Henry David Erskine Stewart, Earl of Buchan, with consent of his wife, the Right Hon. Caroline Rose Maxwell, Countess of Buchan, to the defenders, bearing date the 28th January 1842, were inserted in the said bond subsequently to the subscription of the said bond by the said Earl and Countess?

This sum was made up as follows:—

 Earl of Buchan v.
 Scottish Widows' Fund
 Society.

" 2. Whether, on or about the 15th day of May 1852, the pursuer, the Earl of Buchan, duly redeemed the said bond, by making payment himself, or by another or others for his behoof, to the defenders of the sum of L.35,000?"

The defenders, on the other hand, proposed that the pursuer should take the following issue :—

" Whether the words, ' Thirty-seven thousand seven hundred and fifty-eight pounds fifteen shillings and tenpence sterling,' contained in the clause of redemption of the bond of annuity granted by the pursuer, the Right Hon. Henry David Erskine Stewart, Earl of Buchan, with consent of his wife, the Right Hon. Caroline Rose Maxwell, Countess of Buchan, to the defenders, bearing date the 28th January 1842, were inserted in the said bond, wrongously and contrary to the understanding and agreement of parties?"

The pursuer contended, that truly the onus lay here on the defenders, whose admissions were sufficient for his case, the deed having been admittedly signed blank as regards the sum in the clause of redemption; that blank and clause were not necessary to make the deed operative, and no one without the direct assent of the party was entitled to fill up the blank. As to that part of it the deed was improbativ; and to that extent it was not binding between the parties, and the defenders are deprived of it. It was not a question of statutory nullity under the Act 1696, but of a deed which may be available in consequence of personal exception. As to the delivery, the pursuer denied having ever seen it after subscription; and, indeed, it was not asserted by the defenders that he had been present when the blank was filled up. He did not even know when it was filled up. It had all along been in the control of the defenders—how, then, could he be called upon to prove anything as to the filling up? The onus lay on the defenders; if they founded on the words in that clause, they must prove that the filling up was with the consent of the pursuer.

The defender contended, that the onus lay on the pursuer of the reduction to prove the allegations in his 17th article upon which his action was based. The Earl of Buchan must have intended the blank in the deed to be filled up; and that being so, everything covered by the testing clause was obligatory upon him. This clause was so covered, it was part of a probative deed ex facie good. Such a deed may be written over a blank signature intended for a totally different purpose; still, if ex facie probative, the whole deed was good till reduction. Here the pursuer felt that it would not be sufficient to say that the deed was signed blank; and, accordingly, he does not rest with saying so, but avers that it was not filled up at the time of delivery, but was filled up afterwards improperly, and contrary to the understanding of parties. These allegations he must surely prove; and if he did, then he must cut down the deed altogether, and not merely to a certain effect. It was important to observe that this was a unilateral deed by the pursuer, and that the attempt to destroy its effect was made by the granter. This could not be done in the ordinary case without distinct allegation of fraud, or other tampering with the deed. It would not do for him to found upon their admission as to the deed having been signed blank. That admission was qualified, and the pursuer could only take advantage of it in the terms in which it was made—the party wishing to set aside a probative deed must take the issue and prove all that was necessary; and it would not suffice to prove the fact that the blank existed at the date of signature. The case was quite different from that of erasure—the proof of which destroyed a deed; but a whole deed might be written after signature, and still it might be good.¹

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have considered this case much, because it is important in itself, and because the principle should be fixed. If the case of Cairns had been reported fully, perhaps the present point might never have arisen, for it was decided No. 104.

 on the very point whether the issues should be framed in the manner Lord Buchan here proposes. The parties could give us no information, but I sent for Feb. 25, 1857.
 the pleadings. The question put in issue is, whether certain words were in the Earl of deed or not. This may be a step in the reduction, but it is not the reduction itself. Buchan v.
 The deed may have been blank when signed, and yet the blank filled up before Scottish Wi- delivery. In the ordinary case there is a question of fact put which exhausts the dows' Fund case, but in this case the effect of the fact alleged, if made out by the pursuer, Society.
 remains for the Court after the trial. Now I find the case of Cairns had been reported by the Lord Ordinary specially on this point—whether it was enough that the words were filled up after signature. The parties there had the benefit of the Lord Ordinary's opinion. The matter was before the Court, and we have before us the issue which was settled. But even without the case of Cairns I should have no difficulty in this matter. All the objections taken by the Solicitor-General to the course proposed on the other side proceed on a misapprehension. The pursuer says the redemption money was filled in after the signature; and, if so, the words are not authenticated by the testing clause. If that fact is established, what remains?
 That they did not subscribe a deed containing these words, and that the authenti-cation of their signature and attestation applied to a deed without them. It is no answer to say this is a very extraordinary case, for you are using this very clause of redemption, and it is a material part of your own case. What the result of this having been a blank at the time may be I do not know, and do not say. I do not say it may not be filled up by the Court fixing it on some principle as to the sum advanced, and so falling to be repaid, and therefore I do not think any answer is given by saying you are using that clause of redemption. That may be left blank, and yet the party may be entitled to redeem. The question is—Is the pursuer entitled to have it established that these words were not there when he signed the deed? It is admitted that the pursuer may make out that, but it is contended that he must also make out it was filled up without his authority. Now I do not think this onus lies on the pursuer. If the clause was blank at the time of signature, it rests on the party using that clause filled up after signature to show it was done with the knowledge and consent of the other. The consent may be proved in various ways, and that may be a very good answer in point of fact. It may turn out that after the necessary calculations there was a meeting with Mr Forbes, and the sum was duly filled up. It is, however, certainly the duty of the party who uses the clause so filled up, to shew that was done with good and sufficient authority. Everything required for the defence will come in properly in answer to the pursuer's issue.

The Lord Ordinary, in the case of Cairns, thinks the main thing is delivery. I differ from him entirely, and so did the First Division. I can conceive this objection to be good, even though the blank were filled up long before delivery. Suppose at the time the money was paid it was filled up without consent with the sum of L.35,000, but truly the redemption money was L.37,000, it might be quite open to have that corrected,—and there may be many grounds of objection besides that,— I do not think the question of delivery of much importance here. I do not see any difference between a bilateral and a unilateral deed in this respect. I think it would always be open to a party prejudiced to say, "that is not the deed signed."

Therefore, without the aid of the authority of the case of Cairns, I hold the issue proposed by Lord Buchan to be the correct one. Whether the defenders wish a counter issue or not, I do not know, but I should think their case was fully open to them without it. I do not think it necessary, but that rests with themselves.

LORD MURRAY.—I consider this the same as if there had been an erasure. To say it was blank, is as positive an assertion as to say there was something previously written. It is a matter of fact, and the great point is to put this as simply before the jury as can be done. I think the Earl of Buchan's issue ought to be allowed.
 I give no opinion as to whether the opposite party should also take an issue; but I rather lean to the view that it would be better for them also to have an issue. It would put the case more clearly before the jury.

LORD MURRAY absent.

LORD BUCHAN.—But for the special nature of the averments in the record, this is a very general and a very important question affecting the pro-bative force of deeds under the Act 1681. Both parties concur in stating that the

No. 126. deed was blank as regards the sum inserted in the clause of redemption when the Earl and Countess of Buchan subscribed it. That is the case both of the pursuer and the defenders; therefore, under the first issue, the pursuer truly undertakes to prove nothing but what is the admitted fact, and capable of instant proof. But the defenders say, esto that the deed was blank then, it was filled up before completion of the transaction and delivery of the bond, by the consent and with the concurrence of the pursuer's agent, and in implement of the prior agreement. The pursuers do not raise any question as to the relevancy of that defence, if such can be proved to have been the case, but they dispute the question of onus, and say that it lies with the defenders.

Feb. 25, 1857.
Earl of Buchan v.
Scottish Widows' Fund

No general question is raised as to the legal efficacy of a deed so executed with blanks in portions of it more or less essential or material. That is an important subject for observation. The Solicitor-General argued as if a case had never occurred of a deed being held good in every respect as a probative writ, except as to certain parts of it which had been left blank at execution of the deed. The case is not new at all in regard to unilateral deeds. In Kennedy, 1722, M. 1681, there was a blank left in a deed of entail at the time of execution, which was filled up by the agent under a special mandate from the granter. Two points were discussed—whether the deed was a good deed to any effect? and whether, supposing it were, the blank had been well filled up? The Court held that the blank was not well filled up, though the deed was good otherwise. This case was reviewed in the subsequent one of Abernethy v. Forbes, Jan. 1835, where a blank had been left in the substitution, but filled up afterwards. The Lord Ordinary, before whom the question in the first action was brought, reduced in toto the entail. Under this judgment, which became final, titles were completed in fee-simple, but the next heir came forward and brought a reduction reductivè, arguing that all the substitutions down to the blank were good, and that it was irrelevant as regards those called in the earlier parts of the clause, to say that there was a subsequent blank. This plea was ultimately successful, on grounds which will be found fully stated in the report of the decision in the House of Lords. Therefore, the circumstances which have arisen here are not novel. The deed may be perfectly good, although the portion of it left blank at subscription is ineffectual. The nicety is, whether the blank can be afterwards filled up by the granter, so as to secure that part of its probative character to any effect. But, in fact, that more general question is not before the Court; for the pursuer, though maintaining the deed to be bad quoad the clause of redemption, admits it to be good otherwise; neither does he raise any question as to the relevancy of the defence set upon if it be proved. The only real question thus comes to be, on whom does the onus lie?

On the general point argued, I quite agree with your Lordship in holding the pursuer to be right. If the character of probativeness is not made out as regards the whole deed, then quoad the part in regard to which it is not made out the probativeness of the writ is destroyed; but it may be restored, and it is admitted to be relevant to do so, to prove that the blank was filled up with the consent and authority of the granter.

And this brings us to the delicate part of the case. The defenders contend that the pursuer must show that the blank existed when the deed was issued; and I should have felt great reluctance in holding that the pursuer was not bound to put more in issue than merely this, that there was a blank in the deed at the date of subscription.

On the one hand, observe what a party might do. Having subscribed a probative writ blank, remotis testibus he fills it up with his own hand, and then tenders it as a good deed to one who receives it bona fide as being what it seems to be. Is the party to be entitled afterwards to come into Court with a reduction, and offer only the limited proof here proposed? I should say he must take an issue not merely that the blank existed at the time of subscription, but that it existed at the time of his having issued it. I see no other way by which a party accepting a deed in bona fide could be protected.

But, on the other hand, the question here presents itself under peculiar circumstances, from the state of this allegation in the record. In Cairns' case the deed was a bilateral one, and the simple fact at issue was, whether a blank existed at the date of execution. Hence the terms of the issue. It is different here, where the deed is unilateral. But then it is averred that Messrs Gibson-Craig, as agents of the defenders, prepared this deed and got it executed by the pursuers while this blank existed, and that this blank was afterwards filled up by them, with the consent of the agent of the pursuers, and in terms of the original agreement of the parties. The defence is based on this state of the facts, and it is for the defenders to take an issue to establish the fact to be as they allege.

I do not think that the case of the defenders, which is very special, could well or safely be tried under the pursuer's issue. Indeed, if they don't take a counter issue, they need not go to the jury at all. I think it indispensable that the defenders' case be brought before the jury by counter issues, so expressed as to keep open their whole case for proof stated in the record.

THE COURT then approved of the first issue proposed by the pursuer, and of the following counter issue for the defenders :—" Whether the words ' Thirty-seven thousand seven hundred and fifty-eight pounds fifteen shillings and tenpence sterling,' contained in the clause of redemption of the bond of annuity granted by the pursuer, the Right Hon. Henry David Erskine Stewart, Earl of Buchan, with consent of his wife, the Right Hon. Caroline Rose Maxwell, Countess of Buchan, to the defenders, bearing date the 28th January 1842, were inserted in the said bond, with the authority or consent of the said Earl and Countess, or of Mr Patrick Forbes, their agent, duly authorised by them to that effect ?"

Agent and Principal — Liability — Transaction — Electric telegraph — What is timeous notice of shipment of goods.—A firm in Glasgow were in use to employ certain commission agents in London to make purchases for them, and the practice was to ship the goods at London on Saturdays for Glasgow, but the practice varied as to the time of advising the shipment. A quantity of goods was shipped past business hours on a Saturday evening, and about an hour before the closing of the post. Notice of the shipment was sent by the first post during business hours thereafter, being Monday afternoon. The morning post of that day was before business hours. Before the notice was delivered, intelligence reached the Glasgow firm by telegraph of the loss of the vessel. The London agents had bought the goods and paid the price as for themselves. In an action by them to recover the price—Held (dis. Lord Deas, abs. Lord Ivory), that although it might have been possible to send notice by the post after business hours on Saturday evening, the agents were not bound to make the attempt: that they were not bound to communicate the shipment by telegraph: and that, as the notice posted by them would, in ordinary circumstances, have reached Glasgow in time to enable their constituents to protect their interests by insurance, if so inclined, the delay in advising the shipment did not amount to such culpa as would impose on the agents the liability for the loss.

HASTIE and HUTCHISON, commission agents in London, were instructed Feb. 26, 1857.
by Campbell and Dunn, merchants in Glasgow, by letter dated 4th October 1852, to purchase for them a quantity of imperial peas, to be shipped to Glasgow by first steamer. Hastie and Hutchison made the purchase on 6th October. The goods were delivered on the 12th October, and were shipped by the "Metropolitan" steamer, which sailed from London for Glasgow on Saturday the 16th October 1852. Hastie and Hutchison posted notice of the shipment by the afternoon post on Monday the 18th October. Since the 4th October no communication had passed between the parties on the subject. Before that notice reached Campbell and Dunn in Glasgow, they received a telegraph message intimating the loss of the steamer. Campbell and Dunn immediately repudiated all liability for the price of the goods, on the ground of Hastie and Hutchison's negligence in not sooner intimating the shipment. This action was then brought by Hastie and Hutchison to recover the value of the goods.

In order to render proof unnecessary, the parties agreed to the following minute of admissions:—1. That during the period from 1st January to 1st October 1852, the pursuers made six several purchases of peas on account of the defenders, which were respectively shipped at London on a Saturday, and the invoices and letters, or copies thereof in process, in reference to these shipments, sent by the pursuers to the defenders after the shipments, and dated on the Monday following these respective shipments, were despatched by the post leaving London on the afternoon of such Mondays. 2. That the pursuers have paid the price of the peas to the parties from whom they purchased the same on account of the defenders. 3. That the "Metropolitan" and "Cosmopolitan" steamers were advertised to sail from London every Saturday for Glasgow. 4. That these vessels, when in London, lie in the river directly opposite the pursuers' wharf, where the peas in question had been lying from the time they came to hand (12th October), and that they were put into the pursuers' barge, and sent alongside the "Metropolitan" about three o'clock p.m. on 16th October 1852; but that, there being several barges alongside before that of the pursuers, each taking its turn, it was half-past six o'clock before they were taken on board the "Metropolitan." 5. That on said 16th October 1852, the afternoon post from London to Glasgow closed at six p.m., but that letters could be despatched till 7.30 p.m. by payment of sixpence extra at the General Post Office, St Martin's-le-Grand, which is situated $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles from the pursuers' wharf, and one mile from their counting-house, which latter is $1\frac{1}{4}$ miles from the wharf, and is in the line between the wharf and the Post Office. 6. That the usual business hours of the pursuers is from 10 a.m. till 6 p.m., and these are also the usual business hours of parties in the same trade and business as the pursuers. 7. That the first post after that of the afternoon of Saturday the 16th October, was on the morning of Monday, the 18th October 1852, and before business hours, and was the post by which the manifest of the "Metropolitan" was sent by the London agents to the Glasgow agents of that vessel, and that any letter sent by that post would not have arrived in Glasgow till the morning of Tuesday, the 19th October, and would not have been delivered in Glasgow till about nine o'clock on the morning of that day. 8. That a telegraphic message was received in Glasgow about 9 o'clock on the morning of Tuesday the 19th October 1852, intimating the loss of the "Metropolitan." 9. That the "Metropolitan" having sailed from London, on Sunday, the 17th October 1852, would, in ordinary circumstances have arrived in Glasgow not sooner than the evening of the Tuesday, or on the Wednesday or Thursday following. 10. That it would have been impracticable to effect an insurance on goods on board the "Metropolitan" during the ordinary hours of business, on Tuesday, the 19th October 1852, the loss of that vessel being then known. 11. In all shipments by the pursuers to the defenders, being twenty-four in number, from January 1851 till October 1852, the defenders never insured except in one instance, and in that instance the insurance was effected through the pursuers. But the defenders effected numerous other insurances on grain during that period, conform to list produced.

It also appeared that the steamer had permission to make profit by towing when occasion offered, in the course of her voyage.

The Sheriff-substitute (Skene) pronounced the following interlocutor on 12th May 1854:—"Finds that the pursuers purchased the peas in question on the defenders' order, to be shipped to Glasgow by the first steamer. Finds that the said peas were delivered to the pursuers on the 12th of October 1852, and that the first steamer for Glasgow sailed on the 16th of the same month: Finds that there is no evidence that, either by the general custom of merchants, or by the special practice of the pursuers in dealing with the defenders, they were bound to intimate to the defenders the receipt of the peas, the purchase itself having been previously intimated in the usual form: Finds that the pursuers' previous practice in this particular appears to have varied according to the circumstances of each particular purchase, and that there was nothing in the circumstances of this particular purchase to render it incumbent on them to make such intimation in this case: Finds that as the pursuers could not be certain that the vessel by which they proposed to ship the peas would be able to take them until they were actually shipped, they were not bound to intimate their intention to ship, but merely to give business intimation of the actual shipment: Finds that the peas were in point of fact shipped by the Metropolitan steamer on the 16th October; but finds that owing to the quantity of goods which were being shipped by that steamer, the peas were not taken on board until half-past six o'clock, p.m., being half an hour after the vessel's advertised hour of sailing: Finds that when the peas were so taken on board, it was already past business hours, and that there was not then time to post an intimation of the shipment by that evening's post from London: Finds that the pursuers were not bound to post such an intimation on the Sunday: Finds that the post on Monday morning was before business hours: Finds therefore that the intimation admittedly posted by the pursuers on Monday afternoon, was timeous intimation of the shipment made on the previous Saturday evening: Finds therefore that although the news of the loss of the Metropolitan reached Glasgow by Electric Telegraph before the pursuers' intimation of the shipment, they, the pursuers, were in no degree to blame for this, and are not liable to the defenders for any loss which they may have sustained in consequence. Therefore decerns in terms of the conclusions of the libel, and finds the defenders liable in expenses," &c.*

The defenders appealed to the Sheriff-depute (Alison), who pronounced the following interlocutor on 15th November 1854:—"In respect notification of the shipment of the peas in question is admitted to have been given by the first post after business hours, which immediately succeeded the shipment of the goods; and in respect, neither by the custom of merchants nor the practice of the parties in this individual case, were the pursuers bound to give notice of the shipment at an earlier period, and the intelligence of the loss of the vessel was only anticipated by the Electric Telegraph, a mode of communication which it has never yet been decided a shipper of goods is bound to have recourse to, Dismisses the appeal, and adheres to the interlocutor complained of."†

* "NOTE.—This case is one of those which will probably now be of pretty frequent occurrence, in which injury has been sustained owing to a later message by Telegraph having outstripped a previously posted letter. Had the intimation of the shipment and the news of the loss of the vessel both been sent by post, or both by Electric Telegraph, the defenders would have received intimation of the shipment before the news of her loss could have reached Glasgow. As it was, however, the news dispatched last arrived first. Unless, therefore, it is to be held that nothing is intimated but a telegraphic message, which has not, so far as known to the Sheriff-substitute, been as yet held by any Court, the pursuers, who intimated by the first available post after the shipment had taken place, must be held as having fully done their duty in the matter, and the defenders must ascribe the loss they have sustained, through the early knowledge of the wreck of the ship, as an unfortunate but unavoidable consequence of the introduction into mercantile affairs of telegraphic messages."

It must be sent so as to enable the party to whom the goods were sent to protect himself by insurance. It was not mere matter of form or ceremony that the notice was to be sent by first post.¹ Remissness in this respect laid the responsibility on the shippers.²

Campbell.

The respondents (pursuers) pleaded:—That the only obligation incumbent on them was to intimate the shipment timeously, which obligation was implemented by intimation by the next post within business hours after the actual shipment. Farther, they intimated the shipment in the same manner, and within the same time as in former similar transactions betwixt the parties where no objection had been stated to the sufficiency of the intimation on any ground; they were therefore entitled to assume that the intimation on this occasion would be held sufficient. It was apparent also from the admissions by the advocates, that intimation by the earliest post leaving London after the shipment of which the respondents could possibly have availed themselves, would not have enabled the advocates to insure before the actual receipt of the intelligence of the loss of the goods in Glasgow. They could have therefore no legal ground for refusing to pay the price, founded on the alleged failure of the respondents to intimate by such post. The advocates not having been in use to insure similar shipments of goods by the respondents on their account, and having had no intention of insuring on the present occasion, were not in bona fide in refusing to pay the price of the goods on the grounds now pleaded by them.³

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—(After stating the facts)—A question of considerable nicety and difficulty arises as to the position of the pursuers in this case. It is said that according to the custom of dealing between them and the defenders, the pursuers were in use either to notify the shipment of goods by the afternoon of the day on which the shipment was made, or to send previous notice intimating their intention to ship the goods by that day's steamer, or what was much the same thing, by the first steamer after such notice, for it was known that the steamer by which the goods were sent was a weekly steamer sailing on Saturdays from London direct to Glasgow. On the occasion in question, there was no such previous intimation, and sion on 19th July last, in the case of Fleet Brothers v. Morison (ante, vol. xvi. p. 1122), and it appears to him strongly to corroborate the principle involved in the judgment now pronounced in this case. In that case, the order for the goods was received in London on the 28th of March, directing the goods to be sent by the first steamer; they were accordingly sent off by the steamer which sailed on the 30th, but the shippers did not send notice of the shipment till the evening post of the 31st, and the letter arrived at the purchasers in Aberdeen on the 2d of April. On the 1st the vessel had been wrecked on its voyage to Aberdeen, and the Court unanimously held the London shippers liable for the loss, as they had allowed a post to elapse without sending notice of the shipment. This was always what the Sheriff understood to be the rule, viz., that the shipper must not let the first post pass without intimating the shipment. But here the notice was sent by the first post after the goods were shipped, and the difficulty has arisen from the loss of the vessel having been communicated by the Electric Telegraph, and arriving first. No decision, however, has yet established the principle, that a shipper is bound to intimate a shipment by the Electric Telegraph, or that he has incurred laches if he intimates by the first post; and till the rule is pushed that length by the Supreme Court, an Inferior Court must abide by the former rule, that the shipper discharges his duty if he intimates the shipment by the first post."

it is said that if such previous intimation had been given, it would have enabled the defenders to make an insurance in Glasgow to cover their risk—that they were entitled to have an opportunity of doing so, but that the pursuers' negligence deprived them of such opportunity, and exposed them to the risk, without any option in the matter. On the other hand, on the part of the pursuers it was argued, that even without such previous intimation to the defenders they could have effected such insurance. It was stated that there was no practice of sending previous intimation of shipment—that, on the contrary, it frequently happened that the pursuers transmitted notice of a shipment of goods on Saturday by the post on the following Monday afternoon without any previous notice of their intention to ship the goods by Saturday's steamer; and they further state that no objection was taken by the defenders to their doing so.

The correspondence which has been submitted to us does not show any uniformity of practice in this respect. In some of their notices the pursuers say that they intend to ship by the first steamer—in some that they intend to ship by the steamer of Saturday. Sometimes there is no such previous notice at all. Sometimes it is said that the goods, if suitable to sample, will be shipped. On the present occasion there was no previous intimation—not even that the goods had come to hand, and were suitable for the purpose for which they had been commissioned. That also happened on a previous occasion.

It further appears that in their transactions with the pursuers, it was not the practice of the defenders to effect insurances. In one case they did appear to have had an intention of insuring, but it was not done, and their practice was not to insure. It is not unusual for commission agents to effect insurances on goods for behoof of their constituents. But there is no obligation upon them to do so. It requires a special order; and in this particular case we must hold that it was not the intention of the defenders that the pursuers as their agents, should make such insurances. The defenders do not contend that by not effecting such insurance there was any dereliction of duty on the part of the pursuers. The defenders do not aver that they had any intention of insuring this particular parcel of goods more than any others; and, in these circumstances, we have to determine upon whom the liability for the loss is to be thrown.

Now, in a case of this kind, where it is proposed to impose on the commission agent, who is not and never was the owner of the goods, but was acting for another party, the responsibility of the sea risk from the port of shipment to the port of destination, it is incumbent on the principal who seeks to impose that responsibility on the agent to shew that the agent has been guilty of such culpa as will subject him in such serious consequences. There is no absolute rule, so far as I know, which determines the date or period within which intimation of shipment of goods should be made by a seller or commission agent to his principal. The expression—"timeous intimation" used by the Sheriff-substitute, is a better expression than that used by the Sheriff. The Sheriff seems to fix a rule that the shipper must intimate the shipment by first post, but I cannot adopt that as the rule on the subject. It is the shipper's duty, however, to give timeous intimation of the shipment, and there are various cases from which we may gather what is the particular time—depending more or less on circumstances—within which such notice of shipment should be given. No case has been cited to us in which a commission agent has been a party, and we must therefore deal with the present as a case new in that particular.

There is no difference between the duty incumbent on an agent and the duty incumbent on any other shipper of goods. Certainly, where it is attempted to hold an agent responsible for his neglect in regard to such shipment, it must be shown that he has been guilty of culpa, just as in the case of any other shippers. Now, were these pursuers so guilty? They did not give previous notice of the goods having come to hand, or of their intention to ship the goods on that particular day. They had so acted on previous occasions, but having so acted, they may have been guilty of neglect. Still the occurrence was not unfrequent, and the defenders made no exception to the want of such previous intimation of the reception of the goods, or of the pursuer's intention to ship them. There is no rule that requires such previous intimation. It may be that the circumstances of some particular case would make it matter of neglect on the part of a commission agent

No. 127. not to avail himself of an opportunity of giving such previous notice when it was obvious that there would not be an available opportunity for giving timeous notice after the shipment. But I am not aware of any rule to the effect that there must be notice before shipment. The rule rather is, that shippers should lose no time in giving notice of the fact that they have shipped goods; and then they can afterwards give more complete information in regard to them. That seems to have been conformable to the practice here.

Hastie v.
Campbell.

But it is said that the pursuers here did not give timeous notice of the shipment. It is not made out that their not having given previous notice is such failure of duty, in the first instance, as would make them liable. It is not said that there was any undue delay in the shipment itself—that it was the pursuers' fault that the shipment was thrown so late. The shipment of goods depends on different circumstances—the number of applicants and the capacity of the vessel, and various things may occur to make it matter of uncertainty how long the shipment may take, but there is no allegation here of undue delay on the part of the pursuers in making the shipment. The pursuers say that if they were only to act during business hours, they would not and could not send notice of shipment till the post of Monday afternoon. If so, and if that was not a notice that in the ordinary course of events would be adequate or available to apprise their principals timeously of the shipment, then it may be held that it was the more incumbent on them to send previous notice of their intention to ship. In regard to notice after shipment, two or three stages have been pointed out at which such notice might have been given, but which opportunities were allowed to escape.

In the first place, it is said that the agents might, even after the completion of the shipment, have given notice on Saturday evening by sending a letter to the General Post-Office, and despatching it by extra payment. I scarcely think that that was incumbent on them. It is not very clear that it was practicable. The shipment was completed at half-past six. The bargemen would then return, and if there was a clerk to superintend the shipping, he would announce that the shipment had been completed. But, even if a person had been waiting in the counting-house at that time, it is very problematical, looking to the locality, whether it would have been practicable for him to have written a letter after such announcement, and despatched it in time for that evening's post. It has not been made out that that could have been done. But the shipment was completed after business hours at the counting-house. These business hours were not mere matter of regulation of the pursuers themselves, but they were the business hours of that locality, and the clerk was not expected to be at the counting-house after business hours. It is not said that it was usual to keep the office open after business hours and till after the shipment was completed, nor is it said that anything unusual was done in that respect on the particular occasion in question. The person whose duty it was to write the letter giving notice of the shipment, is not said to be the person whose duty it was to take charge of the shipment. Therefore, even if it had been possible, by any great effort, to have accomplished the writing and despatching of the letter by that evening's post, it was not a letter of that kind the failure to write and despatch which would constitute that degree of culpa to which I have referred. But it is not clear to my mind that such an effort, even if made, would have been successful.

The next post said to have been available was the post of Monday morning. That post was despatched before business hours on Monday, and some of the observations I have already made also apply to the sending of a communication by that post. The business machinery, so to speak, in the pursuers' office was not then in use and operation, according to the custom of trade in that locality—by which any communication by that early post could have been made. It is not said that notice was in use to be sent by the Monday morning's post, and for the obvious reason that, when notice could be sent by Saturday's post within business hours, it was so sent. So far, the post after business hours on Saturday evening, and before business hours on Monday morning, fall under the same category, and the observations I have already made equally apply to both.

Again, the steamer by which the goods in question were shipped, according to the usual course of its voyages, was due in Glasgow on the evening of Tuesday, or in the course of Wednesday or Thursday. There was an uncertainty as to the period of her arrival both from the nature of the voyage itself, and also from the permission she had to make a profit in towing other vessels, when occasion offered. She was not over due on Wednesday. That being so, a letter despatched by the pursuers on Monday evening in ordinary course of business, would be received by the defenders before the vessel was due. Now that was a communication available for the purpose of insurance in the ordinary course of events, and it is a communication which would have been available in this instance, but for the intervention of the electric telegraph.

Campbell.

Now the course adopted by the pursuers was this : They did not remain, or make their clerk remain, after business hours on Saturday evening in order to make the effort which, after all, might have been unavailing,—to send this letter to the General Post Office, for they did not know that even by half past six the shipment would be finished. Nor did they make their clerk come back early on Monday morning, in order to take advantage of the early post. But they had in view to communicate by the post by which they were in use to send notices of shipment,—which post, in ordinary course of events, was due in Glasgow before the vessel was due, and a notice by which was deliverable in time to enable the defenders to effect an insurance, if they so desired. That circumstance appears to me to go far towards the solution of this case, unless the intervention of the electric telegraph and its consequences are to be borne by the agents. I do not mean to say that that is not an element for consideration, and it has led me, in connection with other circumstances, to think that this is a very unusual case indeed, in the even balance of considerations it presents on either side. I do not mean to say that the facility of communication by electric telegraph is not an element which the pursuers ought to have taken into consideration. It ought perhaps to have stimulated them as shippers of these goods to promptness in their communication with their principals. It is a mode of communication which, in matters of business, parties will probably be forced to resort to in order to avoid loss, and, once in general use, it may become a matter of duty to employ it. But, in the meantime, if it had been used here, a letter despatched by the pursuers on Monday morning would have been equally unavailing with the letter despatched by them by the post of Monday afternoon. Therefore the only letter that could have been of use would have been a letter sent by the post of Saturday evening, and which would have been delivered in Glasgow on Monday morning—perhaps before the loss actually took place. But I do not think that the circumstances here are such as to amount to such a dereliction of duty on the part of the pursuers, and such culpa as would impose liability on them for not sending the letter by Saturday evening's post.

These considerations lead me to the conclusion that the defenders, seeking to subject the pursuers in the loss which here occurred, have not established against the pursuers such culpa or neglect as would impose on them liability for the loss of these goods. It is not clear to me that any loss or damage was sustained through their culpa. The defenders had not been in use to insure. They do not allege that they intended on this occasion to insure or—what was an equivalent—to transfer the goods with the risk upon them to a third party. Therefore that they did sustain loss and damage through the pursuers' fault does not appear. The case runs very close. It was possible for the pursuers, by giving previous notice, and by doing a thing which I do not think was incumbent upon them, but all of which were precautionary measures, to save this loss. But I do not think that, in the circumstances, the defenders have established a sufficient ground of liability against them.

LORD CURRIE.—The ground upon which the advocates withhold payment of the advances made for them by the respondents as the price, charges, and commission of the shipment in question, is that the latter failed to intimate the shipment ~~timely~~ to the former, and thereby deprived them of an opportunity of effecting insurance upon the goods, until such insurance had been rendered impracticable by accounts of the wreck of the vessel having been received by electric telegraph in Glasgow. This defence, when analysed, appears to resolve into a counter-claim of damages, because the respondents, having, in conformity with the orders of the advocates, safely shipped the goods on the afternoon of the 16th of October, and advanced the price and charges thereon, their constituents were

No. 127. bound to reimburse these advances, with the usual commission ; and the question is, whether they are entitled to retain these sums, to indemnify them for loss occasioned by the alleged failure of duty of the agents to give timeous notice of the shipment.

Feb. 26, 1857.
Hastie v.
Campbell.

I think that the respondents, if they did fail in that duty, and if that failure was the cause of the loss, are liable in such indemnification ; because there is incumbent on commission agents, as well as on vendors, an obligation to give timeous notice of shipments to the consignees of the goods, and to indemnify them for any loss created by failure to perform that duty—vide Sommerville's Trustee, 18th February 1807, Mor. App. Mandate, No. 4 ; and Andrew v. Ross and Park, 6th December 1810, F.C. But did the respondents fail to perform this duty? I think they did not.

In the first place, there was no such failure until the shipment was actually made ; because their duty is to intimate the shipment itself. There is no authority for holding that they are bound to intimate beforehand that the shipment is proposed or intended to be made. If they do so, this may sometimes render less strictness necessary in intimating the shipment after it is made, because it enables the consignees to effect insurance on the goods before they are made aware of the actual shipment. But if the shippers give timeous notice of the shipment after it is made, there is no failure of duty on their part.

In the next place, there was no negligence in not intimating the shipment by the afternoon post of Saturday the 16th October ; because that post was confessedly closed at 6 o'clock p.m., and the shipment was not concluded at that time, nor until half an hour afterwards. And although a letter might have been posted at the General Post Office before half past seven o'clock on the payment of sixpence, there was no neglect of duty on the part of the respondents in not so posting notice of the shipment, which was not completed until half-past six o'clock, because it has not been proved that, in the admitted circumstances, this would have been practicable. This could not have been done unless the bargemen, or other workmen, whose function it was to place the goods on board of the vessel, had proceeded after half-past six o'clock to the counting-house of the respondents, at the distance of a mile and a quarter, and had found it still open, and the clerks in attendance, and unless the latter, after receiving a report of the shipment, had written and booked a letter of intimation thereof to the advocates, and had transmitted it to the General Post Office at the still farther distance of another mile,—all within the short space of one hour from the moment when the shipment was completed. Not only is there no admission nor evidence that all this was practicable, but there is no probability that it was so, because it is also admitted that according to the usual business hours of the counting-house of the respondents, and of others in the same line of business, their counting-house would be shut before the hour when the shipment was completed ; and it is not even alleged that their counting-house remained open beyond the usual hours of business on the evening of Saturday the 16th of October.

In the third place, there having been no post from London on Saturday the 17th and the morning post of Monday the 18th having confessedly been despatched before business hours, and, consequently, before the counting-house was open, the letter of intimation could not be despatched until the afternoon post of that day, it was duly despatched by that post, and it duly arrived in Glasgow on the Tuesday forenoon. Hence there was no undue delay on the part of the respondents in intimating the shipment.

And, in the fourth place, that letter was despatched, and arrived in sufficient time to have enabled the advocates to effect insurance upon the vessel before the voyage, in ordinary circumstances, could be terminated ; because it is also matter of admission, that while the letter arrived on the forenoon of Tuesday, 19th October, the vessel could not arrive until the evening of Tuesday at soonest, until the Wednesday or Thursday following ; and the period between the arrival of the letter and the earliest period when the vessel could arrive, was amply sufficient to enable the consignees to effect insurance. And although they were unable to avail themselves of that period for this purpose, even if they had wished to do so, which is not proved nor alleged, this arose from the disturbed effect of a natural agency, which had lately been made available for the transmission of intelligence, but which, although it may probably be destined ere long to produce a great revolution in rules for transacting mercantile business, has not yet been recognised to this effect.

Hastie v.
Campbell.

In forming an opinion on the conduct of the respondents in this transaction, the prior usage of the parties is an element which cannot be left altogether out of view. The connection of principal and agent between the parties had subsisted for a year or two before the date of the shipment in question. The general usage during that period appears to have been that the shipments were made on Saturdays, and intimated by letters posted on the following Mondays. This usage having always been acquiesced in by the advocates,—it was not incumbent on the respondents to depart from this satisfactory usage on the occasion in question, when, in the circumstances, the ordinary rules of business did not admit of the intimation being earlier despatched.

It has been suggested that the respondents are liable for the value of the goods on a different medium, viz., that the periculum of the goods was by law imposed upon them qua commission agents, from the time when the same were delivered to them; that they were not relieved of this periculum until they intimated the shipment of them to the advocates; and that, as the goods were lost by shipwreck on the morning of Monday, and before the intimation was made, the loss must be borne by them. I think that this view of the case is quite untenable. A commission agent, although he is bound to exercise due care in preserving such of his constituent's goods as are placed under his custody in that capacity, and also in packing them so as to be fit for carriage,—is never subject to the periculum of the goods, so as to be liable for any damnum fatale which may befall them. Above all, it is clear that he is not subject to such periculum after he has placed them safely in the hands of the shipmaster or other carrier, by whom they are to be transported, so as to render the latter legally liable for them. And since the respondents did not fail in their duty to give timely notice of the shipment of the goods, I do not think they were responsible for their safety on the different ground that the periculum of the goods had been imposed upon them even before they were shipped, and that they had not been relieved of that periculum at the time of their being lost.

LORD DEAS.—This is a case not between buyer and seller, but between principal and agent. The advocates, who are merchants in Glasgow, employed the respondents, commission agents in London, to purchase for, and forward to them, a quantity of pease. On 4th October 1852, the respondents intimated that they had purchased, on account of the advocates, twenty quarters pease, at 48s. per quarter. The documents show that the respondents had purchased and paid for these pease in their own names. The respondents received delivery of the pease on the 12th, and they shipped them, to the advocates' address, on Saturday the 16th. They had not, in the interval, intimated their having received delivery. The pease had been sent, in the respondents' barge, alongside the vessel, about three P.M., but were not taken on board till half-past six; and this being after business hours, no notice of the shipment was sent that night, nor till the afternoon post of Monday—there being no post on Sunday, and the morning post of Monday being early and before business hours. The other and more minute facts are to be found in the joint minute and mutual statements and admissions in the record; and I need not repeat them here.

In these circumstances, the first question to be settled is, were the respondents under any obligation at all to give notice to the advocates, with a view to enabling them to insure against the perils of the voyage?

Now, I cannot doubt that they were. And it was not contended at the bar that they were not. They were bound to give notice, not only with a view to insurance, but for many other reasons:—such as, to enable the advocates to make arrangements for receiving and stowing the goods safely,—to regulate the extent of their purchases and sales,—and to resell these very goods, if they thought proper, before they reached them. The obligation to give notice for these purposes—including the purpose of insurance, where it is not the practice for the shipper himself to insure—is not confined to cases of seller and purchaser, but arises out of, and is incident to, the relative position of mandatory and mandant, however constituted, though the precise degree of diligence prestable may not be the same in each

No. 127. relation, or in every case. The present is a case in which the mandatory was paid for his trouble by commission on the price—a contract mutually beneficial, and, therefore, inferring responsibility for culpa levis. I infer from the report of the case of Hoog, 24th July 1754 (M. 10,096), that the question there was between principal and agent, although the decision went upon principles equally applicable to seller and purchaser. But, be this as it may, I refer to the case here for the observations of Lord Kames, who says—“If regular advice may possibly prevent loss, it clearly follows that it is the duty of the factor or merchant to give advice. In the present case this step was indispensable, where the commission was to send the goods either to Greenock, Leith, or Borrowstounness; for, without advice, the defenders could not know where to expect their goods. This point being established, the only remaining point is, whether the factor’s neglect of duty will subject him to every damage that might possibly have been prevented by a regular advice, or only to the damage which is the necessary consequence of neglecting to give advice? This question is easily determined; for I take it to be a general rule in all other affairs, as well as in commerce, that neglect of duty subjects the party to every risk and to every damage, except what he can show must necessarily have happened though he had done his duty.”

Hastie v.
Campbell.

On this principle, accordingly, in Somervail’s Trustee v. Core, 18th February 1807, F. C., a shipowner in Liverpool, who also acted as port agent, was held liable for the value of goods lost at sea, because he had not intimated the shipment to the owner of the goods in Edinburgh, although the shipowner pleaded the fact that he charged no commission as port agent, and, consequently, came under no obligation as such. The report bears,—“A majority of the Court held that the circumstances of Somervail’s situation subjected him to the duties of a port agent as well as carrier of the goods; and hence that he was bound to intimate the shipments, and that his failure therein made him liable for the value of the china lost.” The difference of opinion here was, as to whether Somervail could be considered a port agent. There was no difference of opinion as to his liability if he was so.

In Andrew v. Ross, &c., 6th December 1810, F. C., the party held liable was a commission agent. No doubt, in that case, he was paid by the sellers. But the liability dealt with was that of a shipper, be he commission agent or seller; and the report bears,—“It was held to be an essential part of the shipper’s duty to give notice immediately of the shipment, that the purchaser might have it in his power to take measures for his safety.” The case of Arnot v. Stewart, 25th November 1813, F. C., seems to have been similar.

Holding the obligation of notice to attach to the shippers, and leaving out of view, in the meantime, the precise extent of this obligation, two things appear to me to be clear enough—1st, That the course of dealing here between the parties does not tell one way or the other. The letters, taken in connection with the admissions, make this clear enough, and I need not go into the particulars. Indeed in Somervail’s case, it was held of no moment that he had made previous shipments—five or six in all,—without having intimated any one of them, and that of the owner of the goods had made no complaint. 2d, That the advocates’ custom not to insure is immaterial in this question. This also must have been assumed in Somervail’s case, for the owner could not have been in the habit of insuring where the practice was to give him no notice of the shipments. In the case of Andrew was urged, without effect, that the fact ought to enter deeply into the question that no insurance was ever made or thought of by the purchasers in their previous transactions with the same house. In the case of Johnston and Sharp v. Baillie, 2d June 1815, it was again held irrelevant that the purchaser had not been in the habit of insuring. And in the case of Arnot, there was a short period after notice during which the purchaser might have insured; but even this was held no answer to the mistake of giving erroneous notice, because, as Lord Meadowbank said, for a short time the purchaser might choose to stand his own insurer. Indeed, the principle of the thing is clear enough without authority. The shipper has no right to be for granted that the purchaser will not insure, though he never did so before. He may be alarmed by stormy weather,—by hearing of unusual losses at sea,—or may have become more timid or more cautious than formerly. Nor am I prepared to say that it will necessarily excuse the fault of the shipper if the purchaser chooses to stand his own insurer.

The true and only question of difficulty here is, when ought the notice to have been despatched? No. 127.

Now, supposing this were a case of seller and purchaser, I am not prepared to say that, in no circumstances whatever, is it incumbent on the seller to give notice of his intention to ship goods before actual shipment. The obligation on the shipper is to give due notice, and the question what is due notice must often depend on circumstances. Still less am I prepared to say that, in no case, is it incumbent on a commission agent to give notice to his principal of his intention to ship goods before actual shipment. There may sometimes be reasons for delaying till actual shipment on the part of a seller which do not apply in the case of a factor or commission agent; and I do not say that the reasons may not sometimes be the other way. But in the case of seller and buyer there is no intermediate step of importance to be taken between the purchase and shipment. In the case of principal and agent there is the intermediate step of delivery to the agent for behoof of the principal, which may, in some circumstances at least, be a step of importance. Here the respondents bought the pease in their own names. They stood purchasers on the face of the sale-notes and accounts. The receipts for the price acknowledged the price to have been paid by the respondents as purchasers. Until they intimated the shipment to the advocates, there was nothing to enable the advocates to distinguish and claim these specific pease as their property, rather than any other similar quantity of the same sort which the advocates might have chosen to forward to them. In these circumstances I think it clear enough that, until notice of the shipment here, the goods were at the risk of the respondents. If they had perished by fire while in their warehouse they would have perished to them. They might have relieved themselves of this risk by intimating to their constituents that they had received delivery of the goods for their behoof. I do not say they might not also have thereby relieved themselves of the perils of the voyage, if they had either said they meant to forward the goods by the first steamer, or this had been implied and understood from previous usage;—for, in that case, the advocates might easily have effected an insurance in such terms as would have covered the loss even if the goods had been sent by the second and not the first steamer. But they gave no notice whatever of having received delivery till they intimated the shipment. It is true they intimated the purchase; and it was contended that this enabled the advocates to have insured by ship or ships, and relieved the respondents from all obligation to give further notice of the shipment, because the practice had been to ship by the first steamer thereafter. But this argument tells against and not in favour of the respondents. For it is founded on the footing that notice fell to have been given before actual shipment, whereby the advocates would have been enabled effectually to insure, and leaves only the question whether notice of the purchase was equally available for this purpose with notice of delivery? Now, I cannot hold it to have been so. Until the goods were delivered to their agents, the advocates could not know when they would be so delivered, and could effect no insurance without imminent risk of its proving abortive,—a risk which would not have been likely to arise had they insured after notice of delivery, in reliance on the goods being shipped by the first opportunity.

Now I do not say the failure of duty which renders the respondents liable is their failure to intimate that they had received delivery. But, when I come to consider the question whether the notice of shipment here was timely, I cannot lay out of view the fact that the respondents might have intimated the delivery without the slightest prejudice or inconvenience to themselves,—and that such intimation might have enabled the advocates to avoid the loss. It cannot be laid down absolutely in all circumstances, that notice by the first post, despatched within business hours after shipment, will be sufficient. There may be a case in which notice, to be timely, must be before shipment, or before the shipment is completed. And, if ever there is to be such a case, it appears to me to be the case which occurs here. The respondents knew that the shipment was to be made in the afternoon of a Saturday, and they must be held to have known that the completion of the shipment might be delayed till after business hours. They knew that the voyage was usually short. They knew that no post left London within business hours till Monday morning. They knew that there was such a thing as the electric telegraph, such used by merchants, particularly on the occurrence of serious misfortunes, such

No. 127. as the loss of a ship. And, knowing all this, it appears to me that, if ever there can be a case in which it is to be held the shipper's duty not to await the actual completion of the shipment, this was that case. The goods were sent alongside the steamer about three o'clock in the afternoon. I can see no reason why, at that time, if not sooner, notice should not have been despatched of the intention to ship that day,—in which case, as I have already said, an insurance might have been made which would have covered the loss even if the goods could not have been received on board that week's steamer, but had been sent by the next steamer. I think it was the duty of the respondents not to have delayed this notice after, at all events, they had sent the goods to the wharf; knowing, as they must be held to have known, all the things I have mentioned. Even the existence of the electric telegraph cannot be laid out of view. For a party who fails in his duty may be bound to know what the consequences of a telegraphic announcement by third parties may be, although he may not be bound to send notice by telegraph himself,—a point not necessary to be considered here. Taking this view of the matter, it is unnecessary to enter into the more critical question as to the duty of sending to the post-office after the shipment had been completed,—although I am not prepared to say that this might not be incumbent on a party who chooses to ship goods after business hours, and thereby entails on the owner of the goods an unusual risk. But, whether by reaching the post in this way, or by posting a letter before six o'clock intimating how the matter of shipment then stood, I think the respondents were bound, in the circumstances, to give notice by the Saturday evening post at latest, which might have enabled the advocates to insure.

Strang.

If this be so, the consequence is clear, that the respondents are liable for the loss, and that it is irrelevant to inquire whether, had the notice been given, an insurance would have been actually effected which would have covered the loss. It is enough that it might have been so. The question is not, in the ordinary sense, a question of damages, whether it occurs with a commission agent or a seller. If it were so, the owner would have to prove that he would have insured, which he has never been held bound to do. The question is, with whom was the risk of the goods? Here I think it was with the respondents, whether we view them as proprietors of the goods, which they were on the face of the documents, or as agents neglecting their duty.

DAVID STIRLING let certain subjects to Adam Strang on a lease of some duration. The latter having made certain alterations, Stirling presented a petition to the Sheriff to have him ordained to restore the subjects to their original state, and interdicted "from making any alterations" without h consent. Strang pleaded, inter alia—1st, That the conclusions were truly declaratory, and therefore not competent in the Sheriff-court; and, 2d, That the pursuer had himself produced and founded on documents, which showed that many acts complained of had not been performed.

Stirling v.
Strang.

The whole facts of the case sufficiently appear from the interlocutors in the Sheriff-court, which were brought by advocacy by Stirling before the Second Division of the Court of Session.

The following is the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute (Bell):—" Finds that the conclusions of the action being ad facta præstanda and for interdict, it has been competently brought in a summary shape; therefore repels the first preliminary defence; repels also the second preliminary defence, in as far as prejudicial, reserving it quoad ultra: Finds, upon the merits, that the defender is tenant under the pursuer of the Hogganfield Bleaching Works, ground adjoining thereto, and other parts and pertinents, under a lease for ten years, at the annual rent for the first five years of L.337, 10s., and for the second five of L.370, and he is taken bound by the said lease, of which No. 4 is a copy, 'at his own expense to maintain and uphold, during the currency of the lease, the whole buildings and machinery thereby let, and to leave the same in a good and sufficient condition at the expiry of the lease, ordinary tear and wear excepted, and for that purpose to make and timeously execute all necessary repairs thereon:' Finds that a hurricane which occurred on the 6th February last blew down and destroyed some of the chimney stalks and roofs of the said works, and did other serious damage to them: Finds that the pursuer having refused to repair said damage, the defender did so at his own expense: Finds that in the course of making these repairs, he caused to be inserted in the roof of the calender-house, for the sake of obtaining more light, a window, which had not been in the former roof, 40 inches long by 23 inches wide; he also, in rebuilding an inside stair in said calender-house, caused it be made 39 inches wide instead of 27½ which was the former width, and to suit this increased width of stair, he enlarged the opening in the upper floor of the calender-house, where the stair enters upon it, to the extent of 11½ inches; and he also caused to be made in the ceiling of the upper flat of a new stove, for the sake of ventilation, eighteen openings, 16 inches long by 5 wide, which, however, were merely through the ceiling, leaving the roof untouched: Finds that a remit having been made of mutual consent to Mr William More, engineer, to report on the extent of said operations, and how far they altered the previously existing state of the premises, the reporter has in his report, No. 9, described them as above, and has also stated,—' I find that they are improvements which have added to the value of the subjects, by rendering them better fitted for the purposes for which they are let:' Finds that the defender has likewise so far altered a machine in the boiling-house, by extending its frame-work, and introducing into it rollers considerably larger than the original rollers; but the reporter states in his said report,—' The frame thus altered or widened remains unimpaired, and supplied with new rollers, whereof the continuance may be only temporary or permanent as shall be desired, while the old displaced rollers are preserved unaltered and capable of being replaced at pleasure:' Finds in point of law upon these facts, and especially considering that the operations complained of, with the exception of that upon the machine, were executed when rebuilding and repairing the damage which the storm had done, that they were not inconsistent with the possession and use of the subjects as let to the defender on lease for some years, and at so considerable a rent, and the defender is not bound forthwith to restore the premises, in the particulars condescended on, to their precise former state,—it being open to the pursuer, should he be so advised, to insist on the defender closing up the window and openings for ventilation, and restoring the machine to its former shape, at the termination of said lease;

therefore, in as far as the conclusions ad facta præstanda and for immediate restoration are concerned, sustains the defences, and dismisses the action; but, as regards the conclusion for interdict, in respect the defender has made certain limited and not very material alterations, without previously consulting the pursuer, grants interdict as craved; and, in the whole circumstances, finds no expenses due to or by either party, and decerns."

Both parties having appealed, the Sheriff-depute (Alison) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds it proved by the report of Mr More, that the greater part of the alterations complained of by the pursuer were made by the defender, and that they were chiefly internal, not external repairs, and were an improvement on the edifice in question, not the reverse: Finds, that by the tack, the defender was taken bound to make and timeously execute all necessary repairs on the buildings and machinery let to him, and that he was to be allowed L.50 for ameliorations thereon: Finds that the alterations in question were made during the execution of the repairs by the defender of damage occasioned by the great hurricane in February 1856, on the places damaged thereby, which the landlord had declined to repair: Finds, in point of law, that the repairs, as set forth in the report by the reporter, were within the defender's powers, as a tenant of the premises under a lease of ten years duration, with such clauses, and at a rent of such an amount, and when obliged by the landlord to repair at his own expense the damage occasioned by a damnum fatale notoriously of extraordinary severity, seeing the alterations did not amount to an inversion of the subject, and did not materially change its character or condition: Therefore, adheres to the interlocutor appealed from, so far as it refuses the application for instant restoration of the premises to the condition in which they were before the said changes were made; and in the application for interdict against similar changes de futuro, finds it premature to pronounce ab ante on any such alterations, some of which may be within the tenant's power, and some beyond them, and which must be judged of when it is seen what future alterations are intended to be: Therefore, recalls the interlocutor so far as it grants interdict de plano against any future changes, reserving to the pursuer to bring an application for interdict when the case arises, in the event of changes beyond the defender's powers being commenced or persisted in, and reserving to the pursuer his plea at the close of the lease, that the alterations made, if approved of by him as improvements on the subject are, if on heritable subjects, to be left there without compensation or claim of damages, or that he may, at his pleasure, insist on the defender restoring the premises into their original condition at the conclusion of the lease, and to the defender his pleas thereagainst, as accords: Alters the interlocutor appealed from, so far as inconsistent with these findings: Finds the defender entitled to expenses, subject to slight modification: Modifies the same to three-fourths of the defender's costs, including the expense of Mr More's report; allows an account," &c.

In the Court of Session, the objection to the competency of the proceedings before the Sheriff was withdrawn, and it was argued for Stirling that as to damages done, Strang was admittedly liable to repair them,—but that instead of merely restoring the status quo, he had proceeded to suit his own convenience to make alterations which were clearly ultra vires of a tenant to make, and it was no defence to say that the premises were improved thereby. The landlord was the best judge of that, and could refuse to have the character of his subjects altered. Farther, the tenant having at his own hand made such alterations, the landlord was entitled to interdict against his continuing so to do.¹

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Common sense and sound reason equally support the interlocutor complained of. A party at a very large rent takes a lease for ten years for the purpose of carrying on a trade which he could not carry on to advantage without improvements. He required more light, and so made a window in the roof, and when a hurricane blew down a chimney stalk, which did a great deal of damage, he took advantage of the opportunity, when repairing it, of improving an inside stair, and making arrangements for better ventilation. There is no changing of the character of the buildings here—these operations are within his power;—no doubt, if the landlord can at the end of the lease instruct injury to the premises, he may get redress, but he certainly is not entitled to have things restored just now. As to the prayer for interdict against “any alteration,” the Court can never consent to that, while holding that the tenant has done nothing but what is within his power. The landlord must just complain in the usual way, if he does anything in excess of it.

LORD MURRAY concurred.

LORD WOOD was absent.

LORD COWAN.—I concur also. This case is quite different from those at Airdrie and Glasgow. There entire alterations in the character of the premises were made. Here we have nothing of the kind. Mr More, I see, was a referee named in the lease. No objection was made to the remit to him, and his report, to my mind, is conclusive.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—“Advocate the cause: Find, in respect that the objection to the competency of the form of process being a summary petition has been withdrawn, it is unnecessary to pronounce any finding on that plea: Find that the operations complained of, having been executed by the tenant for his own convenience in the course of his trade, while he was making large repairs rendered necessary by the effects of a very violent hurricane, were fairly made by him in the exercise of his rights as tenant of manufacturing premises under a lease for ten years; and therefore of new refuse the desire of the original petition, and decern; of new find the advocator liable in the expenses found due in the inferior Court, and also in the expenses incurred in this Court,” &c.

Entail—Process—Consents to a disentail defeating provisions in a marriage-contract to a wife and younger children sustained.—In a petition for disentail, one of the consenting heirs was the petitioner's son and heir apparent who was married, and whose eldest son, a pupil, was the only other heir whose consent was required. In his marriage-contract the heir-apparent bound himself, on succeeding to the estate, to grant a bond of provision in favour of his younger children, in accordance with powers contained in the deed of entail. The petitioner was also a party to the marriage-contract, and bound himself, in accordance with powers in the deed of entail, to infest his son's wife in a liferent locality. A tutor was appointed to the pupil, and consented to the disentail. The petitioner and heir-apparent now executed a bond and obligation for infesting the heir's wife in the lands to be disentailed, and she and the parties at whose instance it was provided in the marriage-contract that execution should pass for the provisions in favour of her and the children of the marriage, executed a discharge of her liferent right in the estate, and consented to the disentail without “any provision being made for the provisions specified in the marriage contract, or for the protection of the parties entitled thereto.” *Held (dub. 1st DIVISION.
 L.

THE petitioner was heiress of entail in possession of the estate of Dinwoodie. Part of the estate was sometime ago sold by authority of the Court under a private Act of Parliament, and this petition was now presented for authority to disentail the remainder of the estate. The heir-apparent was the petitioner's only son, Wellwood Maxwell, who was above twenty-five years of age, and his eldest son, a pupil, was the heir entitled to succeed next to him. These were the only parties whose consents were required. A tutor ad litem was appointed to the pupil, and a remit having been made to Mr Mackenzie, W.S., he brought under the consideration of the Lord Ordinary certain eventual provisions under the marriage-contract of Mr Wellwood Maxwell, which the reporter considered might affect the entailed estate, and the heirs of entail.

By the deed of entail executed by the petitioner's grandfather, it was provided "That it shall be lawful to the said Alexander Maxwell, my son, or to any of the heirs of entail above specified, to grant bonds to their children, other than the heir, for payment of competent provisions to them, and for such sums of money, bearing interest only from the granter's death, as shall not in the whole exceed, in case there be one child other than the heir, one years free rent of the foresaid entailed estate; in case there shall be two children, other than the heir, two years free rent; and in case there shall be three or more children, other than the heir, three years free rent of the said lands and estate, after deduction of all feu-duties and other legal and annual burdens, excepting land-tax, and liferents to wives and husbands hereafter allowed."

It was also declared by that deed, that it should be lawful to, and in the power of the "said heirs of entail successively to provide their wives and husbands respectively, and the respective wives and husbands of their presumptive heirs, in a liferent locality of any part of the lands and estate above disposed, not exceeding one-fifth part of the rent of the said entailed lands and estate for the time,—that is, at the time the locality is granted."

Mr Mackenzie stated that it thus appeared, that although the heir of entail in possession was entitled to grant a jointure, by way of locality, in favour of the wife or husband of his or her presumptive heir, no power was given to grant provisions to the children of any such presumptive or apparent heir, and that the heir in possession of the entailed estate could only grant provisions in favour of his or her own younger children.

Accordingly, in the marriage-contract entered into between Mr Wellwood Maxwell, the petitioner's apparent heir, with the petitioner's consent, on the one part, and his present wife, with consent of her father, on the other part, although the petitioner bound herself to infeft Mrs Wellwood Maxwell in a liferent locality, yet she undertook no obligation whatever in regard to the provisions made for the children of the marriage.

By that deed Mr Wellwood Maxwell, her son, obliged himself, his heirs, executors, and successors whomsoever, to pay to the child or children of the marriage, other than the heir, the sum of L.2000, if there should only be one child; the sum of L.4000, if there should be two; and the sum of L.6000, if three or more children—reserving to himself to divide and apportion these provisions among the children, if more than one, in such manner as he should think fit.

In this contract Mr Wellwood Maxwell further bound and obliged "himself, in the event of his succeeding to the foresaid entailed estate" (Munshes) "by the predecease of his said mother, to grant, immediately upon his succession, and put on record, a bond of provision in favour of the child or children of his said intended marriage other than the heir who will succeed No. 129.

disponed by the deed of tailzie aforesaid, of the full amount of the provisions which by the said tailzie the heirs of entail successively in possession of the said estate are empowered to settle upon their younger children: But declaring, as it is hereby expressly agreed upon by the contracting parties, and declared, that, upon his implementing the said obligation, it shall be in the power of the said Wellwood Maxwell to curtail, modify, or entirely cancel, as he shall think proper, the specific provisions hereinbefore conceived in favour of his foresaid children."

In regard to these burdens which were set forth in the affidavit, there was produced to Mr Mackenzie a discharge by Mrs Jane Home Jardine or Maxwell, wife of Mr Wellwood Maxwell, with consent of, and by, the parties at whose instance it was provided in her contract of marriage that execution should pass for the provisions in favour of her and the children of the marriage, discharging the lands of Dinwoodie of her liferent right therein. Also a bond and obligation by the petitioner and Mr Wellwood Maxwell, for infesting Mrs Wellwood Maxwell, in liferent, in the lands of Munshes and others; and a deed by Mrs Jane Home Jardine or Maxwell, and by the parties at whose instance it was provided in the contract of marriage that execution should pass for the provisions to Mrs Maxwell and the children of the marriage, narrating the obligation contracted by Wellwood Maxwell in favour of his wife and children, and consenting to the disentail, "without any provision being made for the said provisions specified in the said marriage-contract, or for the protection of the parties entitled thereto."

Mr Mackenzie reported that the procedure was regular and proper, and that in his opinion the petition might be granted.

On 10th February 1857, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having advised with the Court, remits to Mr Whitefoord Mackenzie to report whether it appears to him to be necessary that any further steps should be taken to protect the interests of the younger children of Mr Wellwood Maxwell, the heir-apparent to the entailed estate, in consequence of the provisions secured to them by the marriage-settlements of their parents."

Mr Mackenzie reported that the obligation in Mr Wellwood Maxwell's marriage contract being merely personal would be evacuated by his predeceasing the petitioner; and there seemed to be no way in which the petitioner could make these provisions to the younger children effectual burdens upon the entailed estate, even if she were inclined to do so. That in his opinion the petitioner's right to disentail, with the proper consents, could not be taken away by such an obligation executed by her apparent heir, and that none of the clauses of the statutes, prohibiting heirs from giving consents in certain circumstances, were applicable to the present case, so as to affect the validity of the consent given by Mr Wellwood Maxwell. He could not find that any case similar to the present had been before the Court. He referred to the cases of Dickson and Agnew,¹ and stated that the rights which the children of Mr Wellwood Maxwell might have under his marriage-contract, could not in any circumstances suffer, except to a trifling extent, by the proposed disentail, while in a certain event they might gain by it; and, in the whole circumstances of the case, "it did not appear to him to be necessary that any further steps should be taken to protect the interests of the younger children of Mr Wellwood Maxwell, the heir-apparent

M'Clelland v.
Bank of Scotland.

The Lord Ordinary reported the case.

LORD IVORY.—I should have liked to hear more upon the clause of the statute as to the consent of the parties to the disentail. My doubt is, whether a person can give a consent of himself which shall defeat the entail, and defeat those provisions in his own marriage-contract in favour of his children. Then I am not sure how far the consent of the wife is available, where she is not represented by some one to protect her individual interest. I merely intimate a hesitation upon these points. It would have been satisfactory to me to hear farther argument upon the application of the statute; for I am not satisfied that, even in the case of an apparent heir, he can give consent to a disentail, which is to affect his children as this does; and I doubt whether the heir in possession can disentail to the effect of disturbing provisions in favour of the widow of the heir-apparent.

The Solicitor-General (Maitland), for the petitioner, referred to the case of Nairne, 11th March 1851, ante, vol. xiii. p. 956.

LORD IVORY.—My doubts have not risen into certainties; but while I am not willing to stand in the way of the rest of the Court, my mind is not satisfied on the subject.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords, on report of Lord Mackenzie, Ordinary, interpose their authority, authorise the petitioner to disentail and acquire in fee-simple the said lands of Dinwoodie and others, with the pertinents mentioned in the petition: Approve of the instrument of disentail thereof in process, interpose their authority thereto, and grant warrant for recording the same in the Register of Tailzies, along with this decree, and decern."

Bankruptcy—Transaction—Right in security—Statute 2 & 3 Vict. cap. 41, sect. 37—Valuation of security.—A copartnership granted a cash-credit bond to the Bank of Scotland, which was declared to be binding on all the partners who subscribed it, for sums drawn by the firm, notwithstanding any future change in the partners. In security of this cash credit two of the partners conveyed their separate heritable estates to the Bank by dispositions ex facie absolute, but qualified by back letters bearing that they were in security, and that upon the debt being paid the Bank were bound to reconvey the property to these two partners or their representatives. These two partners having died, a minute was entered into between their trustees and the remaining partners, by which these last agreed to purchase the estates of the deceased partners (conveyed in security to the Bank), the price of the one estate being credited in the books of the firm as capital advanced by the deceased partner—the price of the other to be paid by ten yearly instalments—and the first estate being conveyed in security of the price of the second. Upon the whole price being paid, the trustees were bound to not then reinvested, their obligation was the right to claim reconveyances from this transaction. Scotland.

THE following narrative is taken from the note appended by the Lord Ordinary to his interlocutor:—"The estates of Dugald M'Phail and Company, merchants in Glasgow, and of Angus M'Phail, as sole partner of that company, were sequestrated under the Bankrupt Act on 13th March 1856. A claim was lodged by the Bank of Scotland to be ranked on the sequestrated estates for a debt on a current account, amounting to L.18,596, 2s. This claim was rejected by the trustee by a deliverance which bears,—'In terms of the 37th section of the Act 2d & 3d Vict. c. 41, which requires a creditor holding a security over the estate of the bankrupt, before being ranked, to place a specified value on such security, and deduct the same from his debt, the claimants are required to value and deduct from this portion of their claim, or from the whole amount of their claim, the security held by them over certain heritable subjects in James Street, which form a portion of the estate of the bankrupt.' Against this deliverance the Bank of Scotland have appealed; and the only question raised under the appeal is, whether the security held by them over the heritable subjects in James Street is a security over the estate of the bankrupts, which requires to be valued and deducted in terms of the 37th section of the statute.

Bill-Chamber.

In October 1850, the firm of Dugald M'Phail and Company consisted of five partners—Dugald M'Phail senior, Duncan M'Phail senior, and Dugald M'Phail junior, Angus M'Phail, and Duncan M'Phail junior—the three last being all sons of Duncan M'Phail senior. At that time the company, consisting of five partners, obtained a credit with the Bank of Scotland for L.13,000, and a cash-credit bond in the usual form was granted to the Bank, which was declared to be binding on all the partners who subscribed it, for sums drawn by the firm, notwithstanding any future change in the partners. In security of this cash-credit the Bank obtained two dispositions to heritable subjects in James Street, both dated 7th October 1850. One of these was a disposition by Duncan M'Phail senior to a property belonging to him; and the other was a disposition by Duncan M'Phail senior, and Dugald M'Phail senior, to subjects of which they were joint proprietors. The heritable subjects in these deeds had not been conveyed to the firm of Dugald M'Phail and Company, established in 1850, and they formed separate estates belonging to Duncan M'Phail senior, and Dugald M'Phail senior, as proprietors in their own right. As the dispositions to the Bank were absolute in form, they were qualified by back-letters, bearing that 'they are truly intended as a security for whatever is or shall be due to the Bank by our said firm for the time being, of whomsoever composed;' and it was declared that 'on full and final payment to the Bank, before sale of said subjects, of all sums due by our said firm, the Bank shall be obliged to reconvey to me, the said Duncan M'Phail senior, or my heirs, representatives, or assignees, the foresaid subjects conveyed by my said disposition to the Bank, and further to reconvey to us, the said Dugald M'Phail senior, and Duncan M'Phail senior, equally between us, or to our heirs, representatives, or assignees, the foresaid subjects conveyed by us, the said Dugald M'Phail senior, and Duncan M'Phail senior.' Thus Dugald M'Phail senior, and Duncan M'Phail

No. 130. senior, conveyed their separate estates as a security for the debt of the company; and upon that debt being paid, the Bank was taken bound to convey the property to the two elder M'Phails or their representatives.
 Feb. 27, 1857. M'Clelland v. Bank of Scotland.

After the date of this cash-credit transaction, on the faith of which the Bank made advances, several changes occurred in the constitution of the firm by the deaths of individual partners. Dugald M'Phail junior died in December 1851, Duncan M'Phail senior died in July 1853, Duncan M'Phail junior died in October 1854, and Dugald M'Phail senior died in May 1855. Angus M'Phail then became sole partner of the Company, which was sequestrated on 13th March 1856. It is under the bankruptcy of this last firm, of which Angus M'Phail was the sole partner, that the present question arises.

"After the death of Duncan M'Phail senior, in July 1853, new arrangements were made between the parties, under two separate deeds. One of these was a new contract of copartnery for the firm of Dugald M'Phail and Company. The other deed was a minute of agreement entered into in June and July 1854, between the testamentary trustees of Duncan M'Phail senior and Dugald M'Phail senior, on the first part, and the said Dugald M'Phail and the other partners of the company, on the second part. By this minute the second parties agreed to purchase the whole heritable property which belonged to the said deceased Duncan M'Phail senior and Dugald M'Phail senior, or in which they were interested, including the heritable subjects which had been conveyed to the bank in October 1850, on certain terms and conditions. The price of the heritable subjects belonging to Dugald M'Phail senior, which was estimated at L.6432, 4s. 6d., was 'to be credited to him by the said second parties, in the books of their firm, as capital advanced by him in their copartnery, executed or about to be executed, of the subjects which had belonged to the said deceased Duncan M'Phail senior, estimated at L.20,445, 5s. 4d., with the instalments, the first nine of L.2000 each. It was also agreed 'that the said heritable subjects should, along with the said capital, be conveyed to the said trustees, in satisfaction of the price of the payment of the price of the said subjects.

"After setting forth these considerations, the said deed proceeded 'upon the price of the said subjects, the said Dugald M'Phail being duly credited to him with the price of the subjects purchased from the said deceased Duncan M'Phail, and all interest due to him by the said second parties, to make, grant, subscribe, and deliver, to the said second parties, or to their assigns, the subjects therein described. It was further agreed 'that the said subjects should not be re-invested in the said subjects until the period for granting the said obligation on the first part of the said subjects shall be sufficiently implemented by the said second parties or their foresaids, the right of the said bank, in virtue of the said deed, to be acknowledged.'

"It was likewise made an express condition of the instalments of the price of the subjects, that the trustees of Duncan M'Phail should, on each term of payment, it should be in the power of the whole or such part of the subjects conveyed, or

Dugald M'Phail, in security of the payment of the price of the subjects hereby agreed to be sold by them, as will completely satisfy and pay, not only the instalment or interest so in arrear, but also the whole balance of the said price then remaining unpaid, and that either by public roup or private bargain.'

M'Lelland v.
Bank of Scotland.

"It is admitted that only one of the stipulated instalments of the price was paid to Duncan M'Phail's trustees. No disposition to the subjects was ever granted to the second parties, and they never were in a condition to demand any such disposition or any assignation to the reversion of the property held by the Bank, and so matters stood at the date of the sequestration in March 1856."

In these circumstances the trustee having disallowed the claim of the Bank, the Bank appealed, and pleaded;—That the heritages held by them in security were not the property of the bankrupts, and therefore the Bank was not bound to deduct their value from the amount of their claim. That the property of the subjects in question was not conveyed to the bankrupts by the arrangements concluded between the trustees of Duncan M'Phail, senior, and Dugald M'Phail, senior, on the one part, and the partners of the company on the other, or by anything which followed upon it; and, at any rate, as that arrangement was concluded without the consent or knowledge of the appellants, the rights previously acquired by them in these subjects for their security could not be thereby prejudiced or impaired.

The trustee pleaded;—That the property contained in the Bank security was part of the estate of the bankrupt, and therefore that the deliverance of the trustee ought to be adhered to.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor on 28th January 1857:—"Finds that the heritable subjects in James Street, Bridgeton, Glasgow, over which the appellants hold a security, form no part of the estate of the bankrupts, and that the appellants are not bound to place a specified value on that security, and deduct the same from their debt of L.18,596, 2s., in terms of the 37th section of the Act 2 & 3 Vict. chap. 41: Therefore recalls the judgment of the trustee so far as complained of by the appellants, and remits to him with instructions to rank them for the said debt of L.18,596, 2s., and pay the dividend thereon, and decerns: Finds the appellants entitled to the expenses incurred by them in this appeal," &c.*

* "NOTE.—This is a question of considerable importance, but the Lord Ordinary does not think it attended with difficulty.—(His Lordship then narrated the facts as above given.)

"Now, it is obvious, that when the dispositions were originally granted to the Bank in October 1850, they were not securities over the property of the bankrupts, but securities over the separate estates of Duncan M'Phail, senior, and Dugald M'Phail, senior. If this view be correct, the whole question necessarily turns on the effect of the minute of agreement entered into in June and July 1854. Looking to the terms of that minute, the Lord Ordinary cannot adopt the argument of the trustee, that the heritable subjects conveyed to the Bank thereby became the property or estate of the bankrupts, so as to require to be valued and deducted under the 37th section of the statute. No doubt there was an agreement whereby the subjects were to be conveyed or transferred in certain events, to the firm of Dugald M'Phail and Company. But there were conditions precedent, which never were fulfilled. Not only was the price agreed to be paid for Dugald's subjects to be credited to him, but the price of Duncan M'Phail's subjects, amounting to L.20,445, 8s. 4d., was to be paid to his trustees, before the first parties could be called upon to divest themselves by granting a conveyance. Till both these things were done, no conveyance of any kind was to be granted to the second parties; and for this obvious reason, that even the property of Dugald M'Phail was by the agreement to be supplied as a security to Duncan M'Phail's trustees, for payment of the price of the subjects belonging to them. There was thus a contingent per-

No. 130. The trustee reclaimed, and pleaded;—That there was nothing in this case to take it out of the ordinary rule. The Bank had got a security for their debt. Why, therefore, should they not be bound to value it? Although the subject originally belonged to an individual partner of the firm, that firm had since purchased the subject burdened with that security. Therefore were they not in the same position as the original proprietor? The estate now belonged to them. It was like any ordinary transaction. Although burdened, the estate passed to the purchaser; and the right to it, therefore, being vested in the bankrupt,—had it risen in value the trustee would unquestionably have been entitled to buy it. In regard to the subject which belonged to Dugald M'Phail, that was sold to the firm on conditions which had now been fulfilled. The company were, therefore, entitled to demand a disposition to the estate, and the trustees were bound to grant it. It was immaterial that the estate was conveyed in security to Duncan's trustees. Such a conveyance, being at the request of the firm, was equivalent to sonal obligation, whereby the first parties were bound to grant a conveyance to the subjects, or an assignation to the reversion at a future period in the event of all the instalments of the price being paid. But as the instalments were not paid at the bankruptcy, the proposed transaction and sale became inoperative, and the radical right to the subjects remained with the first parties, substantially in the same way as if no such agreement had been made.

"The expression, 'estate of the bankrupt,' in the 37th section, appears to the Lord Ordinary to mean nothing more than the estate carried by the sequestration and available as a fund of division among the creditors. He thinks the principle of the enactment is that no one should be admitted to claim in the sequestration who holds a security over the property of the bankrupt, which but for such security would go to the trustee for general distribution, without valuing and deducting such security from his debt. Here the appellants are not in that situation. They hold no security over any property belonging to the bankrupt firm, of which Angus M'Phail is the sole partner. For the heritable subjects conveyed to them in security belonged to the two elder M'Phails, and the radical right subject to that security remains with their representatives, who in this question may justly be regarded as cautioners to the Bank for the debt of the bankrupts.

"In the argument for the trustee it seems to be assumed that by the minute of agreement the right of the elder M'Phails and their representatives to the subjects in question was voided and extinguished, and that there was a valid and effectual transference of that right to the bankrupts. Nothing, however, can be more erroneous than this notion, which is repugnant to the whole provisions of the deed.

"Suppose there had been no bankruptcy, and that the debt to the Bank, under the cash-credit, had been fully paid,—to whom would they have been bound to reconvey the subjects held by them in security? Not certainly to the firm of Dugald M'Phail and Company, or Angus M'Phail, the sole surviving partner, but to the representatives of the two elder M'Phails, according to the express obligation in the back letters. Again, suppose that in consequence of the bankruptcy of the firm, and of Angus M'Phail, the Bank had compelled the representatives of the two elder M'Phails to pay up the whole debts under the personal obligation in the cash-credit bond,—who would have been entitled? Plainly, the representatives of the belonged to them, and had never been. Even if the Bank, in place of ranking in debt from other funds of the bankrupts, were, the result would have been precisely the Bank reconvey the subjects directly express obligation undertaken by them depriving the representatives of the two under the minute of agreement.

"On these grounds the Lord Ordinary, erroneous, and ought to be recalled."

a conveyance by that firm itself, and therefore both on the ground of contract—of the price of the subject having been paid—of possession, and of a conveyance sub modo, the trustee was entitled to claim Dugald's estate as part of the estate of the bankrupt. As to Duncan's estate, it no doubt stood in a different position, for only one out of ten instalments of the price had been paid; but suppose the price all paid, the property would belong absolutely to the firm. It belonged to them now, though burdened with the price. And as to the payment or non-payment of the price, the difference was, that in the one case the purchase was made with a condition precedent, in the other it was not. It could not be said that the firm had no right to the property at all. If so, the Bank, holding a security over it, were bound to value and deduct that security.

M'Lelland v.
Bank of Scotland.

Pleaded for the Bank of Scotland;—At the date of the bankruptcy the position of parties was this:—Duncan and Dugald M'Phail, senior, having a personal claim, in a certain event, to the subjects conveyed by them in absolute property to the Bank, had entered into a transaction, binding themselves that they would convey or assign over that personal claim in a certain other event, and at a certain after period, to the bankrupt. Now, what was in the bankrupt? Was it possible to say that he had any right whatever to this heritable estate? Section 37 might be so construed as to embrace in it all classes of anomalous cases connected with heritable estates. But the construction of what was "the estate of the bankrupt," could not be made to embrace such a contingent interest, and attach to subjects which would not be carried by the adjudication of the trustee. The statute declares that the adjudication carries all that is vested in the bankrupt; and therefore whatever right was in the bankrupt under this agreement, was necessarily vested in the trustee. What was that right? It was a right to go on and pay the instalments stipulated by this deed of 1854, for the period of ten years; and in the event of his being able and willing to perform this obligation, he would then be entitled, on the lapse of that period, to an assignation to a personal claim for a reconveyance of the subject. That was the whole right vested in the trustee; for it was all that was vested in the bankrupt. It was an abuse of language to say that the Bank had got a security over that right, which was transferred to the trustee by his confirmation. The Bank had got nothing of the kind. They had got a security in the form of an absolute conveyance, which vested them in property to which the trustee had no right; with reference to which he had no title, nor beneficial interest of any kind whatever—no inchoate right, in virtue of which he could demand a conveyance of the estate with or without conditions; and therefore the right vested in him, and which was in the bankrupt, was nothing more than a right depending on the fulfilment of a certain number of conditions, defeasible altogether on the slightest failure to perform them; for the moment an instalment should fall into arrear, the parties to this agreement might proceed to sell, and therefore the right was nothing more than an uncertain, contingent, defeasible, possible, and prospective right to ask for an assignation to a personal right ten years hence. That could not be said to form any part of the real estate of the bankrupt, or to be in any way connected with it. The heritable estate never was in the bankrupt. The extinction of the security in the Bank would not reinvest him. He had no radical interest in it. He never was the owner of the estate over which the security extended. Again, where a creditor holds certain obligants bound to him in several subjects in security of a debt, he is entitled so to deal with them as to charge against them all, and operate payment out of the aggregate obligants and subjects; and provided he does not take more than his debt, he is entitled to exhaust them by stating his debt in full against each. The only exception is where the subject of the security is the estate of the bankrupt, or a portion of it; then that security must be valued and deducted, because the whole estate of the bankrupt, of which that security forms part, is a fund for equitable distribution amongst all the creditors; and it would be unfair to them first to exhaust that portion of the estate which forms the security, and then come against the remaining available funds for the whole amount of the debt. If that security does not form a portion of the bankrupt's estate—that is, the estate in the hands of the trustee for distribution—the principle of equity does not apply. Therefore the question comes back—Is the Bank carrying away part of that estate which would be divisible amongst all the creditors, but for their preference? Suppose the Bank were to discharge this security, it would not enlarge the fund for distribution. The security, therefore, was not one which the Bank were bound to value.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a question of considerable importance, and of some nicety. The Bank of Scotland are creditors of a sequestrated company, and claim upon the estate for a debt of L.18,596, 2s. The trustee objects to that claim, on the ground that the Bank hold a security for their debt, which security they are bound to value and deduct; and he has refused to rank the Bank on the general estate until they have so valued and deducted that security. The question which we have to decide is, whether that is a security over the estate of the bankrupt, in the sense and meaning of section 37 of the Bankrupt Act? If it be so, then it is not disputed that the Bank are bound to value and deduct it; and in that case it is competent for the trustee and creditors to take the security at the value the Bank put upon it. On the other hand, if it be not a security over the estate of the bankrupt in the sense of section 37, but is a security over a separate estate belonging to another party, or not belonging to the bankrupt, which, for shortness, I may call a collateral security, then it is not contended by the trustee that the Bank are bound to value and deduct it. The history of this transaction appears to be substantially this:—(His Lordship then narrated the facts as above detailed. He then proceeded as follows:—)

The dispositions by Dugald M'Phail, senior, and Duncan M'Phail, senior, to the Bank, formed in their constitution a separate security not over the estate of the company, who were to operate on the cash-credit, but over the estates of Dugald and Duncan M'Phail individually, and as third parties. The property so conveyed to the Bank was then occupied by the company as tenants, and was thereafter occupied by them till 1854, although on what footing or by what title they occupied it from 1853 till 1854, whether they paid rent for that year or not does not distinctly appear, and is not of much consequence—the fact being that the company were in possession of the premises in question at the date of the bankruptcy.

I am inclined to concur in the conclusion at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived. This property was fully vested in Duncan M'Phail, senior. It belonged to him individually. He conveyed it to the Bank by absolute disposition, and there were letters constituting a back-bond, by which the Bank were taken bound, on the company's debt being paid, to reconvey the property to the two elder M'Phails, or their representatives. But the Bank held the property as by absolute conveyance, and the property so conveyed to them was a separate estate from the estate of the company. A security so given is in a different position, and of a different value in the contingency of a bankruptcy, from a security over the property of the bankrupt himself; for it is one which the holder of it is not bound to value and deduct, whereas a security over the property of the bankrupt carries that quality on the face of it. The money difference may be very material; for if the creditor is bound to value and deduct a security in such a claim as this, he can only claim the balance from the bankrupt estate; whereas, if he is not bound to value and deduct the security, he first exhausts the value of the collateral security, and then ranks for the whole debt on the bankrupt estate. Therefore the money difference may be very considerable. In this case the property was vested in Duncan M'Phail, who conveyed it by absolute disposition to the Bank. What follows? The security was applicable to any debt to be contracted, or that might become due, by any copartnery carrying on business under the firm of Dugald M'Phail and Company, whoever the partners might be, or whatever change of partners might afterwards take place. Therefore it was a security for this debt of L.18,596, 2s. ; and, but for the minute of 1854, there can be no question that matters would have remained on this favourable footing for the Bank, that they would have been entitled to avail themselves to the full extent of the security, and, at same time, rank for the whole amount of the debt upon the bankrupt estate. The question then arises, whether the minute entered into in July 1854, along with the possession which the company had of these premises, rendered the subjects of this security, in the sense of the statute, the property of the bankrupt company, and not the separate property of Dugald M'Phail, senior, and Duncan M'Phail, senior, as individuals.

M'Lelland v.
Bank of Scotland.

It is so far a favourable circumstance for the trustee, that the first instalment of the price agreed to be paid by the company to Duncan M'Phail's trustees had been paid. But that is only one instalment out of ten. Now what right does the minute give to the company as against Duncan M'Phail, senior? He had conveyed his property by absolute title to the Bank. He then entered into this minute of 1854, or at least his trustees did, whereby they agreed to sell the subjects over which the Bank held their security to the company, but by which they stipulated that they should not be bound to give any title to these subjects, until the whole ten instalments of the price were paid. There is no obligation on them to grant a title to the subjects till that time. That property, as the security was constituted, was Duncan M'Phail's individual property. So far as regards the title, it remains his property still. No doubt there is a right in the company to compel a conveyance in their favour. It is a personal right, which will be exigible when the whole stipulated price of the subjects shall be paid, but, by the agreement, the last instalment of the price is not payable for ten years,—and, so far as we can see, it will never be paid at all. Duncan M'Phail's trustees are entitled to withhold all title to the property, till they get payment of the price. They do withhold it, and the Bank retain their original security over the property.

In that state of matters, it appears to me that the company have not yet got possession of this property as their own property. It does not belong to them. They have a right—looking to all these transactions—to any reversionary sum which may remain after all other rights affecting the property are adjusted. But the property is not theirs. They have a claim to it, but they have not the property itself in the sense of the statute—which, when it speaks of the estate of a bankrupt, does not mean all shades or shapes in which a right to property may arise, but relates to that which is truly the property of the bankrupt. It does not appear to me that the company had such a right as vested the property in them. If the Bank, having got payment of their debt, had proposed to reconvey the property to Duncan M'Phail's trustees, the trustees might then, if they chose, request the Bank to convey it to the firm of Dugald M'Phail and Company. But it is to Duncan M'Phail's trustees that the Bank are bound to reconvey the property. If the trustees have not got payment of their debt, they may take the reconveyance to themselves. They have the radical right to the property. It is they who have right to the reconveyance, and whatever claim the company may have, now or prospectively, they have not acquired the property in the sense of the statute. It did not form part of the company's estate at the date of the bankruptcy.

The property of Dugald M'Phail stands in a somewhat different position from that of Duncan M'Phail, although not so much so as in my opinion to render a different application of the law necessary in regard to it. There is this difference between the two, that by the transaction with Dugald the price of this property had been satisfied, being credited in the books of the firm as capital advanced by him in the business. But still that was a mere mode of arrangement between those parties. But the same transaction which arranged the price also contained this provision, which was part of the transaction, that no conveyance to the subjects should be granted to the company, but, on the contrary, that Dugald's interest should be conveyed in security to Duncan's trustees, they being the parties who, in the first place, had a personal interest in his estate, and, in the second place, being the parties who were bound for the debt to the Bank. That part of the transaction therefore, being Dugald's estate—as in a question of property with the Company—substantially in the same position as the separate estate of Duncan M'Phail. Therefore, upon the whole, I am inclined to agree with the view of this case taken by the Lord Ordinary.

But there are other grounds upon which, as at present advised, I would be very much disposed to rest my judgment. I greatly doubt the power of parties occupying the relative position to each other as in this case, so to operate upon the property disposed in security as to affect the nature and quality of the security which had been granted over it. The security stipulated for by the bank, and given to them, was a security over the separate property of a partner of the company, which was a very different thing from a security over the property of the bankrupt, because of the qualities to which I have alluded. I doubt very much the power of parties by any transaction between themselves, and to which the Bank was no party, to change the nature of that separate and independent security into a security devoid of these qualities, and which the Bank shall be obliged to value and deduct—a transaction, therefore, to their prejudice. The parties were fettered in this respect. A transaction with a bona fide purchaser would not affect the interest of the creditor. But as between these parties it just amounts to this, that if at any time the cautioner or party who has granted the security over his property to the Bank—he may be the creditor of the primary debtor or he may not—thus chooses to dispose of his property so conveyed in security at full value, withholding the disposition to it till the price is paid, he, by a stroke of his pen, destroys the value of the security which he has granted over it to the extent of compelling the creditor who holds such security, in ranking upon his debtor's estate, to value and deduct such security. I doubt very much the competency of doing that. No doubt this is a new company, but they are successors of the original company, and the original transaction had reference to any debts which the company might at any time contract. Upon the faith of that security, this company obtained credit, and the original transaction was, by the shape of it, as effectual in reference to the present debts of this company as to those contracted by the original company. Therefore, upon both of these grounds, it appears to me that the creditor here is not bound to value and deduct his security.

LORD IVORY.—This is an important case, and to some extent involving considerations of subtlety and nicety. But, on analysing it, there is no substantial difficulty in its solution. It seems to me, as it has seemed to your Lordship, that upon both grounds referred to by your Lordship, the creditor in this case is not bound to value or deduct the security held by him. The estate over which the security is constituted is not, in the statutory sense, the estate of the bankrupt; and therefore, whether upon the grounds which have been explained by the Lord Ordinary, and still further illustrated by your Lordship, or, upon the larger ground, as to the manner in which this debt was originally constituted, I agree entirely in your Lordship's conclusions.

The primary debtor in the present case is the bankrupt company. The estate over which the security subsists is the individual heritage of Dugald M'Phail, and Duncan M'Phail, senior. Their heritage in their proper private capacity is in no ways connected with the company, and, in the independent and separate sense as heritage, would have been the property of no third party, nor in any ways connected with the Bank or company, except by reason of the conveyance. Dugald and Duncan M'Phail, senior, holding each his individual heritage, came forward as third parties to grant a collateral security to the Bank as creditor of the company. Now the company is the primary debtor. In their capacity of disponers, Dugald and Duncan M'Phail came under no personal obligation. That is perhaps not of much importance, but it is well to make the observation, for it shews the distinction between them as individuals and as partners. If a third party comes forward, and, at the instance of the company, for the better security of the Bank, who is a creditor of the company, disposes to the Bank a certain heritable estate belonging to that third party ex facie absolutely, though truly not so, such third party must be viewed, and his relation to the question must be taken throughout, on the footing that he is entirely separate from and independent of the company. He, as a third party, is disposing his own individual property in collateral security for a debt due by a separate party. In this way the Bank are not simply creditors of the bankrupt company. They are creditors of the bankrupt company, and it partners as their primary debtors, but they are creditors also of the parties who have given the collateral security, as parties entirely distinct from, and independent of, the company; and in the manner in which the transaction was here entered into, it was not so much Dugald and Duncan M'Phail, the proprietors of certain heritage, who were the primary debtors, but it was these real properties themselves which were conveyed that constituted the real debtors, for Dugald and Duncan M'Phail had not bound themselves in their own persons. It was their property, and not themselves, that became indebted to the Bank. This is shewn more clearly by supposing that Dugald and Duncan M'Phail had then made over their interests to a third party, a purchaser. That purchaser would not have been under any personal obligation to the Bank. But the importance of the observation — and which it is essential to keep in view — is that there were two estates, and two debtors, and one creditor, who was creditor of both. The Bank was that creditor. The primary debtor was the company. Their estate was the proper estate of the company as a company estate, and the estates of these individual partners quasi partners. But there was a distinct debtor of the Bank, over and above that company, viz., the parties who granted the collateral security, or rather the heritage so conveyed by them, and which heritage became a separate estate in the person of the Bank, to be held by them in security so long as the debt due by the company was unpaid.

 M'Lelland v.
 Bank of

Now the form of the security thus granted is ex facie absolute. It is also essential to keep that in view, because it is a form of title which divests the party to whom the estate originally belonged, and invests another party in the legal title to the estate, subject to the equitable rights of reversion, but still operates as a divestiture of the party so conveying it. There is a right of reversion. That is in a sense a radical interest still retained by the original proprietor. But that is to be operated through the form of the right which he has given, and that being an absolute right on the face of it, is to receive its full effects. The distinction in this respect between a disposition ex facie absolute and the other form of security known to law, was very distinctly brought out in the case of Garden v. The Royal Bank, where the doctrine held by the majority of the Court was not touched by the reversal, viz., that it is of the essence of a title ex facie absolute that all the consequences lawfully deducible from such a title should receive effect, and that all other interests are merely dependent and subordinate rights to be extricated in their own particular shape. It is not, as in the case of an ordinary security, where the original investiture of the party granting the security keeps him in the radical right of the estate. There the security is a mere burden on the estate, and the party who holds the primary investiture remains as much proprietor of the estate as he did at first. But if the party proprietor divests himself by disposition ex facie absolute, he operates a result the very reverse. He no longer remains radical proprietor of the estate. He has a radical interest in the estate. He has a potential and contingent interest. He has a reversionary right. But he is divested of all rights as proprietor, and it is through the party to whom he has conveyed it that he must seek his reconveyance, and get his own rights rehabilitated by reason of certain principles of equity and otherwise, which formed part of the transaction.

At the date of this transaction the Bank had two estates liable; first, a collateral security, and second, the company's estate, with a general obligation against the partners of the company as a guarantee for the company's debts. If there had been no change of matters at the date of the bankruptcy, nor any attempted conveyance such as formed the subject of the minute of 1854, the Bank was entitled to go against the two estates as jointly and severally liable to them for the debt. They were entitled to have gone against the heritage which they had obtained in security from Dugald and Duncan M'Phail, and exhausted that estate so far as it would go for the company's debt, in respect of which it had been conveyed as a security, and if it was still necessary to go against the company's estate to make good the balance of the debt, they were entitled equally to go against the company, and rank for the full amount of their debt upon the company estate, without any deduction in respect of the collateral security. But between the two estates they could not rank for more than the full amount of their debt, and certain important principles of equities must have regulated their proceedings. But the important position is, that the Bank hold certain heritable estates, which were not the estate of the bankrupt company, and in which heritages they stand feudally vested as a collateral security for the company's debt. There were two sources of liability—distinct, separate, and independent of each other, and these two sources of liability were both equally available to the Bank. Now, could the Bank have been called on to divest themselves of this collateral security till they had been paid their full debt? Were they not entitled to have sold that estate and applied the price to the extinction of their debt, and to have so applied the price, if sufficient to extinguish their debt, without ranking upon the company estate at all? If, on the other hand, it was not sufficient to pay their debt, then were they not entitled to take as much as they could out of it, and then rank upon the estate of the company as being their joint debtor? They would have been entitled to go against the company estate, keeping the collateral security entirely apart and for their own purposes, and to be applied in extinction of the debt.

 M'Lelland v.
 Bank of

That being the situation of the Bank, was there anything which the debtor in the security or the debtor in the primary debt could do without the concurrence of the Bank to alter this position of advantage in which the Bank stood? If the Bank held these two estates to the effect of deriving full payment without valuing or deducting their security, could the proprietor of the subject which had been granted as a collateral security by disposing of that subject to the company, the primary debtor, and placing them in his right, prejudice the interest of the Bank, whose interest necessarily arose by force of law out of the ex facie absolute title held by them? It would be a most violent proposition to say, that if I hold a collateral security, any person can effect that right invested in me, or deprive me of the full benefit of it, or prejudice me in any respect whatever without my consent.

But, then, it is said that Dugald and Duncan M'Phail conveyed their interests in their estates—their radical right of reversion—to the company in 1854. What was the estate that the company then took? Did they take the heritage which had been originally vested in Dugald and Duncan M'Phail? No such thing;—that was now vested in the Bank, and could not be touched except by payment of the full debt. They took the right of reversion. They took what remained in the M'Phails,—a right to demand a reconveyance. But the estate, in the sense in which we are to deal with it, as the subject of a security to the Bank, they did not take, for that was already vested in the Bank, and divested of the party who conveyed it to the Bank, and who, therefore, could only now convey to the company what remained in himself. And that brings one nearer to the clause in the statute, for it is said that the Bank is here claiming against the company, who, by this time, were proprietors of the subject of security. If they had truly been proprietors of the subject of security, as an absolute and unlimited and unqualified estate, there might be a good deal to say. But, if they be proprietors of the subject only after a separate estate shall have been carved out of it and conveyed to the Bank, the only thing that could have been conveyed to them, and of which they can now be proprietors, would be the right of reversion; and, therefore, there can be no ranking on any subject of security which was part of the bankrupt estate. The Bank was entitled to exhaust the subject which they had derived from a third party as a separate source of liability altogether, and it was only after the debt was satisfied that—if the subject of security was not exhausted—the company could claim any right of property in it.

I do not enter more deeply into this matter, which has been fully spoken to by your Lordship. But this is a very clear result, that, if you make the Bank value and deduct their security, you in reality make them do that which would, pro tanto, cut down the subject of their security altogether. Before the minute of conveyance of 1854, they were entitled to exhaust their security, and were not bound to deal with it as liable to any valuation or deduction whatever. They were entitled, if the property was not sufficient to pay the whole debt, to exhaust the whole of it, and allow no part of it to fall into the estate of the bankrupt at all. But if, having done so, they are bound to value and deduct it, that is making a security available on the one hand unavailable on the other. Holding that view, I am equally well satisfied with the grounds stated by the Lord Ordinary as to the agreement and sale. There, too, the radical point is the absolute title of the Bank in the subject, so far as that subject of security was part of the matters dealt with in that minute of agreement. In the first place, the contracting parties were the remaining partners and representatives of deceased partners of the company. These are parties who certainly are not entitled to contract to the prejudice of the Bank as regards a right already completed in their person. They are not entitled to contract to the prejudice of the Bank in a transaction the shape of which was to exclude the Bank from all privity to, concurrence in, or knowledge of it.

M'Lelland v.
Bank of Scotland.

In the second place, that agreement of 1854 recognises the complete investiture of the Bank in its right to this estate, because the parties, treating between themselves, say, that, if the elements of this agreement shall not be completely extricated as between themselves, there shall be no binding effect in the obligation to convey the estate, and it shall be held a full and sufficient equivalent that the trustees shall give the company right to demand reconveyances from the Bank, in virtue of the dispositions to the Bank, and relative letter of acknowledgment.

That shews that the agreement, even as it was entered into, deals with the right of the Bank as a right exclusive of every other interest.

But, in the next place, there are conditions precedent as between the parties themselves, without which the new company are not even to be placed in a situation to demand or get a conveyance from the trustees of the deceased partners. Until these conditions are purged, the company have got no estate. Until the instalments of the price are paid, they have no right to demand a conveyance. Until the debt is paid, the Bank cannot be called on to divest themselves of the subject of security. Suppose that, at the date of the agreement, the question had arisen to whom the Bank were to reconvey,—their debt being paid, or otherwise extinguished,—in which event their obligation to reconvey was undoubted,—who were the parties entitled to demand such reconveyance? It was the parties from whom the Bank had acquired the estate. It was Dugald and Duncan M'Phail, or the parties to whom they had transferred their right. Their trustees have agreed to transfer the right, but the conditions of transference have not been fulfilled. The company are, therefore, not even entitled to demand a reconveyance. At the date of the agreement the trustees alone were entitled to demand it, but no person was entitled to do so until the debt to the Bank was extinguished.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—The company of Dugald M'Phail and Company, upon whose sequestrated estate the appellants, the Bank of Scotland, are claiming to be ranked for a debt of L.18,596, 2s., was formed in 1853, and was sequestrated in 1856. It was different in its partners, and in its constitution, from a former company, which had carried on business under the same name, from 1850 to 1853, when it was dissolved, and which never was sequestrated. The second company, by its contract of copartnery, undertook the liabilities of the dissolved company. The question raised by the record is, Whether the appellants, in ranking for that debt upon the general estate of the bankrupt company, are exempted from the condition, prescribed by the 37th section of the statute 2 & 3 Victoria, c. 41, of deducting the value of two preferable securities which they held for that debt; in respect that, as they allege, the subjects of these securities are not part of the estate of the bankrupt, according to the true meaning of that enactment?

In order to solve this question, we must ascertain whether or not the subjects of these securities, if they were free from those and similar burdens, would be a part of the sequestrated estate, and as such part of the fund of division among the creditors? If this be the case, these subjects are part of the bankrupt's estate in the meaning of that enactment; the object of which is only to give practical effect to the equitable principle, that a creditor on a bankrupt estate, who, in virtue of a preferable security over one portion of that estate, is entitled to appropriate the same to himself exclusively towards satisfying the debt so secured, shall not likewise get a dividend on the portion of the debt, so to be satisfied, out of the remainder of the estate. It matters not whether or not a bankrupt's title may have been feudalised, or whether his right to the subjects may have been real or personal. If the subject, even although not burdened with securities for his debts, would not have been alienable by him, nor attachable by his creditors (such as a subject held by him in trust, or the fee of an entailed estate), it would not be part of his estate in the meaning of the enactment, although it should be vested in him by a complete feudal title. On the other hand, the subject, if his right thereto was alienable by him, or attachable by his creditors, is transmitted to the trustee as part of the

No 130. divisible fund by the conveyance and adjudication implied in the sequestration, and is part of the bankrupt's estate in the meaning of the statute, whatever may have been the form or nature of his title at the date of the sequestration. This is the sense in which what is described as the estate of the bankrupt is used throughout the statute, and particularly in its 37th section.

The subject of one of the securities consists of the pro indiviso half of a tenement in Glasgow, which had been purchased by the bankrupts from Dugald M'Phail in 1853; and I shall first of all inquire, whether or not, at the date of the sequestration, it was part of the bankrupt's estate in the meaning of the enactment. I shall then make a similar inquiry as to the subject of the other security, which consists of the other pro indiviso half of that tenement and of other property in Glasgow, which the company at the sametime purchased from the trustees of Duncan M'Phail.

It was stipulated, in the very contract of copartnery by which the company was formed, that the former of these subjects should be purchased as part of its capital stock, from Dugald M'Phail. And effect was given to this stipulation by a separate written contract of sale of the same date, whereby Dugald M'Phail agreed to sell, and the company agreed to purchase these subjects and others at the price therein set forth. And it was farther thereby stipulated between the parties, that the price should be settled by its amount being credited in the company's books to Dugald M'Phail; that on this being done, he should grant a conveyance of the subjects; and that the purchaser's entry to possession was at 16th July 1853, which was also the date of the commencement of the copartnery. That contract likewise set forth that the subjects were to be conveyed to the trustees of Duncan M'Phail in security for a debt contracted by the company to them, as the price of the other subjects purchased from them.

This contract of sale was duly implemented. The price was settled in the stipulated manner by the amount being credited to the seller in the books of the company. The company was put into possession of the subjects, and enjoyed that possession during all the period of its subsistence. Dugald M'Phail denuded himself by a deed of conveyance thereof,—that conveyance having been taken in favour not directly of the company, the purchasers, but of the trustees of Duncan M'Phail, who granted to the company a back-bond declaring that conveyance to be merely a security for the separate debt already mentioned. The personal right to this property which thus belonged to the company, at the time of its sequestration, formed part of its estate in the meaning of the 37th section of the statute. That right, under the burden of any completed securities thereon, may be sold by the trustee in the sequestration, and its price divided among the general creditors, in respect that the company had purchased the property by a formal probative contract of sale, and that that contract had been implemented hinc inde.

If the right to these subjects did not then belong to the estate of this bankrupt company, in the meaning of that enactment, to whom did it so belong? No satisfactory answer has been made, or can be made to this question. In the argument there appeared to be different assumptions on this subject,—one being, that the property belongs still to Dugald M'Phail,—another, that it belongs to the appellants themselves, in virtue of their real security over it,—and another, that it belongs to the trustees of Duncan M'Phail, in virtue of the postponed security which they held over it for the debt above mentioned. All these assumptions, besides being inconsistent with each other, are fallacious.

1. I have already shewn that the subjects ceased to belong, in any sense, to Dugald M'Phail, by his having sold them and received the stipulated satisfaction for the price; and by his having placed the purchaser in possession, and by his having denuded himself of the property as above mentioned.

2. The absurdity of holding the appellants themselves to be the owners of the subjects, in virtue of their right in security, is very palpable; because, even if their right in security were held to have become truly a right of property, then the debt which was so secured would also be held to be satisfied to the extent of the value of the subject; and the objection to the ranking of the debt (to the extent to which it would have thus been satisfied) on the general estate, without deducting that value, would be greatly strengthened. But in order to see clearly the fallacy of this assumption, it is proper to attend to the nature of the security held by the appellants. It was granted by Dugald M'Phail on 7th October 1850 for a cash-credit for L.13,000, which the appellants were to give to the former company, of which Dugald was a partner. It was granted as a security for the liabilities of not only the copartnership then formed, but also of any future copartnership which, being formed under the same firm, might comprehend any of the granters of that bond. That security having been granted in the not uncommon form of a disposition ex facie absolute, qualified with a back-writing setting forth that it was granted merely as a security for debt, this peculiarity in its constitution had two effects:—1. It had the effect, so long as the back-bond was not recorded, of vesting the fee in the appellants, and of reducing the granter's title to a personal one. And 2. This security was of a prospective, expansive, and restrictive nature, inasmuch as the debt which it secured might be contracted at any future date, and might from time to time be diminished, extinguished, or enlarged; and the grantees might retain the right so conferred upon them in security of any debt present or future, which might be of the description set forth in the back-bond, or for which the owner of the subject for the time being might become liable to them. But, notwithstanding the peculiarities which thus distinguish securities of this class in the law of Scotland, still the position of the grantees is practically and truly nothing else than that of real creditors on the estate of their debtor. The property, subject to the burdens so created upon it, continues to be part of his estate, in so much that so long as the creditor does not enter into possession in virtue of the security, the owner retains the possession and the administration of the property. If he become a sequestrated bankrupt, his right to the property is part of his sequestrated estate, and may be sold by the trustee for behoof of the creditors; and the reversion of the price, if there be any, forms part of the fund of division among the creditors. The price, so far as it is applied in paying off the debt covered by the security, extinguishes that debt, and saves the other creditors from having their dividends diminished by the ranking of the secured creditor for the debt, so far as it is so satisfied. And the creditor, if in virtue of his security, he withdraws the subject of it from the general fund of division, and appropriates it for payment exclusively of the debt owing to himself, cannot farther rank for that debt upon the other funds of the sequestrated estate, without deducting the value of that security, as being one constituted on the estate of the bankrupt. This would be the case even if the reversionary right remaining in the bankrupt were nothing more than a personal jus crediti, such as belongs to a purchaser under a contract of sale or articles of roup. But the right of reversion in cases of this class is of a peculiar and higher description. It admits of being restored to a real right at the pleasure of the owner, because, as stated by Professor Bell (Com. II. 293), "If the back-bond have been recorded, the right (viz., the creditor's right) becomes from that moment a burden or right in security merely—the full right of fee being reinvested in the debtor." Moreover, the creditor's infeftment, although it is held to vest in him the real right or fee of the subjects, is held in law to be the infeftment of the debtor as the owner of the property, subject, of course, to the burden of the debt, as is exemplified by this conclusive test, that in the event of the debtor's death his reversionary interest is subject to his widow's right of terce, although terce is available only out of subjects in which the widow's husband dies infeft. This was expressly the ground of the decision in the case of Bartlett v. Buchanan, 21st Feb. 1811, F.C. And such being the nature of the rights remaining with the granter of a security of this description to the subject of that security, the creditor in the debt so secured is not entitled to rank for that debt upon the general estate of the bankrupt without deducting the value of the preferable security he holds for that debt, in terms of the statutory enactment to that effect.

The reasoning of the appellants appeared to me to proceed on an assumption that the right in security and the right of reversion are two separate subjects,—the former belonging to the creditor and the latter to the debtor,—and that it is as securities over the latter of which the value is required to be deducted by the 37th section of the statute. There is a confusion of ideas in this reasoning. If it were sound, the enactment would be inoperative, because, as the reversionary right remains with the debtor ultra all real securities for the debts with which his right is burdened, it never can be burdened with any real securities. The fallacy of the reasoning is palpable. The subject of the bankrupt's right of

No. 130. reversion is identically the same with the subject of the creditor's right in security, both rights comprehending the whole of the subjects, and the latter right being only a burden upon the former. It is the value of the security created by that burden which the statute requires to be deducted in the ranking upon the general estate.

3. The remaining ground upon which the right to this property is said not to be part of the estate of the bankrupts in terms of the statute, is that it belongs to Duncan M'Phail's trustees, in virtue of the conveyance which was granted to them, as before mentioned. But that conveyance was granted only as a second and postponed security for a debt which the company incurred to these trustees, as the price of the other subjects purchased from them. Although that conveyance also was granted in terms ex facie absolute, it also was qualified by a back-bond establishing its true character. And accordingly, for that debt also (subject, of course, to deduction of the value of this secondary security, if indeed it be of any value), the creditors are entitled to be ranked upon and draw a dividend from the general estate. And, on the other hand, the trustee on the sequestrated estate is entitled to sell the property, subject to the burden of the real debts, and to divide the proceeds among the creditors.

Assuming that but for the granting of this postponed security the appellants would have been bound to deduct the value of their preferable security in their ranking for the secured debt upon the general estate, their position, in this respect, cannot possibly be improved, and no exemption from the operation of that enactment can have been created in their favour, by the mere circumstance that a postponed security has been granted over the subjects in favour of a third party. The granting of that postponed security cannot make their own position either worse or better.

Thus the right to this property (subject to the burden of these two securities) is part of the estate of the bankrupts, and is part of the fund of division among their general creditors; and the appellants, in so far as they withdraw this property from that general fund of division by appropriating it to themselves for satisfying their preferable debt thereon, must deduct the amount of their debt to the extent it may thus be preferably satisfied out of what would otherways be part of the general fund of division, when they claim to be ranked with the other creditors on the remainder of that fund of division.

It has been suggested that the appellants are exempted from this statutory obligation upon a different ground, viz. that Duncan M'Phail, the granter of the conveyance, under which the preference is claimed, was not the principal debtor in the debt in question, but only a guarantee or cautioner for it; that the appellants were entitled to be ranked upon the estate of the company, as being the principal debtor, without deducting the value of the heritable security so held by them over an estate belonging, not to that debtor, but to Duncan M'Phail, as cautioner for it; and that their position, in this respect, could not be detrimentally altered by the principal debtor, viz. the company, acquiring, by purchase or otherways, from the cautioner the subject of the heritable security.

There might be cogency in such reasoning, in a case where the principal debtor is not owner of the subject of the security at the time when the debt is incurred, and only acquires right to it thereafter. For example, this might have been the case, if this debt had been incurred to the respondents by the company which subsisted prior to 1853, and had been secured over the subjects in question, while these still belonged to Duncan M'Phail individually, and if that company had thereafter purchased it from him, and this ranking had been on its estate. Or, again, if the company which was formed in 1853, and is now bankrupt, had not purchased this property from Duncan M'Phail until after the debt now in dispute had been incurred by this company. So far as I know, the question whether or not the creditor, in such cases, would escape from the operation of the 37th section of the Sequestration Statute, has never occurred for decision, and I reserve my opinion upon it. But even supposing that this reasoning would be sound, in cases of that kind, it is inapplicable to the very different class of cases to which the present belongs; where that debt, which is sought to be ranked upon the general estate was incurred by the principal debtor after, and not before that party acquired the property, upon which the debt is secured, and where the creditor has never been in the position of holding a security for that debt over property belonging to any party other than the principal debtor. That such is the true description of the present case, appears from comparing the date of the contraction of the debt of the company with the date of the acquisition of the property. Although the dates at which the company contracted this debt of L.18,596, 2s. in question does not appear from the record or printed papers, yet necessarily these dates were subsequent to that of the company which is the debtor having come into existence. And at these dates the property in question did not belong to Duncan M'Phail, or any third party, but to the company itself, because the purchase of this property by the company, as part of its capital stock, was coeval with its formation, and was indeed one of the conditions of its very existence. And this condition was carried into effect by the formal written contract of sale of the property of the same date. Hence there never was a time when the appellants held a security for the debt now in question over property which then belonged to Dugald M'Phail, or any party other than the company, the principal obligant in the debt.

M'Lelland v.
Bank of Scotland.

The fallacy in the reasoning of the appellants appears to arise from confounding the date of the title under which they hold their security with the date when the security began to exist. Although the conveyance was granted in 1850, and from the prospective expanding and contracting nature of the security it was capable of covering debts and liabilities not then existing, but to be incurred at a future time, either by the company then existing, or by other companies to be afterwards formed on certain conditions, it had not, and could not have, the effect of actually burdening the property with any such future debts or liabilities, until these should be actually incurred to the appellants by the company in subsistence for the time being. The title which was granted to the appellants in the year 1850 had not, and could not have, the effect of burdening the property, as at that date, with a debt of L.18,596, 2s., which did not exist until several years afterwards. And although, from the peculiar nature of the conveyance, it operated as a security for debts or liabilities which were incurred by the company formed in 1853, yet these debts, so long as they were not incurred, and had no existence, did not, and could not, become burdens upon the property. And as at the dates when they did come into existence, the property over which a security for them then accrued to the appellants belonged to the principal obligant in the debt then incurred, and not to Dugald M'Phail as cautioner therein.

This would have been the case, even if the debt in question had been contracted originally by the former company, which was dissolved in 1853. In that case the debt, although it would have been a real burden upon the property purchased from Dugald M'Phail, could not have been ranked on any footing whatever upon the general estate of the succeeding company, unless that company, when it came into existence, had undertaken an obligation to the appellants to pay the debt. And if it did undertake an obligation to the appellants to pay a debt contracted by the former company, that undertaking itself would be the only ground for its being ranked upon its sequestrated estate. And as the date of such an undertaking by the new company could not be earlier than the date of its own existence, it would still be true that this debt had never been the debt of the bankrupts, before the property over which it is secured became theirs. In the case of a party who purchases an estate, which is burdened with a debt incurred by the seller, and who, instead of paying off the debt, grants a personal bond of corroboration for the creditor—the latter, in the event of the purchaser being afterwards sequestrated, would rank upon his general estate in virtue of the bankrupt's obligation in the bond of corroboration; but such creditor would not be exempted from the statutory condition of deducting the value of his security over the heritable property, on the plea that the subject of the security is not part of the bankrupt's estate. The answer would be conclusive, that the property over which his security is constituted belonged to the bankrupt, when the debt was incurred by the latter; and that, when he grants himself of an obligation granted to him by the partner, who at the time was the owner of that property, to rank upon that party's sequestrated estate, he must do so on the statutory footing of deducting from his claim the value of his security over a portion of the bankrupt's estate. And the present case would be no exception to the rule, even if the debt for which the appellants are claiming to be ranked on the general estate of the bankrupt had been incurred by a different company, but had been undertaken by the new company after it came into existence, and had become the owner of the subject of the security.

M'Lelland v.
Bank of

It is not alleged that all or any of the debt of L.18,596, 2s., in dispute, had been contracted by the former company, and that the present company had become liable for the same only by some ex post facto obligation. There is no allegation or plea to this effect in the record. And hence the case must be dealt with on the footing that this debt was contracted by the bankrupt company itself after it came into existence, and had become the owners of the property over which a security accrued for this debt at the date of its contraction; and that, consequently, the appellants are not in a position to plead that their debtors' purchase of the subject of the security was made subsequent to the date when this debt became secured upon that property.

I therefore think that the appellants have failed to establish any ground of exemption from the statutory enactment, that, in ranking for this debt on the general estate of the bankrupt, they must deduct the value of the preferable security they hold over that portion of the bankrupt's estate which was purchased from Dugald M'Phail.

I further think that they have failed to establish an exemption from that enactment in reference to the security they hold over the other portion of the bankrupt estate which was purchased from the trustees of Dugald M'Phail. That purchase, in all essential particulars, is in the same predicament as that already mentioned.

1. It was a condition of the contract of copartnery that these subjects also should be purchased by the company as part of its capital stock. 2. The minute of sale above referred to (to which these trustees were parties) set forth that they agreed to sell, and the company agreed to purchase their interest in these subjects and others at the price therein mentioned. 3. It is therein stipulated that the purchaser's entry should be as at the 16th July 1853, and that the price should bear interest from that date. 4. The company was accordingly put into possession of the subjects, and enjoyed that possession as long as it carried on business. 5. The first instalment of the price was duly paid at the stipulated term. 6. The subjects purchased from Dugald were conveyed to Duncan's trustees, as a security for the remainder of the price as above mentioned. And, 7. The purchasers were put into possession of the subjects. The particulars in which this purchase differed were chiefly these:—1. The price was payable by ten annual instalments, on the 16th of July of each year, commencing on 16th July 1854. 2. The conveyance by Duncan's trustees was to be granted to the Company only upon the whole of the price being paid up. And, 3. A separate bond for the price, payable at the times and by the instalments above mentioned, was to be granted by the purchasers to the sellers.

The position of the appellants in reference to these subjects is also the same as that in which they stand in reference to the subjects which were acquired from Dugald M'Phail,—Duncan, the former owner, having also granted a security over these subjects to the appellants, of the same date, in the same form, and for the same liabilities as those in reference to which the security by Dugald was granted. Hence all I have stated in reference to the title on which the appellants hold a right to the subjects purchased from Dugald apply also to the title on which they hold the property which was purchased from Duncan's trustees, and these remarks need not be repeated. But the appellants maintain that these subjects still belong to Duncan's trustees; and that, therefore, they are entitled to be ranked on the estate of the bankrupts without deducting the value of their security thereon. It was, as they allege, a condition precedent of the contract of sale of these subjects, that the whole should be paid; and that, as that alleged condition has not been performed, the sale has never taken effect. And there might have been some force in this reasoning if there had been in the contract of sale either a suspensive condition to the effect that the sale should not be effectual unless and until all the instalments of the price should be paid, or a resolute condition, to the effect that if all or any of the instalments should not be paid at the stipulated time, the sale should be rescinded. If such had been the case, and if, in consequence thereof, matters were now to be dealt with on the footing of there not being now an existing sale, the sellers would be entitled to have the possession of the subjects restored to them, and would be obtaining full payment of the balance. This being so, the inference drawn is, that no purchase or transaction between the principal debtors and their cautioners (for so Dugald and Duncan, for the purposes of this argument, may be called) could alter, for the worse, the position of the Bank as creditors, or prevent them from going against each estate to the effect of obtaining full payment, precisely as they might have done before. Lynch v.

Haggart.

To illustrate the principle here involved, suppose Dugald and Duncan, not being themselves in any way liable for the debt, but, as a mere favour to the company, had each handed over to the Bank a chest of plate in security of the company's debt, and had afterwards sold this plate to the company, received payment of the price, and intimated the sale to the Bank:—In such circumstances it seems clear enough—on the principle of the case of Black v. Melrose, 20th February 1840—that, but for the sale of the plate to the company, the Bank would not only have been entitled to rank for their full debt on the sequestrated estate of the company without valuing and deducting their security over the plate, and then to have operated full payment of the balance by disposing of the plate, but would even have been entitled to draw a composition from the sequestrated estate corresponding to the full amount of their debt, to the effect of operating full payment, although they had, in the meantime (subsequent to the sequestration), sold the plate, and thereby realised a considerable portion of their debt. The question there would be, whether the sale of the plate by Dugald and Duncan to the company could injuriously affect the Bank's right of ranking on the company's estate, by compelling them to value and deduct their security over the plate, the effect of which might be to prevent the Bank from operating full payment of their debt as they otherwise would have done. As at present advised, I am inclined to think that, in such a case, the position of the Bank could not be altered for the worse by a sale in which they were no parties, and that they could not be compelled to value and deduct their security over the plate which, but for that sale, they could not have been required to do. But this involves a question of novelty and importance, which, although it may be covered by the pleas in law, was not argued at this bar, any more than it seems to have been before the Lord Ordinary; and I should hesitate to go upon it, without making sure, after argument, that the position of the respective parties was such as to present the question in the same pure form in which it would have occurred in the case which, for the sake of illustration, I have just supposed.

I think the ground relied on by the Lord Ordinary sufficient for judgment, and am contented to rest upon it.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the first finding in the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary submitted to review; and, in room thereof, find that the security which the appellants have, in virtue of the conveyances in their favour by the late Duncan M'Phail, and by him and the late Dugald M'Phail, of the heritable subjects therein specified, is not a security upon which they are bound to put a specified value as a security held by them on the estate of the bankrupts, under the provisions in the 37th section of the statute 2 & 3 Vict. c. 41; and, with this variation, adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against, and refuse the reclaiming note: Find the appellants entitled to additional expenses, and remit," &c.

No. 130. sell. No part of the price was paid at its date. The price of Dugald's portion of the subjects (L.6432, 4s. 6d.) was to be carried to his credit in the books of the company, of which he was a partner. The price of Duncan's portion of the subjects (L.20,445, 6s. 4d.) was to be paid by instalments, of which one only has been actually paid, and the last of which will not be due till July 1863. In the meantime, Dugald's portion of the subjects stands conveyed by him, in terms of the agreement, to the trustees of Duncan, it being stipulated by the agreement that Duncan's trustees are not to be bound to denude of Dugald's portion of the subjects till the whole price of Duncan's portion shall be paid to them, and that they are to be entitled to sell the subjects so conveyed to them, to meet any instalment of the price of Duncan's portion of the subjects which shall remain six months due and unpaid. The effect of all this appears to me to be to place Duncan's trustees substantially in the same position, so far as regards the present question, as if they had been sole proprietors and sellers of the whole subjects now in dispute. Both sets of subjects stand vested in Duncan's trustees; and it is a condition precedent to the company being entitled to demand a disposition to either set of subjects that the whole price of L.20,445 due to these trustees, for their own portion of the subjects, shall be fully paid. At present, therefore, the company, even if solvent, would not be in a situation to demand a disposition to either set of subjects; and unless they shall pay the stipulated price and interest to Duncan's trustees, they never will be so. The trustee in the sequestration does not undertake to pay this price, either now or afterwards. Payment of a composition upon the price will not, of course, entitle the company to a disposition. In this state of matters neither the one set of subjects nor the other can form a fund of division among the creditors of the bankrupt company. And I cannot hold either set of subjects to be the property of the bankrupts in the sense of section 37 of the statute. That there may be a sense in which the subjects may be called their property is not enough if they be not their property in the sense of this enactment. The bankrupts hold no disposition to these subjects, and no pure and absolute right to demand and obtain such a disposition. They have merely a future and contingent claim to a disposition—the contingency being one which, to all present appearance, will never be purified. But it is not over this contingent claim (which is all that belongs to the bankrupts), but over the subjects themselves, which stand vested both legally and equitably in other parties, that the Bank's security extends. It is true there is no condition precedent to the contract of sale. But a contract of sale of heritable subjects does not per se pass the property. It is to the passing of the property, whereby the bankrupt company would be enabled to deal with it as theirs, that the condition precedent applies; and so long as that condition is not purified, the property, I think, is not theirs in the sense of section 37 of the statute. I should have arrived at this conclusion although the security to the Bank had been in the form of a bond and disposition in security, in place of an absolute disposition and back-bond. The whole right of the company would still consist in a mere future and contingent claim to become proprietors, and not in a present and absolute right to the subjects themselves. And the observation would still apply, that it is not over this future and contingent claim which belongs to the company, but over the right of property itself, which does not belong to them, that the Bank's security extends.

Another ground of judgment has been suggested by your Lordship and Lord Ivory, which would be applicable even if the subjects could be held to be the property of the bankrupts, in the sense of sect. 37 of the statute. Supposing that the company had obtained a disposition to and stood infeft in the subjects, the Bank would still, according to that view, not be bound to value and deduct their security.

The view, as I understand it, is this:—The debt was the proper debt of the company, and not the debt of Dugald M'Phail or Duncan M'Phail, the individuals, who conveyed their own estates to the Bank in security of the debt of the company, for whom they thus, virtually, interposed as cautioners. If in this state of matters, and while there was, as yet, no purchase by the company, the company had become bankrupt, the Bank would have been entitled, without valuing or deducting the security they held over the estates of Dugald and Duncan, to rank on the company estate for their full debt, and then go against these other estates to the effect of obtaining full payment of the balance. This being so, the inference drawn is, that no purchase or transaction between the principal debtors and their cautioners (for so Dugald and Duncan, for the purposes of this argument, may be called) could alter, for the worse, the position of the Bank as creditors, or prevent them from going against each estate to the effect of obtaining full payment, precisely as they might have done before. Lynch v.

Haggart.

To illustrate the principle here involved, suppose Dugald and Duncan, not being themselves in any way liable for the debt, but, as a mere favour to the company, had each handed over to the Bank a chest of plate in security of the company's debt, and had afterwards sold this plate to the company, received payment of the price, and intimated the sale to the Bank:—In such circumstances it seems clear enough—on the principle of the case of Black v. Melrose, 20th February 1840—that, but for the sale of the plate to the company, the Bank would not only have been entitled to rank for their full debt on the sequestrated estate of the company without valuing and deducting their security over the plate, and then to have operated full payment of the balance by disposing of the plate, but would even have been entitled to draw a composition from the sequestrated estate corresponding to the full amount of their debt, to the effect of operating full payment, although they had, in the meantime (subsequent to the sequestration), sold the plate, and thereby realised a considerable portion of their debt. The question there would be, whether the sale of the plate by Dugald and Duncan to the company could injuriously affect the Bank's right of ranking on the company's estate, by compelling them to value and deduct their security over the plate, the effect of which might be to prevent the Bank from operating full payment of their debt as they otherwise would have done. As at present advised, I am inclined to think that, in such a case, the position of the Bank could not be altered for the worse by a sale to which they were no parties, and that they could not be compelled to value and deduct their security over the plate which, but for that sale, they could not have been required to do. But this involves a question of novelty and importance, which, although it may be covered by the pleas in law, was not argued at this bar, any more than it seems to have been before the Lord Ordinary; and I should hesitate to go upon it, without making sure, after argument, that the position of the respective parties was such as to present the question in the same pure form in which it would have occurred in the case which, for the sake of illustration, I have just supposed.

I think the ground relied on by the Lord Ordinary sufficient for judgment, and I am contented to rest upon it.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the first finding in the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary submitted to review; and, in room thereof, find that the security which the appellants have, in virtue of the conveyances in their favour by the late Duncan M'Phail, and by him and the late Dugald M'Phail, of the heritable subjects therein specified, is not a security upon which they are bound to put a specified value as a security held by them on the estate of the bankrupts, under the provisions in the 37th section of the statute 2 & 3 Vict. c. 41; and, with this variation, adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against, and refuse the reclaiming note: Find the appellants entitled to additional expenses, and remit," &c.

Process—Sheriff-Court Act, 16 & 17 Vict. cap. 90, sect. 22—Competency of advocacy.—A Sheriff-court action, which, in its own nature, it was competent to advocate, fell asleep, and being awakened after many years, resolved into a question of expenses,—Held, that the original conclusions of the action determined the value of the cause, and that it was competent still to advocate it on the question of expenses.

- Mar. 3, 1857. This action originated in the Sheriff-court of Lanarkshire in an application by Robertson, an ironmaster at Easter Meadowhead, for interdict against Wilsons and Company, of Summerlee Ironworks, carting away certain iron-stone until it should be first measured and paid for. The proceedings commenced in 1840. A record was made up and closed in 1841. Proof was allowed; and on 21st January 1842, the Sheriff-substitute pronounced an interlocutor prorogating the diet of the pursuer's proving for three weeks. The process then fell asleep, and on 13th December 1853, was awakened. On 10th March 1854, the Sheriff-substitute (Veitch) pronounced the following interlocutor:—“ On the motion for the pursuer craving that the last order be renewed,” and on the motion for the defenders craving “ that the action be dismissed, and the defenders assoilzied therefrom with costs, in respect of the pursuer having ceased to urge the suit,” refuses “ the defenders' motion, and renews the period for pursuer proving for three weeks.” And, on 28th September 1854, he pronounced the following interlocutor:—“ Finds that the pursuer has established that the defenders refused to pay for the stone by measurement, and that the balance due at the time of applying for the interdict was in his the pursuer's favour, and therefore that he was entitled to apply for the same: Finds him therefore entitled to expenses.” &c. In a note he stated, that the question of interdict fell to the ground, in consequence of the lease in question coming to an end before the question was settled on the merits, and that of expenses only remained. “ According to the view taken by the Sheriff-substitute, the agreement of parties clearly contemplated that the measurement was to be by the quantity of char on the ground, and therefore it remains to be seen, whether the defenders were in advance of payment at the moment the interdict was applied for.”

On appeal the Sheriff-depute (Alison) altered this interlocutor, and found “ that the relevancy of the demand for the expenses of this action depends entirely upon the question which of the statements for the pursuer or defender is the better founded, and that it is to that point accordingly that the proof is directed: Finds, however, upon the import of the proof, that it does not as yet appear from it which way the balance lay: Finds, that if the demand for expenses had been timeously made at the close of the action on the merits thirteen or fourteen years ago, it might have been incumbent on the Court to investigate how the balance between the parties stood, by a remit to an accountant, or otherways; but that as the parties have allowed so long a period to elapse without moving in the process, during which evidence for the defenders may have been lost or mislaid, the pursuer is not entitled to succeed in his demand for expenses, unless he could substantiate it at once, by decisive evidence in process, which he has not done; therefore, as well as because some of the early interlocutors in the cause were in the defenders' favour, alters the interlocutor complained of: Finds no expenses due to or by either party, and decerns." Robertson v. Wilson.

The pursuer advocated.

The respondents now objected to the competency of the advocacy. They pleaded;—That the sole subject of dispute between the parties was the question of expenses. The case of *Mitchell v. Murray*¹ settled that the value of a cause was to be estimated by the decree and not by the summons, and by that test this advocacy was incompetent. The case of *Hopkirk v. Wilson*² settled that, in construing the decree, the matter of expenses was not to be taken into consideration at all. According to these judgments, where the subject-matter of the cause was the expenses merely, that was not a subject-matter to be advocated. Here there was nothing but the question of expenses. Therefore the advocacy was incompetent.

Pleaded for the pursuer; — This case concludes for damages, and not for a pecuniary amount. It is an action which, in its own nature, is capable of advocacy. Its value does not depend on pecuniary conclusions, or on the amount of expenses decerned for.

LORD PRESIDENT.—These judgments do not appear to me to touch this question. If the criterion of the competency of an advocacy is not affected by the amount of expenses decerned for, how does that touch the competency of this advocacy? We must look to the original summons to ascertain whether the objection be well founded: and, doing so, I find that this is an action the value of which is not determined by the money value concluded for, but is an action which, in its own nature, was competent to be advocated. That being my view, I am for repelling this objection.

LORD IVORY.—As an old formalist, I should not have the least difficulty in disposing of this case. My only difficulty arises from the judgment of the Court in the question of interest; and to this hour I cannot reconcile that decision with any practice or principle or decision or statute with which I was before acquainted. But, standing that decision, I cannot read it otherwise than as fixing that, in a question of advocacy, it is not the value of the cause when it comes into the Court below, but when it comes into this Court, that is to be taken as the value of the cause by which this criterion of competency is to be determined; and, even so reading that decision, I cannot reconcile it with the case of Hopkirk, which says that it is not the value of the cause as at the date of advocacy, but its value as it originated in the inferior Court, that is to be looked to. But I can again make my escape, as I did in the case of Hopkirk—not being able to reconcile these two judgments—by going back to the old practice; and, doing so, I have no difficulty in deciding that the value of this cause is to be estimated by the conclusions of the action as it came into Court; and, therefore, I see no serious difficulty in the way of deciding the competency of this advocacy.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I also think that the advocacy is competent; and I think it is competent in perfect consistency with both cases referred to. According to the conclusions of this action in the inferior Court, this is a case that, in its own nature, admits of advocacy. In neither of these two cases was the action originally competent, and the question there was, whether accruing claims, pendente lite, rendered competent an advocacy although originally incompetent? That is a totally different question from the present. In the case of Murray accruing interest was included in the decree, and was held to supplement what was originally concluded for, so as to render advocacy competent. But whether that decision was right or wrong, there is nothing in it to warrant the Court in holding that an action in which advocacy was competent so long as it pended in the inferior Court can be rendered incompetent by superseding some of its conclusions. That is a totally different matter, and I know of no authority for saying that the nature of the action can be so far changed as to make advocacy now incompetent, when it has all along been competent.

LORD DEAS.—I have no doubt of the competency of this advocacy, which brings up the whole cause, and necessarily involves a decision of the merits, although it may be that the object of insisting on this decision is mainly or solely to reach the question of expenses. The Sheriff's judgment, accordingly, contains findings on the merits which, if left standing, might, for anything we know, have an important bearing on the rights of parties in other proceedings between them. At all events, we must decide the cause before we can decide the accessorial question of expenses, and the cause is one clearly competent to be advocated. I proceed entirely on the same principle on which, in common with the majority of the Court, I proceeded in Mitchell v. Murray and Hopkirk v. Wilson—namely, the principle (which, if I follow Lord Ivory's observations, he also holds), that the competency of the advocacy depends on the conclusions of the original action. It was just because interest was concluded for in Mitchell v. Murray (and, not being an accessory, could not have been given had it not been concluded for) that we held the interest to be part of the cause of action; much in the same way as several terms aliment or several years annuity decerned for, after long litigation, may each form part of the cause of action. And it was just because expenses are a mere incident to the cause, which may be awarded either against pursuer or defender, and do not require to be concluded for at all, that, in Hopkirk v. Wilson, we held them to form no part of the proper conclusions, and consequently no part of the cause of action which fell to be estimated in judging of the value comprehended under these conclusions.

THE COURT repelled the objections to the competency of the advocacy, and appointed the case to be heard on the question of expenses.

Entail—Irritancy.—By the prohibitory clause in an entail, heirs were forbid to sell, dispone, wadsett, or impignorate the estate;—Held (adhering to the Lord Ordinary's judgment), that the prohibition against disposing was not properly fenced by an irritant clause, which enumerated Acts "with respect to altering the order of succession, selling, or contracting of debt," and the entail declared invalid.

Mar. 3, 1857.
2D DIVISION.
Lord Handyside.

THIS action was brought to set aside the entail of the estate of Fairlie, at the instance of the heir in possession. The ground on which the action was maintained was that the prohibition against disposing and alienation was not duly fenced.

I.

The prohibitory clause was in these terms:—"It is hereby expressly provided and declared that it shall not be lawfull to the heirs-male of my body, &c. to sell, dispone, wadsett, or impignorate the lands and others above disposed, or any part thereof, nor to contract debts," &c.

The irritant clause was in these terms:—"Declaring hereby that if the heirs-male of my body, or any of the other heirs or members of entail above mentioned, substituted to them, shall act and do in the contrary of any of the particulars above specified, with respect to altering the order of succession, selling or contracting debt, then, and in that case, all and every one of such debts, acts, and deeds," &c.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the prohibition against disposing the lands not being fenced by a proper irritant clause,

and decerns in terms of the conclusions of the summons."*

The defender reclaimed, and pleaded;—The prohibitory clause was constructed on the principle of redundancy. In the irritant clause the first only of each class of prohibited acts is specified; and in using the word "selling," in the irritant clause, the intention of the entailer clearly was to include under it all the acts of alienation prohibited, and among them gratuitous alienations. Besides, a gratuitous alienation was in reality an alteration of the order of succession, against which there was a prohibition properly fenced.

Mar. 3, 1857.
Fairlie v.
Cunningham.

The pursuer answered;—The word selling, in the irritant clause, only applied to the prohibition against sale, which is a peculiar mode of alienation, beyond which the fetters of the entail applicable to it could not be extended on a presumption of the entailer's intention.'

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I do not differ from the view of the Lord Ordinary. Originally, in the statute 1685, the word "sell" may have been taken more comprehensively; but looking at the whole Act, and the decisions, its meaning must now be held fixed. The entailer has omitted to irritate the prohibition against disposing, and the irritancy is ineffectual.

LORD MURRAY concurred.

LORD COWAN.—I agree. I think it clear that the word "sell" only being made use of, in this part of the irritant clause, the prohibition against disposing is not irritated, and the entail is defective.

LORD WOOD absent.

THE COURT adhered.

DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S.—JOHN A. CAMPBELL, C.S.—Agents.

* NOTE.—"The entail contains the usual prohibitory clauses against altering the order of succession, disposing, and contracting debts. The irritant clause, in specifying the acts of contravention, omits the word 'disposing.' The words in the prohibitory clause are, 'sell, dispone, wadset, or impignorate.' Had the word 'disponere' been omitted in that clause, unless supplied by some word of tantamount force, the prohibition against alienation would have been defective. The Garbethill entail was on this ground found invalid. The omission in the present case to repeat in the irritant clause the word 'disponere,' appears to the Lord Ordinary to be equally fatal. The Cockspow case, as decided in the House of Lords, affirming the judgment of this Court, was referred to. But the omission there in the resolutive clause of the word 'sell,' used in the prohibitory along with the words 'alienate, and dispone,' was held to be covered by the words 'alienating and disposing,' which were construed to be generic, embracing alienation by selling. It would be vain to contend, after the case of Garbethill, that the word 'selling' in the irritant clause covers 'disposing,' nor was that attempted. The suggestion was thrown out that a gratuitous disposition was equivalent to an alteration of the order of succession, and so irritated. But such a view would not only be repugnant to all received canons of construction of entails, but to the terms of the statute 1685, and the Act 11 & 12 Vict., which treat alteration of the order of succession as separate and distinct from alienation. The chief effort to support the entail of Fairlie was directed to show that the words of the irritant clause were intended by the entailer to be taken as referring generally to each class of prohibitions, and so 'selling,' as the first word in one class, was meant to embrace, and is to be construed as embracing the three other modes of alienation which follow. The Lord Ordinary has been unable to see grounds for the intention surmised. But were it otherwise, he conceives that the word 'disponere' is too important and significant to admit of its being taken as transferred in that way into the irritant clause."

Cessio bonorum—Process—Personal protection.—Where the induciae of a summons of cessio expired during vacation, personal protection granted on caution till the ensuing Session.

THE petitioner raised a summons of cessio bonorum against his creditors in terms of the Act 6 & 7 Will. IV. c. 56, and relative Act of Sederunt 24th December 1838. It appeared that the induciae would not expire till after the rising of the Court for the Spring Vacation, and therefore that the case could not be enrolled in terms of section 12* of the statute, and a remit made this Session to the Sheriff to take the petitioner's examination. The petitioner therefore now applied for personal protection till the sittings of the Court in May, against the diligence of certain creditors who had obtained warrant of incarceration against him. He offered to find caution for L.100.

Clark, for the petitioner, submitted that it was held in practice that the Lord Ordinary on the Bills could not deal with the process of cessio during vacation.¹ The petitioner would thus be left exposed to diligence for a greater period than he would be protected, without any remedy till the Court resumed its sittings in the ensuing Session in May.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Grant warrant for the petitioner's personal protection against the execution of diligence until the Court resumes its sittings in the ensuing Session in May next, upon his finding sufficient caution to the extent of L.100, that he shall attend all diets of Court whenever required, and supersede extract till such caution is found."

The sum he fixed exceeded the aggregate of the share capital and sums authorised by the Lessors' Act to be borrowed. ¹ Shand's Practice, "Cessio bonorum," Anderson, Petitioner, 20th February 1849, ante, vol. xi. p. 679.

The Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company reclaimed. They were tenants of a line of which the pursuers were proprietors, and the question between parties was one of rent—it could only be determined by reference to the words of the Leasing Act. Both parties were statutory corporations. They could do nothing except under the Act; and if they had done anything otherwise than under the Act, they had done it illegally. They did not contend that the sum fixed by Mr Miller had not been expended on the Stirling and Dunfermline line, but that the proprietors of that line could not have spent it as a corporation under their Act, and could, as a corporation, have no interest in sums spent in excess of their statutory powers, however those who advanced such sums might. The bargain between the Companies was, that a per centage should be paid not on extraordinary sums that might be raised, but upon those warranted by the Acts of Parliament—i. e. upon any sum actually expended on the line, not exceeding the whole capital of the Stirling and Dunfermline Company, and the whole debentures they were authorised to grant. Their capital was L.390,000. Their borrowing power was limited to L.130,000; and any sums borrowed beyond that were illegally borrowed, and at variance with the Railways Regulations Act and Companies Clauses Act. What would be the use of any limitation of the amount of capital, or of the debentures to be granted, if they were allowed to raise more? Parliament would not pass bills unless satisfied that within the capital and powers of borrowing asked the line could be made, and that there is a prospect of the line paying. If more were spent, then it was illegally spent, and not spent by the Company as a corporation. The directors, or even the proprietors, might choose to centage which the defenders are to pay as fixed rent. The railway is to be made under the control and to the satisfaction of a certain referee, who is also to ascertain the sum expended in making it, and on that sum so ascertained, whatever it may be, the defenders are to pay four per cent. The referee, a person thus appointed, has seen the railway made and completed, and has reported on the amount of the expenditure, and in this way the conditions of the statute seem to be satisfied.

“The defenders, however, say, that the amount expended, as reported in Mr Miller’s present report, together with the sum of expenditure reported by him in the former action, amounts to considerably more than the capital of the Company, even with the addition of the money authorised to be borrowed under their original Acts. The Lord Ordinary cannot see how the mere amount of capital should be any limitation of the expenditure when there is also a borrowing power. But he does not think that the expenditure, which is to be the basis for calculating the rent, can necessarily be confined even to the aggregate amount of the capital and of the authorised debt by borrowing. No doubt if it could be said that it was impossible for the pursuers in fact, or at least in law, to expend more on the railway than their subscribed and loan capital, there might be something in the objection, and the Court might be called upon to refuse its sanction to an allegation of expenditure, which was a statutory impossibility. But there are various ways in which a railway company may expend more than its whole capital and borrowed money. It may contract debt under lawful contracts otherwise than by borrowing. But further, its shareholders, or others interested in its success, may impress money into its hands, which, when thus legitimately acquired, may be legitimately expended in completing the undertaking. The Lord Ordinary does not know whether this has here been done, nor does it seem necessary to inquire. It seems enough if the thing be possible in itself. Mr Miller’s report must then be taken as competent and conclusive of the fact, and the amount of expenditure being so ascertained, the amount of the rent to be paid by the Company follows upon simple arithmetical principles.

“It seems reasonable that the rent for the portions of railway now in question should be payable at the same terms as those fixed in the first action.”

be ranked on the general estate of the bankrupt had been incurred by a different company, but had been undertaken by the new company after it came into existence, and had become the owner of the subject of the security.

It is not alleged that all or any of the debt of L.18,596, 2s., in dispute, had been contracted by the former company, and that the present company had become liable for the same only by some ex post facto obligation. There is no allegation or plea to this effect in the record. And hence the case must be dealt with on the footing that this debt was contracted by the bankrupt company itself after it came into existence, and had become the owners of the property over which a security accrued for this debt at the date of its contraction; and that, consequently, the appellants are not in a position to plead that their debtors' purchase of the subject of the security was made subsequent to the date when this debt became secured upon that property.

I therefore think that the appellants have failed to establish any ground of exemption from the statutory enactment, that, in ranking for this debt on the general estate of the bankrupt, they must deduct the value of the preferable security they hold over that portion of the bankrupt's estate which was purchased from Dugald M'Phail.

I further think that they have failed to establish an exemption from that enactment in reference to the security they hold over the other portion of the bankrupt estate which was purchased from the trustees of Dugald M'Phail. That purchase, in all essential particulars, is in the same predicament as that already mentioned.

1. It was a condition of the contract of copartnery that these subjects also should be purchased by the company as part of its capital stock. 2. The minute of sale above referred to (to which these trustees were parties) set forth that they agreed to sell, and the company agreed to purchase their interest in these subjects and others at the price therein mentioned. 3. It is therein stipulated that the purchaser's entry should be as at the 16th July 1853, and that the price should bear interest from that date. 4. The company was accordingly put into possession of the subjects, and enjoyed that possession as long as it carried on business. 5. The first instalment of the price was duly paid at the stipulated term. 6. The subjects purchased from Dugald were conveyed to Duncan's trustees, as a security for the remainder of the price as above mentioned. And, 7. The purchasers were put into possession of the subjects. The particulars in which this purchase differed were chiefly these:—1. The price was payable by ten annual instalments, on the 16th of July of each year, commencing on 16th July 1854. 2. The conveyance by Duncan's trustees was to be granted to the Company only upon the whole of the price being paid up. And, 3. A separate bond for the price, payable at the times and by the instalments above mentioned, was to be granted by the purchasers to the sellers.

The position of the appellants in reference to these subjects is also the same as that in which they stand in reference to the subjects which were acquired from Dugald M'Phail,—Duncan, the former owner, having also granted a security over these subjects to the appellants, of the same date, in the same form, and for the same liabilities as those in reference to which the security by Dugald was granted. Hence all I have stated in reference to the title on which the appellants hold a right to the subjects purchased from Dugald apply also to the title on which they hold the property which was purchased from Duncan's trustees, and these remarks need not be repeated. But the appellants maintain that these subjects still belong to Duncan's trustees; and that, therefore, they are entitled to be ranked on the estate of the bankrupts without deducting the value of their security thereon. It was, as they allege, a condition precedent of the contract of sale of these subjects, that the whole should be paid; and that, as that alleged condition has not been performed, the sale has never taken effect. And there might have been some force in this reasoning if there had been in the contract of sale either a suspensive condition to the effect that the sale should not be effectual unless and until all the instalments of the price should be paid, or a resolute condition, to the effect that if all or any of the instalments should not be paid at the stipulated time, the sale should be rescinded. If such had been the case, and if, in consequence thereof, matters were now to be dealt with on the footing of there not being now an existing sale, the sellers would be entitled to have the possession of the subjects restored to them, and would be bound, on the other hand, to restore the instalment of the price which had been paid to them, and to reconvey to the trustee on the sequestrated estate the subjects which had been conveyed to them as a security for the unpaid instalments of the price. In that case also, the sellers would not have been creditors upon the company estate for these unpaid instalments of the price. But such is not the state of the case. There is no such suspensive or resolute condition in the contract. No. 130.

M'Lelland v.
Bank of Scotland.

The bankruptcy of the purchasers, and the non-payment of the instalments of the price now in arrear, have not put an end to the contract of sale. The remedy for which the sellers stipulated in that contract is, on the contrary, only that which is appropriate for enforcing performance of it. Although they stipulated that their disposition to the purchasers should be withheld until the whole of the price should be paid, this was merely as a security for the price,—and this is just an example of that kind of security which is well known in the practice of Scotland as a real security by reservation. This appears from the farther provision in the contract, that in the event of the buyers failing to pay an instalment of the price, the trustees should be entitled to sell the subjects in the manner prescribed in a power of sale therein set forth; and that they should be bound to hold just count and reckoning with the purchaser for the price which they might realise. 2. The sellers stipulated that their operating upon that security was to be without prejudice to any diligence competent to them for the price of the subjects, in virtue of the bond which was to be granted for the price. And thus under the terms of this subsisting contract, the sellers, besides availing themselves of their reserved security, are entitled to be ranked as creditors upon the sequestrated estate for the full amount of the unpaid balance of the price, subject only to the deduction of the value (if that value be anything), of the above mentioned security by reservation. And 3. The sellers stipulated for, and now hold, the separate security above mentioned over the subjects purchased from Dugald M'Phail for this balance of price. Thus the position of Duncan's trustees is that of being creditors of the company for the unpaid balance of the price of the subjects purchased from them; and their remedies are only such as are competent to creditors. They are not even in the position of sellers who have not parted with possession, and they have reserved no right under which they could resume possession otherways than as creditors for the price, who would be liable to account for their intromissions.

The assumption, therefore, that this contract of sale has never taken effect, or has been rendered ineffectual by the bankruptcy of the sellers, is quite a mistake. It is probably the reverse of the interest of the sellers to be rid of the contract, if this were in their power; because, were they to do so, they would only have the reversionary interest in the subjects which might remain after satisfying the appellant's preferable claim, and that reversionary interest may probably be worth little or nothing; whereas, by enforcing the contract, they will not only receive the value (if it be of any value) of the residuary right of the company in the subjects purchased from Dugald M'Phail; but also, and at all events, be entitled to draw from the general estate of the bankrupts a dividend on the full amount of the unpaid balance of the price owing under this contract of sale, subject to the deduction only of the value of their security. But, as already stated, the contract of sale was effectual from the first; and the effect of the condition with which it is qualified is to empower the sellers not to rescind it, or to be freed from it in any event, but to enforce performance thereof in the ways above mentioned. And such being the case, the right to the subjects purchased by the company under this subsisting contract of sale is just as effectual as is their right to the other subjects which they purchased from Dugald M'Phail, and they are not entitled to be ranked on the general estate, without deducting the value of both securities.

LORD DEAS.—I entirely concur in the Lord Ordinary's note, as well as in his interlocutor.

The question is, whether the subjects over which the Bank's security extends are the property of the bankrupt company, in the sense of sect. 37 of the statute 2 & 3 Vict. c. 41?

To solve this question, it is necessary to attend to the terms of the minute of sale between the company, on the one hand, and Dugald M'Phail and the trustees of Dugald M'Phail, on the other.

The minute contains no conveyance of the subjects. It is a mere agreement to

No. 130. sell. No part of the price was paid at its date. The price of Dugald's portion of the subjects (L.6432, 4s. 6d.) was to be carried to his credit in the books of the company, of which he was a partner. The price of Duncan's portion of the subjects (L.20,445, 6s. 4d.) was to be paid by instalments, of which one only has been actually paid, and the last of which will not be due till July 1863. In the meantime, Dugald's portion of the subjects stands conveyed by him, in terms of the agreement, to the trustees of Duncan, it being stipulated by the agreement that Duncan's trustees are not to be bound to denude of Dugald's portion of the subjects till the whole price of Duncan's portion shall be paid to them, and that they are to be entitled to sell the subjects so conveyed to them, to meet any instalment of the price of Duncan's portion of the subjects which shall remain six months due and unpaid. The effect of all this appears to me to be to place Duncan's trustees substantially in the same position, so far as regards the present question, as if they had been sole proprietors and sellers of the whole subjects now in dispute. Both sets of subjects stand vested in Duncan's trustees; and it is a condition precedent to the company being entitled to demand a disposition to either set of subjects that the whole price of L.20,445 due to these trustees, for their own portion of the subjects, shall be fully paid. At present, therefore, the company, even if solvent, would not be in a situation to demand a disposition to either set of subjects; and unless they shall pay the stipulated price and interest to Duncan's trustees, they never will be so. The trustees in the sequestration does not undertake to pay this price, either now or afterwards. Payment of a composition upon the price will not, of course, entitle the company to a disposition. In this state of matters neither the one set of subjects nor the other can form a fund of division among the creditors of the bankrupt company. And I cannot hold either set of subjects to be the property of the bankrupts in the sense of section 37 of the statute. That there may be a sense in which the subjects may be called their property is not enough if they be not their property in the sense of this enactment. The bankrupts hold no disposition to these subjects, and no pure and absolute right to demand and obtain such a disposition. They have merely a future and contingent claim to a disposition—the contingency being one which, to all present appearances, will never be purified. But it is not over this contingent claim (which is all that belongs to the bankrupts), but over the subjects themselves, which stand vested both legally and equitably in other parties, that the Bank's security extends. It is true there is no condition precedent to the contract of sale. But a contract of sale of heritable subjects does not per se pass the property. It is to the passing of the property, whereby the bankrupt company would be enabled to deal with it as theirs, that the condition precedent applies; and so long as that condition is not purified, the property, I think, is not theirs in the sense of section 37 of the statute. I should have arrived at this conclusion although the security to the Bank had been in the form of a bond and disposition in security, in place of an absolute disposition and back-bond. The whole right of the company would still consist in a mere future and contingent claim to become proprietors, and not in a present and absolute right to the subjects themselves. And the observation would still apply, that it is not over this future and contingent claim which belongs to the company, but over the right of property itself, which does not belong to them, that the Bank's security extends.

Another ground of judgment has been suggested by your Lordship and Lord Ivory, which would be applicable even property of the bankrupts, in the sense the company had obtained a disposition. Bank would still, according to that view security.

The view, as I understand it, is this company, and not the debt of Dugald] who conveyed their own estates to the] for whom they thus, virtually, interpose and while there was, as yet, no purchase bankrupt, the Bank would have been security they held over the estates of D estate for their full debt, and then go receipts, in respect of the expense of maintaining and working the said main railway, and branch railways, or such portions thereof as aforesaid." No. 135.

This clause lays on Mr Miller, or the engineer for the time being of the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway, another but most important duty, viz., to ascertain and fix the amount which shall have been expended in obtaining the Act, and completing the works. Mar. 4, 1857.
Stirling and Dunfermline Railway Co. v. Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Co.

The terms here chosen relate to the actual matter of fact as to the cost of the railway, and in the first instance do not seem to admit of any question. But then, we must more minutely consider them with reference to the plea raised by the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway. That plea is this :—This is a contract between two Incorporated Railway Companies—the Stirling and Dunfermline Railway Company have no powers but from their statute—They cannot go beyond the powers thereby conferred—The capital is declared to be L.390,000, and they have power to borrow to the extent of L.130,000, in all L.520,000—The liability of the shareholders to pay to the execution of the undertaking, is limited to L.15—Hence more than the above sum, we, the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway were entitled to hold, the Stirling and Dunfermline Company could not expend, and that therefore came to be part of our contract of lease, and we undertook to pay the rent on an amount of expenditure which we knew could not exceed the above sum—Hence, what was provided for by the appointment of Mr Miller, to fix and ascertain the amount of expenditure, must be taken to have regard solely to the amount expended within or up to that sum of L.520,000, and could not, by the nature and character of this statutory lease, relate to or cover any outlay beyond that sum.

There is no doubt that this is a very plausible and a very taking plea, if we look only to the interests of one party in the event not expected by either, that the railway was not to pay well, and that the Edinburgh and Glasgow Company had made a bad bargain. It refers to what seems at first sight a very natural limitation of the expenditure on which rent is to be paid, and it may plausibly be urged at this implied limit,—for it cannot be said that it is not matter of implication,—it fully forms a part of the statutory lease. But we must recur to the actual words of the statute, and when the nature of the bargain is considered, the appearance of reasonableness soon flies off. The Stirling and Dunfermline Company were to be at the expense of the line, without any limitation, in the bargain with the Edinburgh and Glasgow Company. Estimates had been got no doubt, but it is notorious that such estimates often fall short of the actual expenditure, and the cost of the undertaking often exceeds the capital and borrowed money, and it is necessary to have the same increased during the progress of the work. Now the obligation is absolute on the Stirling and Dunfermline Company shall make and complete the line. It is not said that they are to make it so far as their then capital and power to borrow money will suffice to do so. They are bound, to the Edinburgh and Glasgow Company, to make the line, cost what it may, and of course to get the means, if necessary, by additional powers to do so. It is in vain to say they could not, under their first charter, expend more than L.520,000, for they have in point of fact expended more, and paid for all the works, and the debt is not averred. If bound to make the railway, cost what it might, it cannot reasonably be contended that they are to get nothing in return for the actual and necessary expense, so far as that might exceed their share-capital and power to borrow money. That would be a strange result. If the Stirling and Dunfermline Railway had stopped short in the execution and completion of the line, as soon as they saw that the cost would exceed the original capital and borrowed money, I have no doubt that the Edinburgh and Glasgow Company could have proceeded against them by action to compel them to complete the line, and to go if necessary to Parliament to obtain powers to raise additional capital and to borrow more money. The Edinburgh and Glasgow Company had a right to obtain this line on lease. It was not to remain a waste and fruitless unfinished undertaking. The Edinburgh and Glasgow Company expected great benefit from the lease of it, and in that expectation were entitled to compel the Stirling and Dunfermline Company to complete it. If the Stirling and Dunfermline Company had pleaded deficiency of funds, the answer would have been complete—Go to Parliament for powers, and ask them bona fide, or let us ask them in our name, and they will easily get them—None of your shareholders,—all bound to—can object, and Parliament has never left a line unfinished—a useless nuisance to the country,—if the company asks for funds to go on, and is willing to complete.

The Stirling and Dunfermline Railway Company were willing to go on without any such compulsitor. They do go on, and however they obtained the funds at first, they got an Act of Parliament which covered all their outlay, so that the railway had been completed, and means obtained exactly in the way they would have proceeded, if, being desirous to stop, the Edinburgh and Glasgow Company had enforced the completion of the undertaking.

But, further, they had a very good reason for insisting that the rent was to be taken on the actual amount expended:—For the whole execution, and therefore the whole cost might have been entirely regulated by Mr Miller, and only some misunderstanding, which the Stirling and Dunfermline Company could not foresee, between him and the Edinburgh and Glasgow Company, and the resolution which the latter soon adopted, to try to throw off the contract of lease, prevented, I suppose, that superintendence by Mr Miller, which in truth the real interest of the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway would have led them to prescribe. Now, Mr Miller would have had to attend to two considerations if he had so superintended the execution of the line. The Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway were to maintain the works in good and sufficient order for 35 years,—a very onerous burden, and requiring considerable outlay. Now the more completely the work was done,—the more substantially and skilfully,—the less would be the cost of so maintaining the works in good order, and although the amount expended might have been increased on the one hand, the Edinburgh and Glasgow Company might really have been gainers ultimately, by the diminished annual outlay on the line,—always a most important object, with a view to any profit from working the same. Hence, it is plain that if Mr Miller's superintendence and control had been exercised all along, as might have been expected, the Stirling and Dunfermline Company could not have been able to limit the expenditure as they might wish, but must have done, at whatever cost, every thing Mr Miller prescribed, and in the manner he directed; so that, while the expenditure might thus have been prescribed by him; on the other hand, the natural result was to stipulate that the rent should be fixed on the amount actually expended, whatever that might be, as they were bound to make the line.

And again, if Mr Miller was not to superintend and control the actual expenditure, which could not be anticipated, yet, still, if the Stirling and Dunfermline Company themselves were to make the line without such superintendence, the whole works were to be executed and completed to the satisfaction of Mr Miller, whom failing, the engineer for the time being of the Edinburgh and Glasgow Company. And as the lease could not take effect until that approval was obtained, and as the obligation on the Edinburgh and Glasgow Company to maintain thereafter the works in sufficient order was a very important matter for their interests, the Stirling and Dunfermline Company were bound to complete and execute the works in such a superior manner as to pass the examination to which they were to be subjected.

The cost of the undertaking was clearly more uncertain than in any other case. Mr Miller might have insisted, say on bridges of a particular construction, or he might not have passed the bridges (if he was not to superintend), and might have required others to be made. And of whatever was necessary in order to get his final approval, the Stirling and Dunfermline Company must have borne the expense, without any limitation whatever.

They were to be at the cost of the undertaking, and they therefore would naturally stipulate that the rent should be a per centage on the actual cost.

That the Stirling and Dunfermline Company should lay out large sums necessary for making the line, and required, it might be, by the engineer of the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway, and yet have no return whatever on such sums actually and properly expended in executing and completing the line, is a result which cannot reasonably be held to have been part of the contract of parties.

Now, when we come to the clause, is not the actual cost the measure for the rent directly adopted and expressed? The Edinburgh and Glasgow Company, as tenants, are to pay four per cent on the amount "which shall have been expended in obtaining this Act, and in completing the said works, as the said amount shall be ascertained and fixed by the said John Miller." "Which shall have been No. 135. expended"—This distinctly and necessarily refers to what has been actually laid out,—no other element being taken into account. Could Mr Miller, if satisfied Mar. 4, 1857. that the line cost a certain sum, after striking off any deductions he thought Stirling and Dunfermline proper, have refused to include sums bona fide and necessarily incurred,—nay Railway Co. which might have been all prescribed and required by himself for the due and v. Edinburgh satisfactory execution of the works, and to ascertain and fix the amount expended, and Glasgow because that amount exceeded the original capital and borrowed money under the Railway Co. first Act? Where would have been his warrant, under the terms already quoted, prescribing his duty to be to ascertain and fix the amount which shall have been expended? Not a word is contained in the section which refers to any limit, or makes the sum to be fixed to depend on any other matter than the actual cost. Then, if the whole outlay is in Mr Miller's certificate, it must be taken in the calculation of the rent.

Then arises the very important and conclusive consideration: if any such limitation had been intended, and if the amount of cost on which the rent was to be fixed, was not the amount which shall have been expended, but in truth a proportion of the fixed capital and borrowed money, why was not reference made to such limit? It was the duty and interest of the Edinburgh and Glasgow Company to have that limit stated if in contemplation, and forming a substantial part of the contract of parties. It is not conceivable, how, on that supposition, that should not have been done in one way or other. It was the natural course to adopt on that supposition. Various forms of words would easily have expressed the object. But the very last course to adopt was to run counter to that understanding and agreement, and to take the amount which shall have been expended, without reference to any other consideration, and without any qualification as to the extent of that expenditure except one, and that a most material qualification, viz., "as the said amount shall be ascertained and fixed by the said John Miller, whom failing, the engineer of the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company for the time being." This qualification, in my opinion, wholly excludes any such implication as the Edinburgh and Glasgow contend for, because it shows that the only thing to be done and attended to was to have this check on the actual expenditure, viz., that their own engineer was to inquire into and ascertain and fix the amount expended. That would have been a proper precaution, even if the agreement of parties had been that the amount on which the rent was to be paid should be only the L.520,000 or any outlay less than that sum. But when the amount which shall have been expended is taken as the sum on which the rent of 4 per cent is to be paid without limitation, then the reference to Mr Miller to fix and ascertain that amount shews that there was only that limitation in view.

The restriction which the Edinburgh and Glasgow Company contend for as part of the contract and agreement of parties could not have led to the use of the terms actually employed, for both parties must have had a totally different object in view. And the party who was not to pay on the amount expended, although fixed by Mr Miller, could not, within the bounds of possibility, be conceived to agree to pay expressly on the amount which shall have been expended without restriction or qualification or declaration. Obviously a totally different form and mode of stating the matter must have been adopted.

The terms are so plain, that it is needless to make farther observations on the subject. But I must add that it is very remarkable that this plea was not brought forward originally. The sum first found, no doubt, did not exceed the L.520,000, but then was the time for the Edinburgh and Glasgow Company to announce and protest, that though that sum might be taken in the first instance, the mere ascertainment of the amount expended by Mr Miller was not the contract of parties, and did not constitute or form their obligation as lessees, or afford the true basis for calculating the rent. The plea now taken seems to have been an afterthought, but it is of itself unsound.

I do not rely much,—indeed, not at all,—on the statute 1856, as raising by itself any separate point. My opinion is summed up in this short sentence—The Stirling and Dunfermline Company were bound to make the line,—the Edinburgh and Glasgow Company bound to take it in lease for a rent,—these obligations were absolute. The Stirling and Dunfermline Company were so bound to make the line because the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway were to pay them rent. The outlay necessary was to be borne by the Stirling and Dunfermline Company, because they were to receive rent. The statute declares that they were to receive rent at 4 per cent on the amount which shall have been expended in completing the works, as that might be fixed by Mr Miller. I cannot read that as importing any sum greatly short of what is so fixed, — that is to say rent, not on the actual and necessary cost of the line as so fixed.

I stated and still feel that we could not have gone behind as it were the certificate of Mr Miller as the action came before us, and that rescissory and declaratory conclusions here as to the certificate being beyond his powers and ultra vires were necessary to enable the Edinburgh and Glasgow Company to raise the plea which they have stated to us. But a very serious question would then arise as to the competency of challenging that certificate if in terms of the statutory direction prescribing the duty he had to perform. On the competency of such conclusions I reserve my opinion, as on the merits of the plea urged to us I am in favour of the Stirling and Dunfermline Company, the original pursuers. I do not feel disposed to adhere to all the views or modes of stating the case contained in the Lord Ordinary's note. In the result I concur, and no objections were, I think, stated to the interlocutor as defective or objectionable on the view on which it proceeds.

LORD MURRAY.—This is a case of very great difficulty and importance. No decisions have been referred to either in this Court, or in the Courts of England, which assist me in the determination of the question on which the case seems to turn; but as the parties have already gone to the House of Lords, we can have little doubt that our decision will be brought under the consideration of the superior tribunal, and that if we go wrong, the error will be corrected.

We have here four Acts of Parliament which must all be considered together and construed, so far as it can be done, as forming one statute, regulating the rights of these two Companies. It is necessary, however, in order to see what was the original agreement of parties, to consider those statutes minutely and separately, as well as together. The first and leading statute is the 9th and 10th of Victoria, which received the Royal assent on the 16th of July 1846. That statute, after declaring that the Companies Clauses Act (Scotland), the Land Clauses Consolidation Act (Scotland), and the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act (Scotland), 1845, shall be incorporated with and form part of the Act, further enacts that the capital of the Company shall be L.390,000, and that it shall be lawful for the Company to borrow L.130,000 after the capital has been subscribed for, and one-half of it actually paid up, giving on the whole to the Company for executing the railway L.520,000.

The main object of this statute appears to have been, to make and to lease out the railway and branch railways authorised to be made by it to the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company. The two Companies are thus combined under the same statute and series of statutes. The one to make and the other to hold in lease, a main and certain branch railways. The whole might have been done by one Company, but here the Acts of Parliament combine the two in the characters of makers of the railway, and holders, and lessees. The whole being the enactment of Acts of Parliament, must be entirely regulated by them. The leasing clauses commence with the 41st section, which provides that the railways and branch railways shall be executed under the superintendence and control, and to the satisfaction of Mr Miller, whom failing, to the engineer for the time being of the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company, and shall on their completion, or on the completion of any part thereof, be leased by the Company hereby incorporated to, and shall be taken and held in lease for the period of thirty-five years after such completion by the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company, and shall during the said period vest in them. The 42d section enacts, that from and after the completion of the said main railway and branch railways, or any part thereof, shall be made to the satisfaction of the engineer mentioned in the Act,—all the powers conferred by the Company shall be exercised by the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company.

The 45th section enacts, that after the completion of the main railway and branch railways, or any part thereof, shall be made to the satisfaction of the engineer mentioned in the Act, the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway shall, during the said period of thirty-five years, maintain the works so completed in good and sufficient order, and shall pay to the Company, herein incorporated, an annual fixed rent or consideration for the use thereof equal to four per cent on the amount which shall have been expended in obtaining this Act, and in completing the works, as the amount shall be ascertained and fixed by Mr Miller, whom failing, by the engineer for the time being of the Edinburgh and Glasgow Company. This clause contains a farther provision for a contingent rent, equal to one-half of the receipts after withdrawing the amount of four per cent, and thirty-five per cent, the expense of working the main and branch railways.

Mar. 4, 1857.
Stirling and Dunfermline
Railway Co.
v. Edinburgh
and Glasgow
Railway Co.

In a former case between these parties, which was appealed to the House of Lords, it was held in affirming the judgment of this Court, that the rent became due from the time when such a part of the railway as could be worked by the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway was completed, even although the whole line was not completed.

When that question occurred, the capital of the Company, as fixed by the statute, does not appear to have been exceeded. The outlay on this railway afterwards exceeded that amount, and a farther Act was passed upon the 21st July 1856, which refers both to the Act of 1846, and to two other Acts passed in 1848 and in 1849, which authorise certain alterations and deviations for the purpose of improving the railway; and it then sets forth that "Whereas, in the construction and completion of the said railway and works therewith connected, and for the general purposes of the undertaking, a greater amount has been expended than the aggregate of the sums authorised to be raised by the said first recited Act; and it is expedient that in order to provide for the debts and liabilities of the Company, they should be authorised to create and issue additional shares or stock in their undertaking, and to borrow a further sum of money."

This statute authorises the Company to issue new shares to the extent of L.100,000 above the sums authorised by the statute 1846, and to borrow L.33,000 in addition to the sum they are authorised to borrow, subject to the Companies Lands Clauses Consolidation Act.

Section 19 of the statute contains the following clause, which will afterwards require special consideration:—"Provided always that nothing in this Act contained shall be held or taken to affect or alter the rights and liabilities of the said Stirling and Dunfermline Railway Company, and the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company, as between themselves."

The first question which occurs is, whether, if the case had depended upon the statute 1846 alone, the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company could be called upon to pay rent upon a larger sum than the whole capital and borrowing power given by that statute, amounting altogether to L.520,000?

I have come to be of opinion that the total capital fixed by statute must be considered as forming the maximum, which the company was entitled by law to expend; and that therefore the Glasgow Railway Company would have a right to maintain under that statute that the maximum sum upon which, according to statute, they were to pay rent was L.520,000, which was all that the Stirling and Dunfermline Railway Company was authorised to expend by the statute.

I do not see how the Court can get rid of the capital fixed by the statute, as forming the maximum outlay that the Stirling and Dunfermline Railway Company were legally authorised to make. The lease formed a part of that same statute, and the one corporation was authorised to expend that sum, and the other was to pay a rent on the sum expended. It seems a necessary deduction from the statute that the money should have been expended in conformity with the powers given by the Act of Parliament. I do not therefore see how, if the whole case had rested on the statute 1846, the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company could ever have been called upon to pay rent on a larger sum than the maximum legal expenditure of the corporation with whom they were dealing could make.

It is not uncommon for parties in such undertakings greatly to underrate the expenses, which afterwards are found to be necessary to complete the works. They perhaps thought the sum of L.520,000 greatly more than sufficient to cover every possible expense; but be that as it may, the statute fixed the maximum of legal expenditure so long as it continued to be the ruling statute.

The question now comes next to be, whether the capital of the Company having been

No. 135. increased by the statute passed in the year 1856, to the amount of L.100,000, with a farther power of borrowing to the amount of L.33,000, making the whole capital L.653,000, the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company are bound to pay rent upon that sum? It appears to me that they are, unless the saving clause afterwards to be considered alters the matter. The Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company were to pay originally a rent of four per cent on an outlay approved of by their engineer, and certified by him, which, however, would not be legal outlay beyond the capital authorised by statute. That, however, was enlarged by the statute 1856; and as it was enlarged generally, the other clauses for the expenditure being made under the supervision of Mr Miller, or the engineer of the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company for the time being, so long as the other provisions of the statute remain in full force, they get a railway which, though it cost more than the parties originally expected, has been approved of by the engineer whom they named, and confirmed by Parliament.

The lease still subsists, although the capital is enlarged, and the object contemplated by the different Acts, considering them as one, is supposed to be attained in the best manner, under the superintendence of Mr Miller. If that must have been decided in the general case, the question comes to be, whether it is different under the saving clause? I feel that a question of very great difficulty, but I have not been able to find any ground on which the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company can maintain that they are to have this railway constructed under the superintendence of their engineer, at a less rate than four per cent on the outlay certified by their engineer.

There is no special clause in any one of the four statutes fixing the amount of outlay for which the railway should be constructed, and on which the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway were to pay rent. There was no direct provision that the railway should be constructed for any particular sum.

It is only by implication that I arrive at the conclusion that the capital of the Stirling and Dunfermline Railway Company formed a maximum of their outlay; but as soon as that capital was enlarged, I have no longer that rule to go by, and I am unable to substitute any other. The Act, 1856, might have provided that the lease should be at an end, in consequence of its being necessary to enlarge the capital of the Company, but it does not do so. It might have provided that the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company should have paid a rent of three per cent., or three and a-half per cent., instead of four per cent., but the Court has no power of doing so, and left, as we are, to deal with this enlargement of the capital. I feel myself bound to construe the capital, as always being what it now is, viz., L.653,000, and that upon that, the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company are bound to pay the only rent of four per cent. on their outlay certified by their engineer.

LORD WOOD was absent.

LORD COWAN.—The objections raising the question, which the interlocutor in the action at the instance of the defenders has disposed of, were lodged in process on 17th November 1856. I do not see that the general point argued before us was raised at any earlier date. Then, in aid of those objections, this action of declarator was instituted by the pursuers on 29th November 1856.

These dates are important, because, prior to such judicial statement, the Act 1856 had passed. It received the Royal Assent 1st August 1856.

The primary question is under the statute 1846.

The construction contended for Railway Company, is, that section 4 under it to four per cent. on the amount forming the whole funds of the company, may exceed that amount.

The words of the clause do not the contrary, the terms employed as ever may be its amount. And to it is necessary to insert into it by implication may be payable on a sum less than the per centage shall in no case be

The foundation of the argument,

Had the agreement been with an ordinary joint stock company, united for purposes of trade and profit, the partners in which were subject to unlimited liability, there could not have been room for implication. On the one hand, a railway was to be made and given over in a complete state. On the other, the consideration to be given is a per centage annually on the money expended in the completion of the railway. With proper precautions in the contract against unnecessary expenditure in the works, such a transaction presents no features either unusual or unfair. The capitalist provides the funds for the undertaking,—the party conducting it for his own profit, pays an annual return for the capital expended. The benefit is reciprocal. The obligations mutual. There is no room for implying conditions in such a case—the words being express—and full justice being secured by the very terms of the arrangement.

The contracting parties, however, being statutory companies, with limited funds at their disposal, and limited liabilities on the part of their shareholders, the contention of the pursuers is, that when the defenders undertook to make this railway, and the pursuers undertook to receive it and pay a per centage on its cost as rent, there was inherent in the transaction from the very position of the companies, a condition that the money expended was in no case to exceed the aggregate capital of the expending company, and the per centage in no event to be payable on a greater amount. This is the implication on which the argument rests.

That there is plausibility in the reasoning of the pursuers cannot be disputed; but I think that plausibility arises not less from a disregard of the terms of the 45th section than of its purpose and character.

The previous sections of the statute had constituted the Company, declared its capital, and the extent of its borrowing powers, and made this important provision (sect. 41), that the works were to be executed and completed “under the superintendence and control, and to the satisfaction” of the engineer of the pursuers’ railway for the time being. Then, following out the preamble as to the railway being to be taken on lease by the pursuers, there follow the statutory provisions which constitute the lease. So soon as completed at sight of their engineer, the pursuers were (sect. 41) declared bound to take over the works in lease for the period of thirty-five years, and which were declared to vest in them, “subject to the conditions” contained in the Act. And there follows the rent clause, sect. 45, containing one of those conditions. Its sole object was to fix the annual consideration to be paid by the lessees to the lessors. This might have been a certain determinate amount, without reference to money actually expended. It was deemed, no doubt, more equitable that the annual payments should correspond to the actual outlay. Hence it is provided that the annual fixed rent or consideration for the use of the railway should be “equal to four per cent on the amount which shall have been expended” in obtaining the Act and in completing the works, the amount to be ascertained and fixed by the engineer of the pursuers’ company, just as the works were to be executed and completed at his sight. This was the mode agreed to beforehand for fixing the rent. Elements are given to the calculator, and from these he is to ascertain the amount. This being done his duty is over. The 45th section, in so far as concerns the fixed rent, is thereafter to be treated precisely as if, in place of the elements for the calculation, it set forth the result. That result becomes the regulator of the fixed money consideration to be paid yearly. So soon as the amount is ascertained, the functions of the clause are over as directory, excepting as regards the additional fluctuating returns made dependent on the profits of the line.

Where, then, in all this, is there room for implying a condition so very material as that contended for by the pursuers? Its effect is to alter essentially, in one state of matters, the elements furnished to the engineer for calculating the rent. So long as the expenditure is within the available funds, then the clause is to have full operation, and the pursuers are benefited. But as soon as the expenditure, in completing the works, although laid out at the sight and under the control and superintendence of their own official, is found to go beyond the aggregate capital, the operation of the clause must cease. The amount expended is no longer to be ascertained as the regula regulans of the rent. The expenditure is to be inquired into, merely for the purpose of shewing that more than the aggregate capital has been expended. That being ascertained, the pursuers insist that there shall be no further inquiry into the amount of the expenditure, and that the rent must at once be fixed at four per cent on the aggregate capital, and not at four per cent on the money actually expended, as provided by the statutory words. This is virtually to supersede, in one state of circumstances, the operation of the rent clause, and to substitute implication for express enactment.

It cannot but be felt, that if the understanding of the parties really was to the effect stated, this would have been in terms declared. Your Lordship in the chair has put that in a point of view in which I quite concur. This apart, however, certainly if there was a statutory disability in the parties, or either of them, to undertake the contract, viewed in the light contended for by the pursuers, it might present the case in a different aspect. But was there really any such disability? Very possible it might be that the works would cost more than estimated, and in that case the aggregate capital prove insufficient,—more possible, I fear, in every such undertaking, than that the cost would be less. With this possibility before them, the defenders might well be careful to provide in general terms that the rent to be received should be proportioned to the actual cost of the works. There was no impropriety in the terms of the rent-clause being so framed, nor any legal disability on the part of the Company availing themselves of its terms, when the possibility which it provided against became a reality. But if so, with a statutory provision actually expressed in the very terms suited to the emergency, why should it be implied as a condition of this mutual contract that the aggregate capital of the Company was, in the case that has occurred, to be the measure of the sum for calculating the per centage? The special object and purpose of the incorporated Company, and the extent of the statutory capital, with the limited liabilities of the shareholders, are very important in all questions affecting either the character of the contracts which the Company may legitimately undertake, or the extent of responsibility legally attaching to its shareholders. But it is truly matter with which parties, so situated as the pursuers, have no concern to inquire into the source from which the funds may have been derived, that the Company make available to carry through their statutory undertaking. On the one hand, the pursuers in getting the works tendered to them in a perfect state, and in all respects satisfactory to their own engineer, get precisely what the statute declared they were to take over in lease. And on the other hand, the “money expended” legitimately in their formation, as reported by the same official, forms the sole basis for the ascertainment of the rent under the statute. In no other way would the bona fides of the statutory contract be preserved, or justice be done between the parties.

Any other view might lead to great confusion, and cause great injustice. The aggregate capital of the company might have been exhausted while the railway was yet in an incomplete state. What was to be the consequence in such circumstances? The expenditure of capital has been properly made on the works under the control and at the sight of the pursuer's engineer, but the funds are exhausted and the railway not finished. On the one hand, the pursuers can not be compelled to take in lease an incomplete railway, or portion of railway, and to pay rent for it at four per cent on the aggregate capital. On the other hand, the defenders are not to be left in the predicament of expending their capital in works useless and unprofitable, with their hands tied up from taking measures to obtain the necessary command of additional funds, so as to complete the railway, and place themselves in a situation to obtain the benefit of the statutory lease. I apprehend, that if the pursuers had felt it for their interest, they must have been entitled to insist on the railway being completed by the defenders. At all events, it seems clear to me that to avoid such a predicament as I have supposed, of the works being left incomplete and profitless, the defenders might have taken means to obtain additional funds. I see no legal objection to their having obtained for that purpose advances from bankers or others, or to their having incurred debts and liabilities in finishing the works, for repayment of which, at the moment, they might not have adequate capital. And were these modes of attaining the object of doubtful competency, I think it free of doubt that an application to Parliament to sanction an increase of capital would have been a perfectly legitimate measure. Nay, if other sources for obtaining funds were not available, this legislative application was the proper remedy in the circumstances. Its adoption was called for by the relative position of the two companies. I think even that the pursuers might have required it to be taken; and in answer to any demur on the part of the defenders, they could have pointed to the 45th section, No. 135. and met the objection to the expenditure of additional capital so to be obtained, by the agreement that the rent was to be proportioned to the money actually expended, whether original aggregate capital, or the addition thereto rendered requisite by the excess of cost over estimate. The generality of the terms employed in this rent-clause precisely met the case, and may fairly be held to have been purposely employed to meet such emergency.

On the whole, as regards the plea of implied contract, I do not think that this is a case in which it can be entertained, either in justice to the other contracting party, or in consistency with the statutory provisions.

But then it was contended that there was an impossibility on the part of the defenders having funds to any greater amount than their aggregate capital; and that irrespective of the plea of implied contract, there was an insuperable obstacle in the way of their asserting that they had expended more in the statutory works. As a corporation with a limited capital, it is said they could not be listened to in demanding four per cent upon any greater sum than the amount of that capital; and that it would be a violation of the condition of their statutory existence, to demand or to receive more than 4 per cent upon that amount; otherwise there would be recognised in them a right to draw a per centage on capital which they are not entitled so hold.

Now, whatever there might have been in the objection,—and I do not think there would have been much weight in it for reasons already explained,—it seems to me effectually obviated by the statute 1856, to the provisions of which Lord Murray has particularly referred. That statute was obtained before this question was stirred by the pursuers. Its preamble specially sets forth the necessity that existed for increasing the capital of the company in order to meet the debts and liabilities incurred in completing the railway and relative works. The Act then provides for the requisite addition of L.100,000 to the already existing funds of the company, by the creation and issue of new shares, with the relative power to borrow to the usual extent. And this addition to the capital, it is specially declared, “shall be considered as part of the general capital of the company, with all the rights and privileges thereof;” and it is farther provided, that the sums thus authorised to be raised “shall be applied in payment of the costs of this Act, and the debts and liabilities of the company, incurred or to be incurred, in carrying into effect the objects and purposes of the said recited Act, and for no other purpose whatsoever.” Ample funds have thus been placed at the command of the defenders as a statutory company, to meet the whole expenditure in completing this railway. Any supposed difficulty that might have existed from the alleged impossibility of the statutory company receiving a per centage on capital which they were not entitled to hold, is effectually obviated. The incapacity, if it ever existed, no longer exists.

The pursuers say that the increased capital provided for by the statute of 1856 ought not to affect the argument, because of the saving clause, that nothing in the Act contained was to be held or taken to affect, or alter the rights and liabilities of the two Companies as between themselves. Could the pursuers successfully maintain their plea of implied contract under the Act 1846, there would be a great deal in this view to require consideration. In that case they might say they stood virtually in the same position, as if the 45th section of the Act 1846 had, in express terms, made it a condition that they were in no event to pay more than four per cent on the original aggregate capital. I will not say to what effect the saving clause in the Act 1856 might, in that view, have been entitled. It is enough for the purposes of this argument to say that, discarding that plea, as I think it ought to be, the saving clause does not in its terms interfere with the power of the defenders to add to their available capital, in terms of the statute. This being done, the hindrance is removed that was supposed to be in the way, on the one hand, of providing for the debts and liabilities incurred in completing the works, and, on the other hand, of their receiving that full implement of the statutory contract from the pursuers, which they are entitled to demand.

I do not think that this statute, although passed in 1856, after the deficiency in the original aggregate capital was ascertained, is entitled to any less effect, than if a similar enactment had been applied for and obtained in 1847 in supplement of the Act of 1846, at a time when the formation of the railway was only being com-

Altogether I am of opinion, that in the action at the instance of the defenders, the fourth and fifth objections stated to Mr Miller's report should not be sustained, but the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary adhered to dismissing them; and that, in the action of declarator, decree ought to be pronounced in favour of the defenders.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor :—" Edinburgh, 27th February 1857.—The Lords having heard parties' procurators on the reclaiming note, by the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company, against Lord Neaves' interlocutor, in the action against them, at the instance of the Stirling and Dunfermline Railway Company;—and having at the same time heard the same counsel for the parties, on the merits of the action of declarator, at the instance of the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company, against the Stirling and Dunfermline Railway Company, Conjoin the said actions: Adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary in the first mentioned action, except in so far as it repels the objections to Mr Miller's report or certificate, which finding the Lords recall; and find that the pleas maintained by the defenders, and stated in these objections, cannot be entertained in the form of objections to Mr Miller's certificate or report, as the said report did not truly proceed on a judicial remit to Mr Miller, as a party appointed by the Court to report, and that such objections are in themselves unfounded on the merits: Refuse the prayer of the said reclaiming note, and decern: Find the reclaimers liable in expenses since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor: And in the action at the instance of the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company, repel the first plea in law stated by the pursuers; sustain the third and fourth pleas in defence stated by the Stirling and Dunfermline Railway Company, and therefore assoilzie the said Stirling and Dunfermline Railway Company, and decern: Find the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company liable in the expenses incurred in that action; allow the accounts to be given in, but on the footing that there is to be one account only for the discussion on the reclaiming note, and on the merits of the action at the instance of the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company; and remit the accounts when lodged to the Auditor to tax and to report: And quoad ultra, on the motion of the Stirling and Dunfermline Railway Company, that the questions of interest and expenses of process still remaining to be disposed of, under the said interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, should now be taken up by the Court, with a view to a final judgment on the whole points in the cause, without further delay, instead of remitting the cause back to the Lord Ordinary,—in respect that the said motion is not opposed by the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company, appoint parties' procurators to answer the said questions not disposed of, ad interim."

II. A discussion now took place in relation to the arrears of rent fixed by the Lord Ordinary.

And it is fixed and decided, that the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company were bound to have taken possession of that portion of the railway, under the statutory lease to them as at that date, and to pay termly the rent fixed on the expenditure when the latter should be ascertained in the manner prescribed by statute. In like manner two other portions were completed and certified in the same manner as on the 21st of June 1852, and the 29th of October 1852 respectively, and ought, on these dates, to have been taken possession of under the lease by the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company, and that the rent, when the expenditure is fixed, shall be paid termly from these dates for these two portions.

“As to these two latter portions, to which the present action refers, the question arises,—which has not been decided as to the portion first completed,—whether the defenders are to pay interest on the instalments of rents now payable for the terms during which the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company ought to have been in possession, and also during which, since August 1853, they have been in possession. I see no reason, in the view I take of this question, for delaying its decision, until an action now in dependence, claiming interest in like manner on the rent due in regard to the portion first completed, shall be prepared and brought forward for discussion. If the claim is the same and there are no specialties as to that portion, the point will follow the decision of the question in this action. If there are specialties, then these will be separately considered,—but as the question is ready for decision in the present action, it is much better to dispose of the matter at once.

“The present action concludes for interest on the rent applicable to the two portions last finished; but the terms of the conclusions require attention.

“There is first a conclusion that ‘it ought and should be found and declared, that the said defenders are, during the period prescribed by the said Acts, bound to take and hold in lease the said branch railways and the said portion of the main line of the said railway, respectively above mentioned, and to maintain the works so completed in good and sufficient order, and to pay to the pursuers an annual fixed rent or consideration for the use thereof, at the rate of four per cent on the whole amount expended by the pursuers in completing the said branch railways and portion of the main line of railway, as the said amount shall be ascertained and fixed by John Miller, civil engineer in Edinburgh, whom failing, by the engineer of the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company, for the time being, and also to pay to the pursuers a further fluctuating and contingent rent or consideration, equal to one-half of the whole receipts which shall appear from the books of the said defenders to have been drawn by them during each preceding year, in respect of the traffic of the said branch railways and portion of the main line of railways, after deducting the said fixed rent of four per cent, and a sum equal to 35 per cent on such gross receipts, in respect of the expense of maintaining and working the same; and for the purpose of ascertaining the said amount expended by the pursuers in completing the said branch railways and portion of the main line of railway as aforesaid,’ and then a conclusion occurs for a remit shewing that there were then no data for ascertaining the rent to be paid.

“From this part of the summons it is plain that the pursuers had not put themselves in a situation to say, or at all events were not able to say, this is the sum payable each term by the tenant, L.3000 or L.4000, or any other sum whatever.

“Then the summons concludes, that ‘the said defenders ought and should be decreed and ordained, by decree foresaid, to make payment to the pursuers, by equal moieties, on the 4th day of December and the 4th day of June yearly, commencing the first payment on the 4th day of December 1852, for what may be then due, and the next payment on the 4th day of June following, for the half-year preceding, and so on thereafter termly and proportionally or otherwise, commencing at such other date and payable at such other times or terms as may be fixed by our said Lords, of the sum of L.8000 sterling, or such other sum as may be ascertained in the course of this process to be the amount of a fixed yearly rent, calculated at the rate of four per centum per annum, on the amount expended by the pursuers in completing the said branch railways and portion of the main line of railway respectively, ascertained and fixed as aforesaid, the terms of payment of the said fixed rent being always first come and bygone, with the legal interest upon each of the said termly and proportional payments from the time when the same respectively become payable, and thereafter during the not payment thereof: And it further ought and should be found and declared, by decree foresaid, that the said defenders were bound, as upon the said 21st day of June 1852, to enter into possession of the said branch railways, and that they were bound, as upon the said 29th day of October 1852, to enter into possession of the said portion of the main line of railway, and thereafter during the said period prescribed by the said Acts, to exercise all the powers and authorities thereby conferred on the pursuers with respect to the maintenance, protection, and use of the said branch railways and portion of the main line of railway respectively, subject to the same provisions, rules, and regulations, as are by the said Acts imposed on the pursuers," &c.

The Edinburgh and Glasgow Company denied that interest was due; it was not specially stipulated for in the contract between the parties in the 45th section of the Act of 1846, and therefore could not be exacted; moreover, the analogy of common law was against the claim. They had not been in mora till the date of the last report by Mr Miller, and it was not due ex lege. There could be no debt till the amount of the expenditure was fixed, which it was only in 1856. Ground-annuals, and feu-duties, and other fixed annual payments, did not bear interest; the case of rent had never been subject of decision; but the same principles which applied to feu-duties would apply to rent also. There could be no doubt but this was a case of lease and rent due under it, and not a case of transfer. Even where the lease was for 999 years, as in the case of the Barrhead Railway, the two companies were held to stand to each other in the relation of landlord and tenant.¹

The Stirling and Dunfermline Company, on the other hand, maintained, that the principles to be applied to the case were those that regulated questions not between landlord and tenant, but between seller and purchaser. For this was a transfer quite beyond that of an ordinary lease, and embraced not merely the ground, but the whole corporate character and privileges of the lessors. Suppose the lease to have been for 999 years, and the consideration an annual payment, would that annual payment not be simply the price? The lessees had used and enjoyed for years the several sums found due, as well as the subjects, for which they were the price; therefore, on equitable grounds, they were bound to pay interest. It had been said by the Edinburgh and Glasgow Company that they had not been in mora, as the lessors had been the parties who allowed these sums to accumulate, but truly they had no alternative but to do so, while the Edinburgh and Glasgow Company maintained an action in which they denied all liability.¹ No. 135.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—(After the narrative quoted above, p. 614)—The sum—Mar. 4, 1857. The sum—Stirling and Dunfermline Railway Co. v. Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Co. mons, then, did not and could not conclude for any one sum as actually due—for no sums had been fixed as the year's rent. The conclusion is for interest, when each of the termly payments respectively become payable. But no sums became payable till the date of Mr Miller's certificate on the 20th May 1856. No sum could, until that date, be said to be the rent. No sum before that date could be demanded.

It is very doubtful to me, whether the conclusion is rightly framed to give effect to the claim for interests on the rents due for the possession before the date of Mr Miller's certificate, for I think it should specially have concluded for the sums payable for the bye-gone terms since June and October 1852, and with the interests thereon respectively, from and after the terms to which such payments apply—whereas the conclusion (framed no doubt chiefly with a view to future years) claims interest on these sums, when the same became payable, and none were payable until 20th May 1856.

But passing over this objection, the question arises—Now that the amount of expenditure has been fixed and the rent payable each term at the rate of four per cent on that amount ascertained, is interest due and exigible on the rents for the terms before 1856?

It is quite clear from the conclusion of this action that no sum was become, or could be stated as the particular rent due on each term's possession,—while on the other hand, the pursuers were (as well entitled) pressing on the defenders to take possession from the date of the certificate, as to completion of these portions of the line, severally without regard to the fixing the amount of expenditure in making the line.

Then the fact is, that when the pursuers called on the defenders to take possession of these portions of the undertaking as completed in terms of the obligations incumbent on the Stirling and Dunfermline Railway Company, and, therefore, entitled to call on the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company to take possession under the lease, the Stirling and Dunfermline Railway Company had not ascertained the expense, and therefore had not been able to fix the yearly rent. No doubt the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company were bound, as has been decided, to take possession of the subject of the statutory lease, so far as completed, whenever certified. But the Stirling and Dunfermline Railway Company were not bound to call on them to take possession before the amount of the expenditure was fixed by Mr Miller. But they did call on the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company to take possession before they had been able to get the expenditure fixed, and therefore before there were materials for ascertaining the yearly rent.

The Stirling and Dunfermline Railway Company were entitled to take that step if they chose, and to call on the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company to take possession as tenants, from the dates when the portions of the railway were certified respectively to have been completed. They were entitled to do so,—but then that was at a time when not only the rent was not ascertained, but when no data had been established on which any demand could have been made for any specific yearly rent.

In fact, the pursuers have not been able to ascertain the rent till the 20th of May 1856, as they did not, till that date, get the amount of their expenditure ascertained. I do not enter into any question as to the party who is to blame for this delay.

The pursuers have not shown, and have not averred that the defenders are the parties responsible for the lapse of six years before the amount of expenditure was fixed. The matter of fact is, that the pursuers could not obtain the certificate as to the expense until 1856.

Are they then entitled to claim the interest on the sums now found to be due as the yearly rent from the 21st June and the 29th October 1852 respectively?

The pursuers claim interest from the terms for possession from which the sums are payable.

I decline in this case to enter into any discussion as to the general principles applicable to the cases at common law, where one party is in the possession of the subject sold or let at a particular date, drawing the fruits on the one hand, while he has not paid the price, because not ascertained.

I take the case as depending upon a statutory contract, to which it would be very hazardous to apply any common law rules as to matters respecting which the statute is silent. Parties entering into ordinary contracts must be held to have in view all the obligations as well as rights resulting at common law out of such contracts, although not expressed therein,—but I cannot adopt any implication or inferences as to such a statutory lease, as the present. On this ground I took the plain words of the statute as my rule in the previous question, as to the expenditure on which the rent at the rate of four per cent was to be fixed. I take the same rule as my guide in this case. The Statute does not say that interest is to be payable on rents due for the possession during the terms which might elapse before the amount of rent was ascertained.

Very little foresight was necessary to make the Stirling and Dunfermline Railway Company fully aware that the ascertainment of the expenditure might be matter of considerable difficulty, and might occupy considerable time:—Further, by the terms of the contract, portions of the railway were to be taken in lease, though the whole was not completed.

Now it was a line, which, in the course of its execution, gave communication in its progress between different termini, though the remainder was not completed,—and the branch railway was a separate undertaking in point of work, although all falling under the statutory contract. Hence it was manifest that portions of the line would be the subject of the lease, and taken possession of long before the rent could be fixed:—Further, the statute declares that the rent is to be four per cent upon the amount expended in completing the line. It is not provided that the rent is to be four per cent on the amount of outlay on the different portions of the line, which might be successively finished and handed over to the tenants. Until the line was completed, the ascertainment of the cost could not take place,—hence of necessity portions would be given to the tenants, and they would be in possession at different periods, long before the whole line was completed, and long before the rent therefore could be fixed; that is to say, it was obvious that possession would be had more or less by the tenants under the contract of lease, before the rent payable could be ascertained for portions, or for the whole of the subject,—yet it is not provided that interest shall be paid on the rent which may be afterwards fixed for the possession had by the tenants, before the rent is fixed,—that, however, was a matter which required to be provided for, and which, if contemplated, ought to have been expressly stipulated. I may have some doubts indeed, but the parties have raised no such point, whether Mr Miller has proceeded quite accurately under the 45th section, which takes the completion of the railway as the term when the expenditure is to be ascertained, and the rent fixed.

Now there is a portion, as I understand, not ascertained,—and I doubt whether the whole expenditure ought not to have been ascertained at one time, and in one certificate;—at all events, passing over that point, the rent is not given on the expense of making these several portions;—I am somewhat apprehensive whether there has not been an oversight in the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, to which we have adhered in regard to the whole of this matter.

The Ordinary fixes a rent for the branch railways, and a portion of the main line, on the sums stated, in this last certificate, to have been expended on these portions of the undertaking.

Neither party called attention to this point,—but four per cent on the cost of making these portions may not be four per cent on the sum expended on the whole line, and there may require to be some after adjustment,—a matter not very reconcilable with the statute.

If either party suffers, it is their own fault; for objection, if well founded, was not hinted at by either. It may be that in the result the rent will be pretty equally balanced, but certainly I do not see that three different fixtures of rent is what the statute contemplates.

If the course followed is regular and competent under the statute, it would only the more follow that interest on the rents for the different portions to be finished at different times, should have been stipulated for. No. 135.

But, however, on every view, the nature of the contract by which possession was to be had under the lease of portions of the line, obviously pointed to the necessity of a stipulation, that interest on the rent should be paid for the possession had before the rent could be fixed,—if that was the agreement of parties. The statute contains no provision to that effect. Mar. 4, 1857. Stirling and Dunfermline Railway Co. v. Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Co.

I cannot introduce by implication,—indeed grounds for an implication to that effect, there are not,—neither can I proceed to apply, to this statutory lease, any rules applicable at common law to ordinary contracts, in regard to matters not provided for in the statutory enactment.

The claim for interest then cannot be sustained.

LORD MURRAY.—This case has been very fully and ably argued, but it appears to me, that the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company is not liable to pay interest upon the rent due by them until after the amount of that rent was ascertained by Mr Miller's certificate, on 20th May 1856, unless on special grounds which are not urged.

Until rent is ascertained, or the sum to be paid ascertained, the party may always allege that he was willing to pay the sum, and to pay the interest. Then it rested with the Stirling and Dunfermline Railway Company to produce their accounts to Mr Miller, to state what was the rent and the sum due, which was by Act of Parliament four per cent. on the outlay. All the necessary documents must have been in the possession of the Stirling and Dunfermline Railway Company, and there does not appear to have been any delay interposed on the part of Mr Miller. It was, therefore, apparently owing to the Dunfermline Railway Company alone, that the expenditure on the railway was not sooner ascertained, and the rent in consequence made current soon after the respective portions of the main or branch railways were completed.

It has, however, been strongly argued, that if a person is put in possession of any subject, he is bound to pay rent from the time of possession, but I know of no authority to that effect. There are very early decisions, that interest or annual-rent is due by those who are lucrati, by having had the use of money or subjects belonging to others. There is a decision to that effect, "Durie v. Lord Ramsay," in 1624, where the Court found that the defender ought to pay the principal sum with the profits since the term appointed for payment, notwithstanding an arrestment by the pursuer's creditors, "in respect he had bruiked the lands continually since the alienation of the same to him, and also hath retained the money which was the price thereof in his own hands."

Another decision to the same effect was pronounced three years afterwards (1627), Stirling v. Paunter. The price was not paid "because certain deeds were not fulfilled to him." The Court there held, that the party was obliged to pay the pursuer, either the profit of the money retained, or the profit of the lands, and gave the purchaser of the lands his option. These decisions are all stated by Lord Kaimes in his dictionary, which the older Judges and lawyers consider the best of his works, under the head of annualrent, "Due by those who are lucrati as having had the use of other people's money;" and he adduces six decisions to that effect, at the head of which he places the case of Hume v. Renton, reported by Spottiswood, under the head of usury, and includes among them the cases I have referred to.

A most equitable principle with reference to the payment of interest appears, therefore, to have been laid down by this Court upwards of two hundred years ago, and I see no reason for departing from the principles expounded very clearly in those decisions, and so admirably abridged by Lord Kaimes, and I know of no decision whatever that derogates from it. If the Dunfermline Railway had chosen to allege that the Edinburgh and Glasgow were lucrati from the profits they were entitled to have, they might be allowed to make such a claim under the principle of those most equitable decisions. But that was not urged, or it was not maintained that the Edinburgh and Glasgow were lucrati by any possession they actually had.

I have gone upon what I conceive to be the rules established in the law of this country, but with your Lordship I come to the same conclusion as arising from the provisions of the statute, into which it is not necessary that I should go after the opinion which your Lordship has stated with reference to them.

No. 125.

Mar. 4, 1857.
Stirling and Dunfermline
Railway Co.
v. Edinburgh
and Glasgow
Railway Co.

LORD COWAN.—The summons is dated 1st December 1852. Founding on the certificates of Mr Miller, it concludes to have it declared that the defenders are bound to take possession of the railway works from the date of their completion, and to make payment of such fixed yearly rent or consideration for the use thereof as should be ascertained, yearly and termly on the 4th December and 4th June, commencing the first payment on the 4th December 1852, or at such other date, and payable at such terms as might be fixed by the Court, “With the legal interest upon each of the said termly and proportional payments, from the time when the same respectively became payable, and thereafter during the not payment thereof.”

After the record was closed, and subsequent to the affirmance by the House of Lords of the similar judgment which had been pronounced in the first action, the Court found, by their interlocutor 19th July 1853, that the defenders inter alia were bound to pay to the pursuers an annual fixed rent or consideration at the rate of four per cent. per annum “on the whole amount expended by the pursuers in completing” the railway works, “as the said amount shall be ascertained and fixed” by Mr Miller, to whom remit was made to ascertain and fix the amount accordingly.

The report of Mr Miller was obtained and lodged in process on 20th–26th May 1856.

The interlocutor recently pronounced, has fixed the amount of the yearly rent or consideration, to which the pursuers are entitled termly and proportionally, from and after the completion of the railway during the period of the lease; and it remains for determination whether the claim now advanced for interest on the termly payments which became due, prior to the date of Mr Miller’s certificate, be well founded.

This claim is within the conclusions of the summons; and I do not think, having regard to the procedure in the action, that the mode taken to have the expenditure fixed and ascertained, so as to determine the amount of the fixed annual rent or consideration to be paid by the defenders, is objectionable.

In the first action the pursuers were held entitled to insist upon the defenders taking possession of the portion of the railway first completed; and this seems to me to have carried along with it the corresponding obligation to pay rent for its use proportionate to the money expended as fixed and ascertained by Mr Miller. Such accordingly was the course adopted in the first action without objection on the part of the defenders. In the same manner here, the expenditure upon the other parts of the railway works, to which this action relates, has been reported on, and the additional rent payable by the defenders been thereby fixed. In this I am unable to see any irregularity or incompetency under the statutory provisions, and no objection of the kind has been taken. The defenders have joined issue with the pursuers on the only point which now remains to be decided,—the claim of the pursuers for interest; and which, as I think, is duly and properly raised by the summons and record.

This claim mainly, if not altogether, depends on the special terms of the provisions embodying the statutory lease. These are contained in the 45th and 48th sections of the statute. The former provides that the defenders shall during the period of the lease maintain the works after their completion, and shall pay “an annual fixed rent or consideration for the use thereof equal to four per cent. on the amount which shall have been expended in obtaining this Act and in completing the said works, as the said amount shall be ascertained and fixed” by Mr Miller, and so forth. And the latter section enacts that the rent or consideration so to be paid shall form a charge on the railway works, and be recoverable in the same way as mortgage and loan debts; and farther provides that it shall be lawful for the companies or their directors “to make agreements among themselves as to the periods when and the instalments by which the said rent shall be paid, and fixing the mode in which the surplus profits from the railway shall be ascertained.

This last provision was not acted on by either of the parties; but it is not unimportant, shewing as it does that it was at the time contemplated that some agreement might be necessary to fix the periods when and the instalments by which the rent should be paid.

The material thing to be observed is that the amount of rent, payable by the 45th section annually, is by the statute left for ascertainment by Mr Miller; and this could scarcely be expected to take place till after the works were completed and possession taken,—and until such ascertainment did take place, the amount of rent payable was necessarily left an unknown quantity. The pursuers could expect no rent to be voluntarily paid, and could demand none except as payment to account, till the examination of the expenditure took place, on which the ascertainment of its amount depended. Not that for the period preceding such ascertainment, the rent when ascertained did not become exigible; but that no demand for any particular sum as the fixed annual consideration could possibly be made. Then, when the sum was ascertained so as to put it in the power of the lessees to pay the amount and obtain a discharge,—such payment being made, exhausted the statutory obligations, in so far certainly as the express terms of this rent clause are concerned. There is no provision that in addition to the rents, when ascertained and fixed, interest was to be paid from the close of the term or year for which they were due, until actual payment.

Now those parts of the Railway to which this action relates, were completed according to the certificate issued by Mr Miller, on 21st June, and 29th October 1852; and by the interlocutor of July 1853, the obligation of the defenders to take possession as at these dates was declared; but the report by Mr Miller was not obtained until 20th May 1856. The annual fixed sum payable by the defenders then became, for the first time, a known amount, capable of being settled and discharged.

It cannot, in my opinion, be held in this state of matters that there is liability on the part of the defenders, for the interest claimed. There are no express words to that effect, to make it in terms due vi statuti; and there is no legal ground for holding it impliedly due under the statutory contract. Where there is express statutory enactment, the obligations thereby imposed, cannot be added to, or enlarged by implication.

This is itself sufficient for the disposal of the claim; but it will be proper to advert to the more material views, so strongly pressed in the argument for the pursuers.

It was contended that the possession, which the defenders have had of the railway since 1st August 1853, and which they might and ought to have taken in 1852, carried with it both in equity and in law, an obligation to pay not merely the fixed annual rent or consideration becoming due between 1852 and 1856, but also interest on these yearly sums, from and after the successive terms at which they would have been payable, had the amount been ascertained.

In support of this view, reference was made to the rule recognised by the institutional writers, and by decisions of the Court, in cases of purchase and sale—viz., that where the purchaser has obtained possession of the subjects, he is bound to pay the price with interest from the date of his possession. The principle on which that rule rests is very obvious. It would be contrary to all equity, to allow the purchaser to possess the subjects with their fruits, without accounting for interest on the price which he has continued to hold in his hands. The interest is equivalent for the fruits, and drawing the one he must pay the other. But there is obviously no analogy between the present contract, and one of purchase and sale. This is the case of a lease for payment of rent or consideration for the use of the works leased, the amount payable as rent being unascertained. A totally different principle is applicable to such a case. There is the possession of the subjects leased, no doubt, but payment of the rent or consideration, when the amount becomes liquid by being ascertained, is the proper return for such possession.

Even where the consideration payable by the possessor is fixed and known, possession does not necessarily infer liability for interest on accruing duties or rent charges, when demand for payment has not been made, and these payments have fallen into arrear. This has been ruled in repeated decisions with regard to feu duties; and there is much weight in the view pressed by the defenders that rents are essentially in the same predicament. We are not called on to determine that question; but as I have examined the session papers in the case of Lord Dundas, the decision in which is very shortly given in the reports, I may explain, that there were tack duties payable in money, to a great extent in arrear, when the summonses for payment were instituted,—that in the conclusions interest was demanded from each term of those duties becoming exigible,—that under a remit to an accountant, various views were given of the balance due, according to the principle that might be applied to the claim for interest,—and that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, adhered to by the Court, gave interest only from the date of citation, thereby disallowing a large sum which would have been due on the money tack duties, which were in arrear at the date of the demand for payment by action.

Whether this principle may be applicable generally to arrears of rents of known amount and liquid but not demanded, it is not necessary here to inquire. The case of Lord Dundas was attended with peculiarities, and the decision may have been influenced by the specialties. In the present case the amount due was altogether unascertained. The rent or consideration to be annually paid, was left for subsequent ascertainment by the very terms of the contract. Payment could not be made termly by the defenders while the amount payable was unknown. The statute is silent as to liability for interest on arrears. As there was thus no claim for interest either ex lege or ex pacto express or implied, the only other ground of liability, ex mora, also fails. There could be no default in payment, until the sum could be paid and be effectually discharged.

No doubt it was urged that there might have been an interim payment tendered; but to this it was rejoined, and I think with success, that if there was room for interim payment it was for the pursuers to have made the demand, which they never did, either judicially or extrajudicially. The adjustment goes on before Mr Miller, and was not terminated until May 1856, when for the first time the amount of rent became known and can be held liquidated debt.

The case of the Union Canal Company, in the House of Lords, is an important authority for the defenders, as will at once be seen by contrasting the decision in this Court with the speeches delivered by the learned Lords who concurred in its reversal. And the decision of the House of Lords, in the case of Geddes, to which reference was made in the argument, also seems to me to be an authority much to the same effect.

Altogether, I am of opinion, that the interest claimed by the pursuers ought not to be allowed.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords, in respect of the interlocutor dated the 27th day of February last, having heard parties' procurators on the motion made by the Stirling and Dunfermline Railway Company for decree for interest on the sums found due by the Lord Ordinary, as the half-yearly payments of rent from and after the 4th day of December 1852, respectively for the years subsequent thereto, and prior to the 20th May 1856, being the date of Mr Miller's certificate, on the ground that the terms of payment are come and bygone, and no rent was paid for these years,—Refuse the said motion, and find that no interest is due on any of the sums of rent found due by the Lord Ordinary before the date of the said certificate of Mr Miller fixing the sum on which the rent was to be calculated, and assoilzie the defenders from that conclusion of the summons; but find that interest at the rate of five per cent is due from and after the said 20th May 1856, on all the half-yearly payments found due by the said interlocutor as rent for the terms specified in said interlocutor, and on the same half-yearly payments to fall due during the subsistence of the lease, the terms of payment being always first come and bygone, and decern; and allow this decret to be extracted ad interim: On the motions of the parties for expenses, find the pursuers entitled to the expenses of process to the date of 21st February last inclusive: Find the defenders entitled to the expense of the discussion of the claim by the pursuers for interest on the sums of rent due as aforesaid; allow accounts of expenses to be given in, and remit to the Auditor to tax the same, and to report."

ALEXANDER CAMPBELL, Defender.—Macfarlane—A. Mure.

Mar. 4, 1857.
M'Farlane v.
Campbell.

Sheriff-court—Competency—Right in security—Removing.—A creditor under a bond and disposition in security, containing power to output “possessors,” is not entitled, after requisition, to eject a landlord in possession by a summary process of removing before the Sheriff.

HUGH M'FARLANE and others, as trust-disponees of the late Alexander M'Arthur, were in right of an assignation of a bond and disposition in security of heritable subjects belonging to Alexander Campbell, on which infestment had followed in favour of M'Arthur. That bond contained a clause of sale, for the purpose of bringing the subjects to sale after premonition in the ordinary form. It also contained a clause (not always to be found in bonds of this description), whereby the defender, as granter of the bond, granted power and authority in very sweeping and comprehensive terms to the grantee and his successors to enter into possession of the subjects. The clause in question is expressed in these terms, “with full power, warrant, and commission to the said Alexander M'Arthur and his foresaids to intromit with, uplift and receive the same,” (rents, &c.) “and in the event of the interest of the said principal sum not being regularly paid at the respective terms when the same shall become due, to enter into possession of the said subjects and others, and to appoint a factor, grant tacks or leases, output and input possessors, uplift, receive, and discharge the rents and profits, and give up possession, and receive the same at pleasure,” &c.

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Benholme.
R.

Campbell himself being in possession of the subjects, paid neither capital nor interest; and the pursuers served upon him a notarial intimation and requisition with a view to a sale, and afterwards exposed the subjects; but no purchaser could be got, as was alleged, in consequence of Campbell's being in possession, and determined not to quit voluntarily. The present action of summary removal under the bond was accordingly brought against him in the Sheriff-court of Argyleshire.

It was pleaded in defence;—1. That the action was incompetent in the inferior Court, as truly involving a competition of heritable rights. 2. That it was incompetent in a summary process of removing (especially as there had been no decree of mails and duties), to invert the legal and actual possession held by the defender of his own property.

The Sheriff-substitute (Maclaurin) decerned in the removing, but, on appeal, the Sheriff-depute pronounced the following interlocutor:—“Finds that the present action being brought by the creditor under a bond and disposition in security for the summary removing of the proprietor in the natural possession of the subject disposed, is incompetent, at least in the Sheriff-court, therefore sustains the defences and dismisses the action: Finds the defender entitled to expenses,” &c. *

* “NOTE.—The Sheriff has considered this case, and examined the authorities with much attention and anxiety, and it is with great reluctance that he feels compelled to arrive at a different conclusion from the Sheriff-substitute.

“The Sheriff is asked to remove a proprietor from the natural possession of an heritable subject, at the instance of a creditor holding a bond and disposition in security over it. There is no doubt that the interest is in arrear, and that the creditor is entitled to sell under the power of sale, and to enter into possession by process of mails and duties, were that appropriate in the circumstances, and also to use the diligence of poinding the ground. But the pursuers in this action seek to have the defender removed summarily from the natural possession. They have not, however, been able to point to a single precedent for this course, and it appears to be inconsistent with the broad legal principles, as to the remedies of an heritable creditor, by bond and disposition in security, laid down by Lord Rutherford, in the

No. 136.

Mar. 4, 1857.
M'Farlane v.
Campbell.

The pursuers presented a note of advocacy.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Repels the case of Blair v. Galloway, 21st December 1853. In that case, the Second Division ultimately decerned in the removing, on the ground that the proprietors (marriage-contract trustees) were not truly in the natural possession, but were allowing a beneficiary to possess, without payment of rent, in order to defeat the heritable creditor's remedy, by mails and duties. But no dissent was intimated from the doctrine laid down by Lord Rutherford, that the creditor's power, under a bond and disposition in security, to enter into possession, does not include a right to oust the proprietor himself, if found in the natural possession. The Sheriff humbly thinks this doctrine to be correct in principle, and he has not found a trace either of authority or precedent to the contrary.

"It is urged, however, that the bond in the present case, contains a clause of an unusual description, and which must be viewed as equivalent to an obligation by the debtor, to remove and cede possession to the creditor, should the interest fall into arrear. The Sheriff has carefully considered this clause in all its parts, but cannot find sufficient ground for giving it the effect contended for. It consists first of the general power to enter to possession, 'with power in the event of the interest not being regularly paid to enter into possession of the said subjects.' This is no more than the power implied in the usual form of the bond and disposition in security, with assignation to rents, see 10 & 11 Vict. cap. 50, sect. 2. That power, whether express or implied, appears applicable only to the case of subjects let to the tenant, and is made effectual by the process of mails and duties, but it includes no power to grant leases or to remove tenants. But then the clause proceeds,—'and to grant tacks, output and input tenants and possessors.' There is nothing, as it appears to the Sheriff, in these words, necessarily extending the possession beyond the case of subjects under lease or left vacant voluntarily by the proprietor. They confer a power not included in the mere right to enter to possession and draw the rents, but they do not seem to extend the legal effect of the power to enter into possession as regards subjects retained in the natural possession of the proprietor.

"In the case of Forsyth v. Aird, December, 13, 1853, there was a power given to the heritable creditor to enter into possession, and output and input tenants: and it is important to observe how that clause was dealt with by the Court. It was regarded as an assignation by a landlord of his personal right and privilege to output and input tenants, and to pursue removings. This view could scarcely be consistent with that now pressed, that such a clause gives power to remove the landlord himself, should he be found in the natural possession.

"The addition of the word 'possessors' does not seem to strengthen the pursuer's argument. It can never be held to include the proprietor himself possessing under his infeftment, and it plainly only applies to vitious possessors—parties intruding without a title, or whose title by tenancy has expired.

"On these grounds the Sheriff is of opinion that there are no grounds for decerning in this removing. The case of tenants coming under an obligation to remove without warning, at a certain date, or on a certain event, such as bankruptcy, has been referred to; but that case seems to the Sheriff to be in marked contrast to the present. Here there is no express undertaking on the part of the defender to remove, or agreement that his right should on a certain event become void and null. It was on such very express and very pointed stipulations that the Court proceeded in the cases of Stevenson, 1 Shaw, p. 84; Hall v. Grant, 9 Shaw, p. 612; Forbes v. Duncan, 2d June 1812; and Gordon v. Copland, 1805, Morrison's Appendix, Tack, No. 11.

"The Sheriff further conceives that, even if an argument could be maintained that under his bond the defender is bound to concur with the pursuers in granting a tack of his house, and remove himself to make way for the tenant, it would be necessary to establish this in a declaratory action before the Court of Session. The defender is in possession under an infeftment as proprietor undivested, and the Sheriff knows of no precedent for a summary removing by the local judge in such circumstances. Such removings are only granted by the Sheriff where parties are possessing without any title, such as a setter after the term of entry in the disposition who is divested, or the heirs of a liferenter after the death of a liferenter, who reasons of advocacy, remits the case simpliciter to the Sheriff, and decerns: No. 136. Finds the advocates liable in expenses, appoints an account," &c. *

Mar. 4, 1857.
M'Farlane v.
Campbell.

The pursuers reclaimed, arguing that the terms of their bond were quite unusual and peculiar, and must therefore have been intended to convey extraordinary powers;—They imply power to enter against the landlord as well as against the tenants, and such being the conventional stipulation, no declarator was required. Sometimes that is required, but there is a whole class of cases like that of Gordon on the subject of tack, where a conventional irritancy has been held sufficient.¹ It was said that they had under the clause in the deed merely a right to a process of mails and duties, but that would not avail where there were no tenants. There was such a process in Forsyth's case, but the Court held that to be quite unimportant; and in Blair's case there was no power of entry whatever, but a mere assignation of rents, so that these cases could not rule the present one.

The defender replied;—That in the deed the word "possessor" was not to be read as applying to the landlord, but rather to kinds of possession more limited than ordinary tenancy. But apart from any question arising under the terms of the deed, the matter is one which the Sheriff could not deal with, having no jurisdiction but that conferred by the Act of Sederunt, which did not cover the present case. The pursuers' remedy was to exercise their power of sale.²

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK stated, that he adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, on the ground that a summary action of removing against a proprietor who was feudally infest, was clearly incompetent in the Sheriff Court. I limit myself to that ground.

LORD MURRAY concurred.

LORD WOOD absent.

LORD COWAN.—I am content to acquiesce in the ground of judgment proposed to your Lordship. A great deal might be said upon the meaning of the clause in the bond and disposition founded on by the advocator, as to whether it includes the proprietor of the subjects or not. But assuming—not admitting—that to certain effects the proprietor might be included within it, I am of opinion that its terms were not intended to confer, and did not confer, power on the heritable creditor by summary process of removing before the Sheriff Court, to remove from session the proprietor by whom the bond was granted.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor :—"Refuse the said mere intruders, or a tenant who has agreed that his right shall become null and void upon his committing an act of bankruptcy, and that he may be removed therefrom without warning.

The defender here, on the contrary, is not divested, and has granted no express obligation to remove; and the question, therefore, seems to resolve into a competition of heritable rights, which is incompetent in the Sheriff Court. The dicta in the case of Waterston v. Mason, 30th June 1846, bear very strongly on this point.

The Sheriff can quite understand that the pursuers may have good reasons for wishing to oust the defender, notwithstanding the power of sale, and that they might thus turn the security to much better account. But these are not considerations for the Court, and the creditor must just make the best of the security on which he lent his money, according to the legal effect of the deed by which it is constituted."

NOTE.—"The Lord Ordinary agrees with the views of the Sheriff so clearly expressed in his note to the interlocutor of 5th April 1856."

Prescription—Statutes 1469, cap. 28; 1474, cap. 54; 1617, cap. 12—Trust.—A truster, who died in 1791, directed his trustees to invest the free residue of his estate in land, to be entailed in favour of the same series of heirs, and on the same conditions with those specified in a deed of entail, to which he referred. Having realised the trust-estate, the trustees, with the concurrence of the then beneficiaries, purchased an estate, the price of which exceeded the amount of the trust-funds by L.4000. The first instalment of the price was paid, and possession taken, at Martinmas 1812. But it was only in 1815 they obtained a disposition to the lands, which they took in their own favour. No deed of denudation and tailzie was ever executed by them. They accounted to the heirs for the free annual proceeds down till 1850. In 1853, being more than forty years after the first payment of the price, but not forty years after the completion of the transaction, the heir and beneficiaries raised an action of count, reckoning, and payment against the trustees, calling on them to account for and invest the balance of the trust-funds in terms of the directions in the trust-deed, and challenging, by a declaratory conclusion, the purchase in 1812, as ultra vires, in respect of the excess of the price over the funds. The estate purchased in 1812 was now greatly depreciated in value. The subsistence of the trust was admitted, and the trust-accounts were produced;—Held (diss. Lord Ivory), that the trustees were entitled to plead the negative prescription against a challenge of the transaction in 1812.

1st Division.

THIS action was raised by the beneficiaries under the trust-disposition and settlement of the deceased John Barnes. It was directed against Lawrence Hill, sole surviving and acting trustee under the settlement, and against the representatives of the deceased trustees. The summons concluded for count and reckoning, in order that the balance and residue of the trust-fund should be invested in the purchase of lands in terms of the trust-deed, and, in the event of failure so to count and reckon, then the summons concluded for payment of L.10,000, as the balance of the trust-funds remaining to be invested, and, when so invested, that the titles to the lands so purchased should be taken in favour of the pursuers, according to the conditions of the trust-settlement. Lastly, it contained the following declaratory conclusions:—Farther, it ought and should be found and declared, by decree fore-said, that no power is conferred by the said trust-disposition and settlement on the trustees thereby nominated and assumed in virtue thereof, to borrow money or to grant security upon any land purchased or to be purchased for the said trust-estate, or to take any conveyances in their own names; and that any transaction or purchase made, or conveyances taken otherwise, or securities granted by the said trustees, were and are ultra vires of the said trustees, and illegal and unwarranted, and that the same cannot be binding on or affect the said trust-estate, or the funds and property thereof.

Art. 11 of the pursuer's condescendence was as follows:—"The pursuer, the said Patrick Graham Barnes, has not received payment of any part of the annual return from, or free proceeds of, the residue of the said trust-estate of the said John Barnes, though he has made frequent applications for the same. The pursuers have been unable to obtain any satisfactory account of the funds and property left by the said John Barns, and forming the subject of his said trust-disposition and settlement, or of the intrusions of any of the said trustees, original and assumed, who accepted and acted as aforesaid, or of any factors or agents or others employed by them, with the said trust-estate. The pursuers have been informed of a transaction to which, under reservation of their right to state all competent objections to any accounts that may be given in and rendered by the defenders, or any of them, they have now specially to object as altogether unwarranted and illegal, and as having occasioned an undue application of the funds of the trust. The following are the particulars of the said transaction, so far as known to the pursuers."

Barns v.

Barns' Trustees.

That transaction was a purchase of the estate of Hobsland, in Ayrshire, by the trustees in 1812. In art. 19, the pursuers "objected to the transaction as incompetent, illegal, and unwarranted by the trust-disposition and settlement of the said John Barns, and to the application of the said trust-funds thereto."

The following narrative is taken from the note appended by the Lord Ordinary to his interlocutor:—"This action is raised at the instance of the existing beneficiaries, under a trust-disposition and settlement executed by Mr John Barns, who died, without issue, in May 1791. He had executed a deed of tailzie, of even date with his trust-deed, of the lands of Kirkhill, in Ayrshire; and, by the trust-deed, he conveyed his whole remaining means and estate to his trustees, for payment of debts and legacies, a jointure of L.300 a-year to his widow, a life annuity of L.100 to John Deans, and, in the last place, he appointed his trustees to denude of such part of his heritable estate as they might think proper to keep unsold, and to invest the free residue of his whole other heritable and moveable estate in the purchase of lands, to be entailed in favour of the same series of heirs, and under the same conditions, with those specified in the entail of Kirkhill,—the annuities to his widow and to John Deans being to be secured by way of liferent locality, upon the lands to be so entailed.

"The widow died in 1795, and John Deans in 1800. In this last-mentioned year, a multiplepoinding was raised, in order to determine whether a sum of L.1729, 9s. 2½d. of accruing interest, fell to be paid to James Stevenson, afterwards Sir James Stevenson Barns, the heir in possession under the entail of Kirkhill, or to be accumulated with the capital, for the purchase and entail of additional lands. The heir in possession was preferred, by interlocutor of date 3d June 1802. By this time, or soon afterwards, the trust-estate appears to have been fully realised, and there was found to remain, in the hands of the trustees, a balance, available for the purchase of lands, of L.7800. After (it is said) a variety of unsuccessful efforts to find a suitable property, corresponding in price to this sum, the trustees, in 1812, purchased certain lands in Ayrshire, called Hobsland, at the price of L.12,000, and obtained a disposition thereto, in their own favour, as trustees, for the purposes of the trust. This disposition is dated in May, July, and August 1814, and February 1815, with entry as at Martinmas 1811. Of the stipulated price, L.2200 was allowed to remain secured upon the lands purchased: and the balance of L.2200 was raised, under a personal bond granted by them, it is understood, in their character of trustees.

"The free annual proceeds of the lands thus purchased, from the date of the purchase down to the death of Sir James Stevenson Barns in 1850, appear to have been accounted for to Sir James, the heir of entail in possession of Kirkhill, who succeeded upon the death of the entailer in 1791, and to his representatives.

"No deed of denudation and tailzie of Hobsland has, however, hitherto

No. 137. Mar. 5, 1857. Barns v. Barns' Trustees. been executed by the trustees. Mr Patrick Graham Barns, the heir in possession, who succeeded on the death of Sir James, and the substitute heirs, now attempt to repudiate this purchase, and call upon the trustees to invest the foresaid sum of L.7800, or whatever the just balance may appear to be, in the purchase of lands,—taking the burden of Hobsland, which is now greatly depreciated in value, on themselves. Such, it was explained at the bar, is the leading object of the present action; and it was agreed that the question thus raised should be in the first instance decided, before going into the particulars of the accounting, or into the question upon which of the trustees, or their representatives, any liability, which may have been incurred, ought to fall.

“ There are two difficulties in the way of vindicating the trust-management—the excess of the price over the funds, and the delay in re-selling the surplus to pay off the debt thus contracted.

As to the excess of price, it is said on behalf of the trustees, that they could not find, and could not be expected to find, a suitable property at a price precisely equal to the fund in their hands, and that, to have bought at a price less than the fund, would have resulted in leaving a balance unemployed. As to the delay in re-selling the surplus, it is said, that since the depreciation of land at the peace in 1814-15, there has never been a time at which a re-sale could have been advantageously effected, and that the value of land at present is higher than it has been during the intermediate period. If, therefore, there was any prejudicial delay at all, this, it is said, could only have occurred during the short interval between the purchase and the peace, against the consequences of which delay the trustees are fully protected by the declaration in the trust-deed, that they ‘ shall not be liable for omissions.’

“ It is further said that both objections are now excluded by delay, taciturnity, and homologation.

“ In order to judge of this last mentioned plea, it is necessary to attend to the following circumstances:—

“ The first heir of entail who succeeded on the death of the truster, in 1791, was, as already mentioned, Mr James Stevenson, sometime a colonel in the army, who afterwards became Sir James Stevenson Barns. He attained majority in 1795. The next nominatim substitute was his elder brother, Mr John Stevenson, one of the trustees, who died in 1815. Then his sister, Jean, or Jane, born in or about 1770, who died in 1827. Then Mr Alexander Graham, born in or about 1763, who died in 1820; and then his son, the leading pursuer, Mr Patrick Graham Barns, born in 1793, who is the heir of entail at present in possession, having succeeded in 1850. It will be observed that all these nominatim substitutes, as well as the heir in possession, were of full age at and prior to the purchase of Hobsland in 1812, with the exception of Mr Patrick Graham Barns, who attained majority in 1813. The others, however, predeceased Sir James, and, of course, never attained possession.

“ The only acting trustees in 1812 were Mr John Stevenson and Dr Hope. It is clear enough, from the correspondence, that Sir James, who was occasionally absent with his regiment, entrusted his interests, and the power of giving instructions in his affairs, a good deal to his brother John, who made considerable advances to him. It is equally clear that both of them, in all matters connected with the purchase and management of land, had great confidence in their relative, Mr Alexander Graham, a person of undoubted skill and experience in such matters, and who was the father of the whole of the present pursuers, except Mr Patrick Graham, W.S. and his family, who are also related to him, although they do not represent him, as his own family do.

"It appears from a letter from Mr Alexander Graham to Mr James Hope, No. 137. the agent under the trust, dated 4th April 1811, that Sir James, (then Colonel Barns) had been in personal communication with Mr Alexander Graham about the purchase of an estate, obviously with the trust-funds, for Sir James had no other means, and that Sir James had 'carried' Mr Graham to look, with that view, at a place called Muirkirk, which Mr Graham did not approve of. This led Mr Alexander Graham to look out for other and more suitable properties, one of which, situated in Renfrewshire, he brought under the notice of the trustees by a letter to their agent, Mr James Hope, dated 30th December 1811. Mr Hope answered on 7th January 1812, that Mr John Stevenson, then in Ayrshire, had been written to on the subject, and added, 'Mr Stevenson's answer in regard to the lands in question shall be communicated to you, and I am sure that both he and Dr Hope will be much influenced by your opinion in any purchase which presents itself.' This was followed by another letter from Mr Hope, bearing that Mr Stevenson joined in requesting that Mr Graham would examine the lands he had mentioned, which Mr Graham accordingly did, and on 1st February 1812, wrote, recommending them as an eligible purchase at L.14,000, but at sametime proposed to inspect Hobsland, which had, by this time, come into the market at a similar price.

Barns v.
Barns'
Trustees.

"This being acceded to, Mr Graham wrote, on 19th February 1812, 'I consider Hobsland, &c., to be a most eligible purchase,' so much so, that, if the trustees will not do so, 'I intend to try to secure it for myself, or a friend. It is a fine situation, good climate, with the privilege of seaware, and produces crops of the best quality,' &c. This letter was communicated to Mr John Stevenson, who wrote, on 28th February 1812, 'I had gone over them some time ago, with a view to a purchase for my brother, and consider them, on the whole, an eligible purchase, if they could be got at a moderate price;' and as Mr Graham's opinion had been so strongly expressed, 'I am convinced we may rely with safety on the purchase being a favourable one, and Dr Hope has my full concurrence in directing it to be immediately made. As the difference between the price and the extent of the trust-funds is considerable, it will be necessary to make arrangements to that amount, either with sellers, or with some of the banks, till the final adjustment of the objects of the trust, or till some change takes place in my affairs, when it, perhaps, may be in my power to be of use to my brother.' The lands were accordingly purchased at L.12,000; and, on 19th March 1812, Mr Alexander Graham wrote to the agent under the trust, 'I congratulate you and all concerned on the purchase of Hobsland, which, I must say, you have managed well.' On 26th March 1812, he wrote that some detached land, comprehended in the entail of Kirkhill, 'might be exchanged and sold, which I think a much preferable plan to selling any part of the last purchase.' Mr John Stevenson, on behalf of his brother, seems to have concurred in this view; for, on 27th March 1812, he wrote, 'In the course of the next three months we shall have time to consider what part of my brother's lands it will be most judicious to part with.' The agent wrote to Mr Graham on 8th April 1812, 'My own opinion certainly is, that it would be desirable to retain as much of these lands as possible, the whole if possible, and to part with everything that is detached.'

"Awaiting, apparently, an opportunity of this kind, to suit at once the views of the heir in possession, and the interests of all concerned, the matter lay over till the price of land fell, which it is well known to have done at the termination of the war, and a re-sale seems then to have been found impracticable, except at a sacrifice which the parties were not willing to make.

"It is material to observe, that during all this time, as well as subsequently, Mr James Hope, the agent under the trust, was factor and com-

Barns v.
Barns'
Trustees.

“It appears, from a letter from Mr John Stevenson to Mr James Hope, of 26th April 1812, as well as from subsequent documents, that, upon the purchase of Hobsland being completed, Mr John Stevenson, on behalf of his brother, who was not then in Ayrshire, but with whom he was in correspondence, took possession of the farm of Hobsland, then unlet, and purchased and placed upon it the necessary stocking, with a view to reap the crop of that year, which was accordingly done: and his whole actings in the matter were fully adopted by his brother, Sir James, as appears from a letter addressed by Sir James, after his return home, to Mr James Hope, of date 22d December 1812, with relative state thereto prefixed. These documents likewise shew that Mr James Hope was then acting on behalf of Sir James Stevenson Barns.

“In the meantime, in the course of the summer and autumn of 1812, a correspondence had taken place between Mr Robert Nicholson, on the one hand, and Mr John Stevenson and Mr James Hope, on the other, with a view to Mr Nicholson becoming tenant of the farm of Hobsland, in the course of which (as the letters shew), Mr John Stevenson likewise corresponded with his brother on the subject. Sir James had returned to Ayrshire before this negotiation was concluded, and had a personal interview with Nicholson on the subject, as appears from Nicholson's letter to Mr James Hope, of 16th December 1812. The negotiation seems to have been, about that time, completed; for, in a postscript to his letter already mentioned, to Mr Hope, of 22d December 1812, Sir James says, ‘The tenant at Hobsland is desirous of having the scroll of the tack.’

“Accordingly, Nicholson entered into possession as at Martinmas 1812: but it appears from Mr Hope's business account and relative letters, that the tack, although prepared in January 1813, was not actually extended and signed till May or June 1815. On 2d January 1815, Sir James writes to Mr Hope, ‘I have been several times at Hobsland, which is in good order. I beg you will send me any plan there is of it, as Mr Oswald has requested that two people should be named to decide upon the march between his estate and mine,’—meaning, obviously, the estate of Hobsland. He adds, ‘I have arranged with Mr Dunlop, that he is immediately to open the gate he had shut up to prevent the tenant at Hobsland from going for seaware.’ On 13th May 1815, Sir James writes to Mr Hope, ‘I expected to have been able to transmit the tack of Hobsland to-day, but Mr Nicholson was unwell and could not keep his appointment this morning.’ On 14th May 1815, he writes, ‘We go over to Hobsland on Monday, and I hope to be able to send you the tack on Tuesday.’ On the 16th, he writes, ‘I expect to be able to send you the scroll of the lease in a day or two.’ Accordingly, on 21st May 1815, he writes, ‘I send you the scroll of Hobsland tack, which Richard Campbell settled with Mr Nicholson's brother.’ ‘When the tack is made out, pray send the scroll with it to me.’

“The scroll tack thus referred to is produced, and has the following docquet appended to it:—‘1815. May 19.—The preceding lease was this day revised by us for behoof of the parties. (Signed) RICHARD CAMPBELL, JOHN NICHOLSON.’ Campbell appears to have been a country agent, employed by Sir James Stevenson, who was a consenting party to this lease.

“The lease bore to be entered into between Mr John Stevenson and Dr Hope as trustees, and ‘Colonel James Stevenson Barns of Kirkhill, for his right and interest in the foresaid trust, on the one part, and Robert Nicholson, in Hobsland, upon the other part;’—the endurance to be for nineteen years after Martinmas 1812, as to the arable lands, and after Whitunday 1813 as to the houses and grass; and the rent, for the first six years, to be

L.349, 5s., and thereafter L.383, 12s. per annum. Mr Hope's business account contains an entry under date 27th May 1815, 'Writing Colonel Barns with do. (i.e., the tack) for signature.' The principal tack has not been recovered, but there can be no doubt that it was executed, for it is referred to in a letter (to be afterwards noticed), as to be given up to the tenant, who fell into bad health, and agreed to remove at Martinmas 1817, on which occasion Sir James arranged with him about the straw, the rent, and the allowance to be made for the houses and fences.

Barns v.
Barns'
Trustees.

"It is here necessary to notice that, in May 1815, Sir James appointed Mr Thomas Ranken, residing in Ayr, to be his local factor, and that Ranken, as appears from the account between him and Sir James (No. 71 of process), for some years thereafter collected the rents of the estate of Hobsland for behoof of Sir James, along with the rents of Kirkhill, and paid the public and parochial burdens applicable to both estates. Ranken's management included the rousing off of Nicholson's crop, and the realisation of the proceeds towards liquidation of the rents, &c., on his leaving the farm of Hobsland, and likewise the superintendence of the farm of Fairlies, let to John Gibson at a rent of L.68, or thereby, being the only other farm of which the estate of Hobsland consisted.

"This arrangement, in consequence, probably, of Sir James leaving the country, was altered in 1820, as appears from a letter dated 9th August of that year, from Mr Ranken to Mr James Hope, bearing, 'I, the other day, received a letter from Colonel Barns desiring me to remit you, in future, the rents of Hobsland and Fairlies. I shall attend to this when a payment is made. I sent the Colonel a state shewing how the tenants stand, which I presume he has communicated to you.' The same letter shews that there was now a difficulty in getting more than L.180 of rent for the farm of Hobsland. The appropriation of the whole rents for some years by Sir James, and thereafter the diminution in their amount, gave rise to a balance in favour of Mr James Hope, who continued to pay the interest of the money borrowed, and to make other disbursements, which balance went on increasing till it amounted, with interest, on 7th March 1843, to L.3581, 12s., when Sir James paid it off, as appears from a letter from him to Mr James Hope, of that date, No. 89 of process. The balance of the rents subsequently arising appears to have been settled with Sir James' executors.

"It is not alleged that Sir James, at any period of his long life, objected to or repudiated the purchase of Hobsland, either upon the ground that the price paid for it exceeded the capital of the trust-funds, or upon any other ground. On the contrary, with perfect access, through his commissioner and his brother, as well as personally, to a knowledge of the state of the trust-accounts, from the date of the multiplepoinding in which he was a successful claimant, in 1802, downwards, as well as full access to know the whole other circumstances, it is quite clear that Sir James homologated and approved of that purchase.

"Neither is it alleged that any of the substitute heirs ever made any objection to the purchase till the present action was raised in June 1853. Nor that either they or Sir James ever required the trustees to re-sell any part of the lands.

"It is not denied that the purchase was made at a fair price, and that it would have been a proper and expedient investment at the time, had the amount of the capital of the trust-estate been equal to the price. The question now is, Can the pursuers, the substitute heirs of entail, at this distance of time, and after all that has taken place, repudiate the purchase on the ground that the price exceeded, to the extent already mentioned, the free amount of the trust-funds, or upon the ground that the trustees have unduly delayed to re-sell the surplus so as to equalise the price and the capital of the trust-estate?

 Barns v.
 Barns'
 Trustees.

The Lord Ordinary, on 27th January 1855, pronounced the following Interlocutor:—"Finds, that the pursuers are not now entitled to challenge or repudiate the purchase of the lands of Hobsland and others, made in 1812 by the trustees of the late John Barns, for behoof of his trust-estate: Finds, that these lands must now be held to be vested in the trustees, or surviving and acting trustee, of the said John Barns, for the purposes of the trust specified in the trust-deed and settlement, dated 4th June 1789; and, with these findings, appoints the cause to be enrolled, that the same may be applied, and that parties may state in what manner they respectively propose that the cause shall be proceeded with, and prepared for ultimate judgment."

* "NOTE.—(After the above narrative), The question now is, Can the pursuers, the substitute heirs of entail, at this distance of time, and after all that has taken place, repudiate the purchase on the ground that the price exceeded, to the extent already mentioned, the free amount of the trust funds, or upon the ground that the trustees have unduly delayed to re-sell the surplus so as to equalise the price and the capital of the trust estate? The Lord Ordinary thinks not.

Take the case in the first instance, as it had occurred with fee simple beneficiaries. Suppose the estate, in place of being to be entailed, had been directed to be conveyed to Sir James Stevenson Barns, and his heirs, in fee simple, it seems clear enough that neither Sir James nor his heirs could, in that case, have repudiated the purchase, or thrown liability upon the trustees upon either of the grounds just mentioned.

This leaves only the question, Whether the case be substantially different in respect Sir James Stevenson Barns and his successors were tailzied in place of fee simple beneficiaries?

The late case of Macpherson, 16th July 1841, establishes, that in reference to the trust-estate and trust-management, the position of Sir James Stevenson Barns was substantially that of an heir of entail in possession.

Sir James might have docqueted the trust-accounts, discharged the trustees, and accepted of a deed of entail of Hobsland; and had he done so fairly, and in bona fide, none of the substitute heirs could ever have made any objection.

The truster did not contemplate that the lands to be purchased and entailed should be free of all burdens; on the contrary, he intended them to be burdened with his widow's jointure, and with the annuity to John Deans. Now, suppose the debt incurred in making the purchase had been, at once, converted into the form of a redeemable bond of annuity, and the contemplated deed of entail had been executed, and accepted, recorded, and feudalised in 1812 under the burden of that bond, could the substitute heirs of entail, under this summons, raised in June 1853, more than forty years afterwards, have challenged any part of that transaction?

Or, to take what is perhaps a more unexceptionable case, because more analogous to what now falls to be done, suppose that after waiting for a few years,—say till 1820, or at any time between that date and his death in 1850,—Sir James Stevenson Barns, despairing of a more favourable market, had required the trustees to sell as much of Hobsland as would pay the debt, and to execute an entail, in terms of the trust-deed, of what remained, and this had accordingly been done, and the entail duly recorded and feudalised, and the trustees discharged, all in perfect good faith upon his part,—could the substitute heirs afterwards have challenged this transaction, or made any further claim against the trustees? The Lord Ordinary apprehends they could not.

But if Sir James, had he been now alive, and requiring the trust to be wound up, could not have thrown liability upon the trustees, but must have accepted an entail of the remaining lands after selling as much as would pay the debt, and, if this acceptance would have bound all the substitute heirs, upon what principle can these substitute heirs be in a better position by raising this question after his death, than if it had been raised in his lifetime?

They can only be so, by holding that from 1791 to 1850,—a period of about sixty years, during which Sir James was the heir in possession of Kirkhill,—there was nobody to represent the beneficial interest in the trust-estate, to the effect of sanctioning the trust-management and administration, a proposition which can hardly be maintained.

Barns v.
Barns'
Trustees.

Not only the heir in possession of Kirkhill, but any of the substitute heirs, if they could have shewn that the heir in possession was improperly neglecting their interests, might, the Lord Ordinary apprehends, at any time after the truster's death, have competently instituted an action to have the trust-purposes implemented, and the trust wound up. Mr John Stevenson, one of the trustees, was the next substitute, up to his death in 1815; then Jean his sister, till her death in 1827; and then the pursuer, Mr Patrick Graham Barns, who came into actual possession in 1850, but brought no action till June 1853. Every one of these substitute heirs was, as already mentioned, of full age, and therefore sui juris in 1812, except the pursuer, Mr Patrick Graham Barns, who attained majority in 1813, before the price of Hobsland had been fully paid, or the disposition granted. The other pursuers, with the exception of the children of Mr Patrick Graham, W.S., were likewise of full age during the greater part of the intervening period. But all of them acquiesced in the purchase, and in the postponement of a re-sale, up to the date of the present action. If the price of land had risen, they would, doubtless, have claimed and been entitled to the benefit; and the Lord Ordinary does not think that, post tantum temporis, and under all the circumstances, they can succeed in this action because the price of land has fallen.

The pleas now maintained have still less equity to recommend them in the mouths of the children of Mr Alexander Graham (who admittedly represent their father), upon whose earnest recommendation the purchase was made and the whole retained, than at the instance of their relative, Mr Patrick Graham, W.S., and his family. But the Lord Ordinary does not proceed upon the ground of personal representation as regards any of the parties. He considers it sufficient to hold them bound by the acts, taciturnity and homologation, of those possessing the right of challenge for the time being, to the same extent and effect as heirs of entail are usually so bound.

Each heir of entail in possession is proprietor in his order, and entitled to bind his successors in the estate in every thing not expressly prohibited. Wherever prescription runs against him, it runs also against the substitute heirs without deduction of their minorities, on the principle that the whole are a collective or aggregate body, represented by the heir in possession,—a principle without which there would be no safety for third parties or the public.

Nor does the Lord Ordinary think it necessary to proceed upon the plea, insisted in at the bar, but not to be found in the record, that the pursuers' right of action is cut off by the long negative prescription, although this plea may deserve attention, if it be necessary to resort to it. It was not explained whether the plea is rested upon the statute 1617, cap. 12, or upon the older statutes 1469, cap. 28, and 1474, cap. 54. The only authority referred to in support of it was Kinloch, &c., v. Rocheid, (M. Ap. Prescrip., Nos. 4 and 7); which certainly affords an instance of the negative prescription being sustained upon some points in an accounting, although not upon all; but the case itself related to a direct claim against an heir of entail for money which it was said he had failed to invest, and was therefore different from the present. Many of the authorities on this branch of the law are cited in the well-known case of Paul v. Reid, 8th February 1814, F. C.

It appears to the Lord Ordinary, however, that neither the claim for an accounting, nor the alleged liability for delay in re-selling the surplus lands, can be held to be excluded by the negative prescription. It may be a nicer question whether the substantive objection to the act of purchasing Hobsland in 1812, as altogether ultra vires of the trustees, can still form a ground of action, although more than forty years have elapsed since that purchase was made.

In any view, the Lord Ordinary does not see how the pursuers could get decree in terms of the only declaratory conclusion in their summons, which is in very sweeping and abstract terms; and he must observe that not only the summons, but the statements and pleas on both sides, are less precise and satisfactory than might have been expected in a case of this anxiety and importance. He has, however, taken the case in its substance, upon the footing that parties, although they have

No. 137. act of administration or management under the trust-deed and settlement; to decern in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons; and to find that the pursuers were entitled to have a full and particular accounting of the whole funds and estate contained in the trust-disposition and settlement, and on the same being ascertained, that the defender, Mr Laurence Hill, the sole surviving and acting trustee, was bound to lay out, invest, and secure the residue, in terms of the trust-deed; to remit the process to the Lord Ordinary, &c.

Trustees.

The case was called for debate in June 1856. The defenders then pleaded the negative prescription, which they maintained cut off all right of action as regards the purchase of the estate of Hobsland. The case was then of consent continued, to allow parties to amend the record by adding pleas in law applicable to that defence.

The additional plea in law for the defenders was as follows:—"The present action and demand are excluded by the negative prescription established in the law of Scotland, and enacted by the statutes 1469, c. 28, 1474, c. 54, and 1617, c. 12. More particularly, any claim founded upon the allegation and plea that the purchase of Hobsland in 1812 was ultra vires of the trustees, or in breach of the trust, is so excluded."

The following were the additional pleas in law for the pursuers:—"7. The defenders are not entitled to tender, nor are the pursuers bound to receive, a conveyance of the estate of Hobsland, or any portion thereof, as a fulfilment of the directions and purposes of the trust, or any part thereof.

8. The defenders are bound to account for the whole of the trust-funds in their hands after the fulfilment of the directions of the trust, other than those applicable to residue, and, in particular, for the sum of L.7800 of residue, which was admittedly in their hands in 1811, and to apply the same, in terms of the directions of the trust applicable to residue, except in so far as they may be able to shew that the same have already been so applied.

9. The plea of prescription is inapplicable and untenable, in respect, 1st, the defenders have never accounted for their intromissions as trustees; 2d, the extent or amount of the free residue in their hands, now, or at any former period, has never been ascertained; and, 3d, the defenders have never fulfilled, or even professed to fulfil, the directions and purposes of the trust with respect to residue, the whole of which remain to be fulfilled under the compulsitor of this action, after the amount of the free residue shall have been ascertained in the accounting, which has not yet taken place."

The case was again called for debate in November 1856.

The defenders then pleaded, that the effect of the negative prescription was to cut off all right of action otherwise competent. That proposition had no qualification. There was no instance to the contrary.¹ The case of Porterfield shewed in what circumstances the plea of non valentia would be repelled. The case of Allan v. Brander shewed how far the principle would be sustained. The purchaser, at a judicial sale in 1792, granted a bond to pay the price at Martinmas 1792, with interest from Martinmas 1791, "together also with the interest of the principal sum from and after the said term of payment, so long as the same shall remain unpaid, not formally renounced probation, are desirous to avoid superfluous investigation and expense; and taking it so, he has found enough to enable him to dispose, satisfactorily to his own mind, of the leading question which it was agreed at the bar should, in the first instance, be decided."

and that to those who shall be found to have right thereto by the decret of No. 137. ranking and scheme of division" to follow thereon; the bond was lodged in process, and the purchaser entered into possession of the subject; no demand either for consignation or otherwise was made on the bond for more than forty years; and it was held that the demand had suffered the negative prescription. It was also held that the plea of prescription was not elided, though some of the creditors were in minority during part of the period; and although a long term of years elapsed after the death of the first common agent in the ranking before the appointment of another common agent. The principles contained in these cases were applicable to claims arising under a trust-deed as well as to other claims. It being clear that at a particular date the claim had arisen, the mere source of that claim as having emerged from a trust would not make any difference in the application of the principle, if the claimants and the trustees stood to each other in the position of debtor and creditor, and the right of action then existed, and had continued for forty years. The claim might be for payment or investment of the funds; but if it did arise at a particular date, and was capable of then being made a ground of action, and forty years had elapsed without the action being raised, then the principle clearly applied. There were direct authorities on that point.¹

Barns v.
Barns'
Trustees.

Pleaded for the pursuers;—The general proposition as to the effect of the negative prescription admits of no dispute. In order to make out a case for the application of the statute, it was not only quite indispensable that the relation of debtor and creditor should exist for forty years, but that during the whole period there should be on the part of the creditor a pure and complete jus exigendi, a claim to which no good answer could be made at the time it was brought forward. But there were exceptions to the general proposition. In a right of reversion there subsisted a right to redemand a conveyance on certain conditions, and an obligation to make that reconveyance when demanded. There was a subsisting relation of debtor and creditor ad factum præstandum, and yet that would not suffer the negative prescription. Again, many rights of a continuous character never could be lost by the operation of the negative prescription,—for example, the right of a titular to teinds,—a pensioner to his pension,—where, no doubt, every annual payment which fell due suffered prescription, but where the right never was lost. It therefore greatly tended to looseness in argument to take the general proposition as unqualified, that the mere existence of the relation of debtor and creditor for forty years, without any demand on the part of the creditor, necessarily let in the operation of the statute.

The Scotch law of trust was founded on the Roman law of deposit. Could a depository say that, because no demand had been made for forty years, he was entitled to defend himself against a claim for restitution? The only exception that could be pleaded to such a claim was, that restitution had already been made, or that the party demanding the subject was not the true owner. The principle was, that it was totally inconsistent with the first notions of justice, that a man should at one and the same time admit that he was in possession of the property of his neighbour, entrusted to him in good faith, and in the belief that it would be furthcoming when demanded, and yet that he would not restore the property entrusted to him. The doctrine proceeded on the fact, admitted or not, that the deposit was made; and that being so, the depository had no answer except that restitution had been made. Now here the trust was admitted, and was the essential foundation of the case between the parties, but by reason of the lapse of time, the ~~defenders~~ denied all liability to account. That plea amounted to this, that

No. 137. if any trustee shall possess the subject of a trust for forty years from the death of the truster, he shall be entitled, from that period, to keep the estate for himself. Such was the necessary consequence of the argument. Possession for forty years, on a title qualified by a trust, would become an absolute fee. But what was the possession of these defenders? It was the pursuers' possession. It was the possession of the beneficiaries, just as much as the possession of the factor was the possession of the owner, or the tenant that of the landlord; and yet the effect of this possession was to destroy the rights of the beneficiaries, for whom the trustees were administering, and for whose benefit alone they were possessing the estate.

This was a case to which the negative prescription could not apply. The negative prescription was founded on two presumptions—first, the presumption of payment of the debtor; second, the presumption of abandonment or dereliction of the claim on the part of the creditor. In the present case, could there be a presumption of payment on the part of trustees who admitted having received the money, and did not say that they had paid it? Again, how could dereliction apply to a man who had not got possession of the subject, but had allowed his trustee to possess the estate for him? In point of fact, the person who was thus presumed to have abandoned his claim had all along been possessing through his trustee. Let a trustee divest himself of the subject, no matter whether he gives it to the right or wrong person, and from that time let the forty years elapse, and then the negative prescription applies. That was the only case in which it could apply. His conduct was not then challengeable, and that was the principle upon which the cases referred to proceeded. But that was quite different from the present case, where the trustees have not even yet denuded, where their only title to possess was the trust for behoof of the pursuers, whose possession therefore was that of the pursuers, and whose liability therefore to account could not be affected by the negative prescription.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This action is brought by the beneficiaries under the trust-deed of the late Mr Barns against the trustees who have been acting under that deed. The original trustees are none of them now extant. But their successors in office are brought into Court by this action, which calls upon them to exhibit their accounts, pay over any balance that may be found due thereon, and requires the investment of that balance in the terms desired by the trust as the investment of the residue of the trust-fund. The summons also contains conclusions applicable to a certain transaction, which it is the object of this action to set aside as being ultra vires of the trustees, and to have it declared that it is illegal and unwarranted, and cannot be binding on or affect the trust-estate, or the funds and property thereof.

The trust-deed under which this claim arises was made in 1789. Mr Barns, who made it, died in 1791. He was then succeeded by Sir James Stevenson Barns, who died in 1850. The succession then opened to the pursuer, Patrick Graham Barns.

One object of the trust—and indeed the main object we have now to deal with—was the purchase of lands to be settled in a certain way. It appears that, on 12th March, in the year 1812, the trustees purchased the estate of Hobland, by letters which passed between their agent acting for them and the parties interested in the sale.

The first instalment of the price was due at Martinmas 1812. It was duly paid, as was also the second instalment at Whitsunday 1813. Money was borrowed for the remainder of the price, which was afterwards paid,—a portion of it being made a burden on the estate. The title to the estate was taken, not as a settlement of the estate in terms of the directions of the trust-deed, but was taken to the trustees themselves. It has so remained ever since. It farther appears that the purchase was made in the knowledge and with the concurrence of the beneficiaries chiefly interested at that time, and with the advice of some of them. Possession of the estate was taken immediately after the purchase, and it has been held as the investment of the trust-funds from that date down to the present time. But there has been no final adjustment of the trust-accounts. The trust itself has gone on. The management has continued, and has devolved more or less on the beneficiaries, who have enjoyed the rents of the estate; and the object of the present action is to have the trust brought to a conclusion, by compelling the trustees to execute the purposes of the trust, exhibit their accounts, and apply the balance in the purchase of an estate, to be settled, not on the trustees, but in terms of the trust-deed; and that action, while it so calls on the trustees, notices very particularly the purchase of Hobsland in 1812. In the summons and in the record the question is raised as to the validity and legality of that purchase. That is the real subject of contention between the parties. It is the main and leading subject throughout the record, and was the main subject of the argument which was addressed to us.

No. 137.

Mar. 5, 1857.

Barns v.

Barns'

Trustees.

It is contended, on the part of the beneficiaries, that that purchase was altogether ultra vires of the trustees, and illegal, and that it has not been so recognised as to make it incumbent on them to accept it as the execution of the trust. They object to take an estate, for which L.12,000 was paid, and which is now burdened to a great amount, as implement of the trust; and, now that the estate has turned out to be worth but a small sum, when the burdens are deducted, they decline to have anything to do with that transaction. They maintain that they are entitled to get a free estate, capable of being effectually settled in terms of the trust-deed.

In the summons there are declaratory conclusions which I regard as of great importance. The record also contains statements which are intended to follow out and support that conclusion of the summons, more particularly in art. 11 and also in art. 19 of the pursuer's condescendence. These are—(see supra, pp. 626, 627.) There is thus a direct challenge, by declarator, of the legality of the transaction as ultra vires of the trustees.

The pleas in law for the pursuers also repudiate the transaction. When the case was before the Lord Ordinary, the grounds on which it was argued were, as noticed in his Lordship's note, that by acquiescence or adoption or homologation the parties interested in the proceedings of the trustees were barred from challenging this act of management, or of mismanagement, whichever it may be. When the case came before us, the argument—which appears to have been merely alluded to before the Lord Ordinary—was maintained that the challenge of the transaction was precluded by the negative prescription. But, it being very doubtful whether the pleas in law on record were so shaped as to meet that defence, we allowed pleas in law to be added applicable to it; which having been done, we had additional argument on that special question as to the application of the negative prescription to this case.

That plea of the negative prescription, as first argued to us, seemed to be directed, in the first place, against any liability whatever to account. It was contended that the negative prescription was a good objection to any plea for bringing the trustees to account, and that the beneficiaries had no alternative but to take the trust-accounts just as the trustees chose to give them. A case was referred to, which it was said established that the right to call for a general accounting was cut off, if forty years had elapsed since the trustees might have been originally called on to account. That was the case of Kinloch v. Rocheid. I was at first a good deal startled by that proposition; but I cannot say that I have found authority for it. It is not recognised by that case; nor do I see how such a principle could apply to a general accounting in this case, seeing that the trustees have been confessedly all along acting, and have been holding this estate on titles which are part of the effects of the trust, and, moreover, are not now disputing their liability to account. In the case of Kinloch there is no such broad proposition announced. It is a puzzling case to read, because there are expressions in it used in various senses, and even judicially so used, as well as in argument. The expression which has puzzled me most is "general accounting." But I do not think that it is there meant to express what a general accounting was meant to imply in this case. The case of Kinloch only went to this, that where there was a right, but a right connected with an obligation to do something, that obligation could not be enforced after the lapse of forty years. That is the principle of the case, and the word general accounting is there used in this way. The Court held that in regard to funds which had not been uplifted or possessed beyond the forty years, the obligation could be enforced to account for them; but in regard to those which had been recovered or possessed beyond the forty years, the obligation to compel the application of them to trust purposes had been lost, and the word "general accounting" was used to comprehend the whole funds, both those uplifted and those that were not; and it was held that there was not to be such general accounting, but only an accounting for those funds possessed on the original securities. It is not a peculiar case in regard to that principle; far from it. But that is what I am inclined to hold as the true view of that case. It is quite a different question from a general accounting in the sense in which that expression was here used.

The next question is, does the negative prescription apply in a more limited sense? Does it apply to an action founded on a particular transaction, it may be, in professed execution of the trust, but which is challenged as being illegal, and ultra vires of the trustees? It does not embarrass me that this question arises in an action of accounting, because there is a distinct declaratory conclusion in the summons, which the pursuers felt to be necessary to clear away, as preliminary to ascertaining the basis on which the accounting was to take place; and the question stands as clear as if there had been a separate and distinct action of declarator to that effect. Had there been such an action, the question which would then have arisen, and which arises here, is, does the negative prescription apply to a challenge of this particular transaction? The purchase of Hobsland was made in 1812. Possession was then taken. The first instalment of the price was paid at Martinmas 1812, and the second instalment at Whitsunday 1813. The present summons was brought in June 1853. Therefore, so far as the lapse of time is concerned, the prescriptive period has elapsed since the date of the transaction, if the principle of the negative prescription apply, because the transaction took place in 1812, and was quite complete as a purchase in that year. The second instalment of the price, paid in 1813, is more than forty years ago. The obligation was undertaken by the trustees. The purchase was made by them in the character of trustees. That transaction is now challenged as ultra vires and illegal. The question comes to be, whether that investment of the trust-funds in 1812 can now, at this distance of time, be challenged as ultra vires and illegal, which is tantamount to saying that the trustees must take the burden of that transaction upon themselves, and must now account to the beneficiaries under the trust, as if no such transaction had taken place.

I have said that the time that has elapsed since the date of the transaction is long enough to admit of the plea, if the principle of the negative prescription applies. It is very clear that if the transaction was illegal and ultra vires of the trustees, it was perfectly competent for the beneficiaries to have challenged it in 1812. The transaction is not alleged to have been effected in secret. It was a most open and avowed proceeding. That could only be; for the purchase was effected in communication with the beneficiaries, and has been held out by the trustees as the investment of the trust-funds, in compliance with the directions in the trust-deed, from that day to this. But if it was ultra vires and illegal, it might competently have been challenged then. It was not challenged. Therefore, why should not the negative prescription now apply? The statutes cut off all right of action, except for error in particular cases; and is there anything in this action of declarator to have it found that the transaction was illegal and ultra vires, which shall make it an exception to the general rule? That the claim arises out of a trust does not appear to me to establish the proposition that it is an exception. The ground of action is the accountability of the trustees, and the object of the action is to set aside a thing done in professed execution of the trust. The principle of the case of Kinloch there applies. I have said that that case did not stand alone. The principle of that case was the same upon which it has been found that an obligation to execute an entail prescribes, and that the circumstance of its arising out of a trust does not form a ground of exception. There again I think the case of Pollok is a direct authority. The negative prescription was there held to be a complete protection. Therefore I see no good ground for holding that the negative prescription does not here apply. I had difficulty, in the way the case was at first presented to us, in seeing that this was anything else than a demand for an accounting, and that the trustees proposed to place on the one side of the account the sum paid for Hobsland, and hold it to be part of the estate, and that their accounts were objected to on the other, on certain grounds, which only raised a question of accounting between the parties, and nothing else. But it is a separate transaction, and is so dealt with by the parties. No. 137.

Barns v.

Barns'

Trustees.

I do not know that it is necessary for me to go farther into this matter. I think that the principle by which an action such as I have referred to against a party to compel him to execute an entail, as in the case of Porterfield—an action against a trustee, as in the case of Pollok—a question raised in a sort of quasi trust, in the case of Kinloch—the principle on which all such actions have been cut off, seems to me to apply to this case, and to make it very clear, looking to the shape in which this challenge is brought, that the plea of negative prescription is an answer to the declaratory conclusion of this summons. What may be the effect of that on the accounting is not a question that I propose to deal with now. The first question is, whether the defence of prescription is a good defence? The other questions, as to what the trustees should have done in the exercise of their duty and discretion, after they had got that purchase into their hands, are matters into which I do not propose to go. The judgement of the Lord Ordinary is rested on other considerations, as to which I am not at present prepared to give so much effect as his Lordship has done; that is, supposing that forty years had not elapsed, and that the transaction is held to be ultra vires and illegal. I am not prepared to hold that those things founded on are sufficient to prevent the raising of the question here, or to bar the beneficiaries in the trust from challenging the transaction. But my view of the case is that the challenge is met by the plea of prescription, and that we ought to sustain this plea for the trustees, and then proceed to deal with the accounting as to Hobsland on that footing.

LORD IVORY.—After the best consideration which I have been able to give to this case, and impressed very deeply as my mind has been with the desire to favour as much as possible the policy of the trustees, I have been wholly unable, on legal grounds, to sustain the plea of negative prescription under the circumstances in which it arises here. I take that question of the negative prescription as the only, and, at all events, the main question we have at present to deal with. It was that chiefly argued in the debate, and it must be cleared away before we can properly get into the after questions that will arise, according as it is sustained or repelled.

The plea divides itself into two heads. It is—"The present action and demand are excluded by the negative prescription established in the law of Scotland, and enacted by the statutes 1469, c. 28, 1474, c. 54, and 1617, c. 12. More particularly, any claim founded upon the allegation and plea that the purchase of Hobsland in 1812 was ultra vires of the trustees, or in breach of the trust, is so excluded." That forces one to inquire at the outset what is the action and demand; and it raises and gives very great importance to that principle of action contained in the last and declaratory conclusion of the summons to which your Lordship has adverted. But I am not prepared to deal with that declaratory action as the main substance of this action, or as anything else than a declaratory conclusion, and second to that which is the main conclusion.

The action divides itself into four parts. 1st, A demand for accounting, in order that the balance of the funds may be ascertained, and being ascertained, that they may be thereafter invested in terms of the instructions in the trust-deed. The second is the usual alternative in a count and reckoning—viz. that failing the accounting, a certain random sum—here L.10,000—shall be taken as the balance of the accounting, and then that it shall be so invested and secured. The third conclusion is a somewhat special application of the more general conclusion for investment—that is, that the present trustees shall be ordained to see the sum so laid out, and the titles to the lands so purchased conceived in favour of the pursuer, Patrick Graham Barns; whom failing, the other heirs and substitutes specified in the deed of tailzie. And further, "to make payment to the pursuer, Patrick Graham Barns, in terms of the said trust-disposition and settlement, and deed of tailzie therein referred to, of the sum of L.1500 sterling, or such other sum, less or more, as upon a just calculation may be found to be the free annual proceeds or interest at the rate of five per cent per annum, of the amount of the free residue and remainder of the price and proceeds of the said John Barns' estate, heritable and moveable, remaining to be invested, laid out, and secured as aforesaid, from the 5th day of October 1850, the date when the pursuer, Patrick Graham Barns, succeeded, in virtue of the said deed of tailzie, to the benefit thereof, till payment of the said annual proceeds or interest foresaid." That does not extend to the other and prior conclusions in any respect; and therefore the action up to this point is an action for accounting against the trustees for the trust-estate, and their intromissions with it. The declaratory conclusion covers all these, and it is in these words:—(See supra, p. 626.)

That declaratory conclusion seems to me, as I have already said, to be purely ancillary to the question of accounting. It is anticipative of the plea which may be stated in defence. It is not a ground of any demand against the trustees. It is a declarator, that the specific defence shall not be entertained as an answer to the demand for accounting. But the demand in the action is explicitly and exclusively a demand for accounting, and to have the balance of the trust-estate ascertained; and this declarator is only intended to cast out of the way any particular pleas of defence which may be brought forward in reply to that demand. Accordingly this declarator is not followed by any conclusions of personal obligation. It is a declarator that certain actings of the trustees—if these are pleaded against the demand for a general accounting—are of none avail, and insufficient to affect the trust-estate. It leaves the defence where it finds it. It leaves the defenders with the onus of proving that defence; but it shews the way in which it is to be met by the pursuers—viz. that it cannot be supported on the ground of the trustees having powers to do that which they are said to have done.

Such is my reading of the summons; and, if right, it is an important reading, because it shews the proper demand of the pursuers to be a demand for accounting and investment of the ascertained balance of the funds; and it leaves the declarator as not entering into that which is the proper demand so made, but only subordinate and ancillary to it.

When I refer to the record, I find that this reading is supported throughout. The record sets forth the title of the trustees, and the administration of the estate as a trust-estate. It alleges that the pursuer, Patrick Graham Barns, has received no account of that estate, nor since his succession even payment of its annual proceeds. But, in the third place, it says—"But the pursuers have been informed of a transaction to which, under reservation of their right to state all competent objections to any accounts that may be given in and rendered by the defenders, or any of them, they have now specially to object as altogether unwarranted and illegal, and as having occasioned an undue application of the funds of the trust. The following are the particulars of the said transaction, so far as known to the pursuers." And, again, winding this particular up in the close of article 19, it says (p. 20) that the pursuers object "to said transaction as incompetent, illegal, and unwarranted by the trust-disposition and settlement of the said John Barns, and to the application of the said trust-funds of something that is to be stated by accounting. They say, well be it so; the powers of the trustees. We hold together, and this to be a defence again. This declaratory conclusion, therefore matter of accounting. The pleas are parties are liable in accounting; but the ground of a substantial judgment dealing with. It is the second plea sole surviving and acting trustee, is to whole proceedings, actings, and intro liable for any misapplication of the which occurred during his trusteeship re-asserted in the third plea, which is trustees ought to be made parties to intromissions of the parties whom the cation of the trust-funds or estate to were parties, or which occurred while shape in which it was necessary to deal with the matter, I might have had some difficulty in holding that as against that plea of personal liability there might not be a ground for applying the negative prescription. But I do not think that the case comes before us on that footing. There is a third head, which shews that that is not meant to be directed to the shape of the action as a declaratory action, for the pursuers' fifth plea is this:—"The declaratory conclusions of the summons are warranted by the terms of the trust-deed." That is to say, you must look to the terms of the trust-deed for the powers of the parties; and therefore, in so far as they may rest their defence upon actings which are beyond the powers conferred by the trust-deed, the declarator is only intended to take that defence out of the way.

Barns v.

Now the demand of the pursuers is this. It is, as I hold it, primarily, if not exclusively, a demand for a general accounting, and the declaratory conclusions and the pleas in law have no meaning or force except in so far as they explicate and extricate that demand for accounting. The original defences in the action acknowledge the trust. There were produced with the defences a large body of accounts, and audit of them was challenged. Personal intromission with the funds of the trust-estate is denied on the part of the representatives of the deceased trustees; but the body of accounts now before us is sufficient to show that the trustees were not standing on any non-liability to account. Now, as I understand the original defence, no objection is taken from beginning to end to the charge side of the account. Every item in the charge side of the account is acknowledged. Every intromission therefore with the estate is admitted. The special defence is rested on that item alone which the declaratory conclusions of the summons had anticipated would be made the ground of defence—an item in the discharge side of the accounts where the trustees take credit for a certain payment on account of the purchase of the estate of Hobsland. So far, therefore, as regards any question of general accountability, it is not raised by the parties. The continuance of the trust actings is set forth and admitted on both sides.

There was no defence stated, at this stage, of negative prescription, nor was it till after the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor that such a plea was entered on the record. I mention that, without intending to express any doubt as to the sufficiency of that defence, if otherwise well founded; but I am pointing to the manner in which the action has been dealt with as an action of accounting, in which the liability to account was admitted, in which no specific objection was taken to the charge side of the account, and in which the only objection taken was to an article of the discharge. But, now that the negative prescription has been pleaded, what does it prove? It is not a mode of raising up any after questions. It is an exclusion of the demand on the part of the creditors. It implies that there is a situation of debtor on the one hand and creditor on the other hand. It implies merely this; and it can operate no further than as an answer to a claim for the performance of an obligation, on the ground that that obligation has been extinguished by the lapse of time. I can perfectly well understand how that answer to a demand for accounting would have been insuperable. In the first place, if the constitution of the trust had been denied, and if there had been a denial of intromissions with this trust property, or a denial of all liability to perform the office of trustees, I can perfectly well understand the plea that the trust was cut off by the lapse of time, and that the trustees were not bound to execute their office even if they had originally accepted it, or to give any account of what they had done in regard to the trust. They might have stood on their silence, as in the case of Lockhart, and made the other party prove everything. The terminus for the running of the negative prescription would then have been the date of the constitution of the trust, and the demand cut off would have been a demand by the beneficiaries for the performance of the office of trustees. Or there is another shape in which the point might have arisen, not in regard to the constitution of the trust, but the subsistence of trust liabilities,—which I can perfectly well understand might also have been made the subject of a plea of negative prescription. The whole trust estate might have been realised, as at a particular date beyond the forty years, and the trustees might from that time have kept possession without accounting at all for what they had so realised, and when a demand was made upon them to account for their intromissions, they might say—"No, we are not bound to account, although we were bound to do so as at the date of the intromissions; and we say generally, the law presumes that we have accounted, and we intend to take the benefit of that legal presumption. We have either accounted, or all claim against us is cut off." There the terminus a quo would have been the date of the realisation of the trust estate. But here the trustees refuse to admit their liability for a particular portion of the trust estate, as an estate still existing, and the claim sought to be cut off is a claim that they shall account for trust money which they have diverted to other purposes than those specified in the trust deed. The strength of the trustees in all such cases lies in their privilege of standing absolutely silent, in saying the demand against them has been cut off and in refusing to give any explanation whatever in regard to it. "According to your own account," they are entitled to say, "this demand, if good against us, was a good forty years ago as now, and as you did not assert it at that period, you cannot make it good against us now. It is cut off by the negative prescription." That is not the position they have taken up here.

There is a third case, where in consequence of certain things done by trustees and which they may be alleged to have done in virtue of their office, the trust itself has de facto ceased. They may have paid over the funds to a party to whom, perhaps, they ought not to have paid, but they no longer have the funds in their hands, and that other party may stand fortified by possession for forty years. He holds the estate, it may be, in pleno jure, and may be fortified by the positive prescription in so holding it. The demand against the trustees is, "you had a business to pay to this man." But the answer is, "true, we had no right to do so, but we have not had any part of the trust funds in our hands for forty years." There, too, I can understand the case to be one where the defence of negative prescription is perfectly good, for the demand is not made for accountability for the charge side of the trust accounts down to the moment that the demand is made against the trustees, but it is a demand against them on the footing that they no longer holding a trust fund, having parted with it forty years ago, must out of their own pocket now repay what they have so misapplied. If there be here such a demand for repayment—as seems to have been intended to a certain extent, under the second and third pleas—I can perfectly well understand that such a claim may be cut off by the negative prescription, and so far the principle upon which my opinion is rested entirely coincides with some of the principles announced and relied upon by your Lordships. But here again it is not made clear to my mind that such is the precise question that we have now to deal with.

The cases referred to I do not wish to examine at any length. The case of Lockhart is an example of what I am now stating. The trustees there would give no account of anything they had done from the date of the trust. They would not admit anything. They said, our liability to account existed at a particular time, if it existed at all, and you not having then called us to account, cannot call us to account now. The negative prescription wiped off the earlier intromissions, as to which there was no explanation. But as to the intromissions within the forty years, the negative prescription was repelled, in so far as excluding trust-liability, and that trust-liability being acknowledged as the ground on which the intromissions had been made, and the lapse of time not having run since the date of the intromissions, the negative prescription, as a defence, was repelled. So in Pollock and Porterfield. They are equally explainable. The case of Pollock was a case in which Lady Forfar, as trustee, denuded in favour of the party first favoured by the trust-deed handing over the whole funds to and obtaining a discharge from that party. Now that party having got possession of the estate, forty years elapsed, and, when thus fortified by prescription, other parties interested brought an action against Lady Forfar's representatives, on the ground that he had no business to give away the estate, so making the trustee personally the debtor in that demand. The demand was not for performance of the trust. The trust was gone, and therefore they claimed and asked to be indemnified for the loss and injury so sustained. The answer was, that the right to make the demand existed forty years ago, and not having been made could not now be enforced. But that was not an action for accounting for the trust-estate. So also in the case of Porterfield. The estate was conveyed over in fee-simple,—that is to say, the title was made up in fee-simple, absolute and unlimited. But certain provisions had been made, that the party so invested, should proceed to execute an entail. He did not do so. Therefore there was an action ad factum præstandum. The answer was:—The obligation worked off by force of the negative prescription, and the fee-simple title is fortified by the positive prescription. No. 137.

Now, that is a shape of things which I think is wholly discordant with the species facti of this case. This is a very curious case, and I am not sure that I have mastered it, for I have been more or less puzzled at various times with different branches of it, and with the cases referred to. I cannot say that I have much respect for the case of Kinloch, from what I have seen of it. I have seen the opinions of the Judges, and have examined the session papers, and there is an utter impossibility of reconciling the opinions with one another, and I should be more disposed to hold the view of the law as indicated by the Lord Chancellor, as being sound, than that which some of the Judges adopted when the case came back to this Court. The difference of opinion on the bench was very great. Altogether, I think that the general accounting was excluded, but the matter with which the Court dealt being within the forty years, it has no very great application to this case. Mar. 5, 1857.
Barns v.
Barns'
Trustees.

But suppose we had been free from all the embarrassments as to the purchase of this property, and had been dealing with the general question of accounting with the trustees—there being nothing arising from the transaction of Hobsland to embarrass us—it is perfectly clear that the trustees could not have said that their liability to account as trustees was excluded by the negative prescription, nor that the amount of the realisation of the trust-estate, and the intromissions for which the trustees were called to account, were destroyed and extinguished by the negative prescription. The accounts which the trustees have rendered—the continuous character of their office, and their admissions on record that they are liable and bound to account, would have made them answerable for the whole charge side of their accounts, and would not have warranted a defence on the special ground on which their case is rested now. They must, in their capacity of trustees, have accounted for and invested to the last shilling of the trust-fund, with which they admitted they had had intromission.

It would be very much the same thing in this other shape. Suppose that when this action was brought into Court, the trustees had rendered their accounts, and produced them, and accounted for every one of their intromissions down to the present day, and set off on the other side their discharge, with the vouchers of their discharge. If that had been done, and there had been objectionable credits in the accounts so rendered, or if the accounts were defective on other grounds, could the trustees have separated their charge side of the account from the discharge side of the account, which was liable to no objection, and pleaded the negative prescription? There would have been this peculiar circumstance, viz., the want of evidence in support of that side of the accounts, the onus of supporting which lies on them as trustees. The consequences of all that they must have borne, and that is the length of the case against them now.

But it is said that Hobsland being a purchase under the trust, makes a total alteration of the case. Now there is no terminus for the running of the negative prescription from 1789, the date of the trust-deed, or from the death of the truster in '91, or the realisation of the charge side of the account before 1812. But there is a transaction in 1812 in which the terminus a quo is to be found, and it is said that that transaction being ultra vires, permitted instant challenge, which challenge being delayed, is now cut off. Now, as said in some of the cases, if the money had been paid away to a party from whom it could not be recovered, and a claim against the trustees resolved into a claim for personal repetition out of his private estate, of the amount so wrongfully paid away by them, perhaps from the moment when that demand existed there might be room for the application of the negative prescription, and the terminus a quo might arise from that time. But it is not the shape of the case in various respects. In the first place, it is not that all claims against the trustees are extinguished by the negative prescription. The subsisting trust is admitted. Hobsland itself, as averred, is an altered part of the trust-estate. The question is not whether there is a liability in the trustees to account? The answer they make is,—“we fulfil our liability to account, in money, but by offering you Hobsland.” Therefore, the liability is not cut off on the ground of claim in toto. It is attempted to substitute one form of performance for another. But whether the creditor is bound so to accept the performance

No. 137. in that particular shape—that is a question which does not seem to come within the proper application of the doctrine of the negative prescription.

Mar. 5, 1857. Then, again, the transaction as to Hobland was never completed. Hobland, as Barns v. Trustees. it was purchased, is not even now offered simpliciter as a surrogatum for the trust-money. It has been strangely complicated with matters foreign to the trust. It was purchased with a farther amount of money than the trustees had at their disposal, and part of the price was made a burden on the estate, while the balance was raised under a personal bond granted by the trustees in that character. Again, I doubt how far we can here apply the doctrine of the negative prescription. If the trustees had said,—“There is Hobland. That is the subject we got for your fund. That is the surrogatum for your money,” the case might have been different. But they never have said so. There would have been a common estate then to be divided, with liabilities to contingent loss. But suppose the whole L.12,000 to be lost, could the trustees, who borrowed the money, not having the power to do so, have thrown the loss accruing to their individual interest on the trust-estate? Shall the trust-estate be liable for the whole loss? I mention that to show that it is not a satisfactory transaction we have here to deal with, and I doubt exceedingly whether, whilst it is yet to be ascertained how Hobland is to be dealt with, we are in a condition to deal with it as a satisfactory investment of the trust-money.

Then there is L.4000 borrowed. The liability for that is proposed to be thrown on the trust. Suppose there be that this money had been borrowed, negative prescription prevented been misapplied, could the trustees reported the transaction to such cut off relief for the L.4000? of trust money, but also of the to cut off all claim against the claim against the trust.

It is an important feature in Hobland is said to be L.6000 available value which these trustees therefore L.1800. The free fund The loss to the trust-estate is 1 view, the trust-estate is to be as proposed to divide the estate as borrow L.4000, and, thereby to under cover of the negative prescription farther, and say, we, having done no right to borrow, and make occurred. That makes the matter cases in which the negative prescription

One view of the matter is, the trustees: that it was impossible amount of the funds for investment trustees should purchase either in regard to Hobland was not the estate, all might have been the power of making the purchase in their hands, if so be that the brought it within the measure for the running of the negative prescription the act which is assumed to be as the source of liability, you are in 1853, and the disposition taken been at the latter date—in 181 proper course took place. into; but I should doubt—if there had been actual adoption and homologation—whether that of itself would not have interfered with the application of the negative prescription, for it would have rested on the power of Sir James Stevenson Barns to adopt or homologate; and something also would have rested on this, whether, having the power, Sir James could bind those after him? But, if the parties had reduced the matter to a contract and agreement, it seems to me that from the moment it was put on that footing there was no dereliction on the part of the trustees. They then might have stood or fallen on the credit of that transaction. But I lay no stress on that part of the case; and I have only to make a single observation further,—which, however, is of some importance,—as to the terminus a quo. It is not at all clear, looking at the dates, that the substantial matter in dispute really falls beyond the years of prescription. I take the transaction as it happened. In the first place, there was an agreement to buy Hobsland in 1812. Suppose the matter had rested on that agreement now, and that the agreement left the trust-funds untouched; The transaction might or might not be good. It might be a transaction which the trustees might or might not be entitled to enforce against the beneficiaries. But, so long as it rested on the mere obligation of the trustees, there was no paying away of the trust means; and, so long as the funds remained in the hands of the trustees, they remained the subject of the trust, and of no extraneous contract and sale into which the trustees might enter. But then the payment was made under this agreement. But how? In the first place, only L.5000 was paid before Whitsunday 1813. I am not very sure that there was so much, but I am willing to take it that there was L.5000 so applied before June 1813. That is, no doubt, beyond the forty years, but then there is L.7000 of the price not paid beyond the years of prescription. Now, before the negative prescription can apply, the funds must have parted out of the hands of the trustees; because, if they remain, that is just the case of Lockhart with regard to special intromission. The title of the trustees for holding the money was the trust. Their possession of it was within the forty years, and they were bound to account for it under the title under which they possessed it; but their non-accountability is not a thing which they can make good by pleading the negative prescription, but only by proving their right to enter into the transaction. They can only plead the negative prescription by shewing that the money was given before the negative prescription began to run. And so, if the plea of the negative prescription be sustained in the broad way in which it is proposed to deal with it, your Lordship applies it to the proportion of the trust-money which, within the prescriptive period, had all its proper character of trust-money attached to it. The disposition of Hobsland bears date a year within the prescriptive period, and it is taken to the trustees themselves. It is made trust-estate. Until there was that separation between that portion of the estate which was to remain trust-estate and that which was to pay off the excess, they are not entitled to speak of Hobsland at all, for till this hour it is impossible to say which specific portion of that estate is trust and which not.

Upon the whole case, as it stands, I am not satisfied that there are safe materials for sustaining the plea of the negative prescription,—least of all that there is any safe ground upon which that negative prescription can be sustained as regards a sum of trust-money not paid out of the trust-estate until within the prescriptive period of forty years.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—This action contains a set of conclusions calling upon a surviving trustee, and the representatives of certain deceased trustees of the late John Barns, to account for the trust estate left by him, and to invest the free residue thereof in the purchase of land, and to entail the same in terms of the directions in the trust deed. The summons further concludes to have it found and declared that the trustees had no power to borrow money or grant security on lands purchased for the trust estate, or to take conveyances in their own names; and that any such transactions, conveyances or securities, were and are ultra vires of them, illegal and unwarranted, and cannot be binding on or affect the trust estate. The particular transaction against which this declaratory conclusion is directed, although it is not specified in the conclusion, is condescended upon in the 12th, 19th, and intervening articles of the revised condescendence to be this,—that in 1812 the then acting trustees purchased the lands called Hobsland, at the price of L.12,000; that the sum of L.7800 of the trust funds was applied towards payment of that price; that the remainder of the purchase money was provided for by a loan of L.2000, and by L.2200 being created a real burden by the disposition; that that disposition was granted to the trustees themselves and their assignees; that no entail of the subject has ever been granted; that the property is not worth the price paid for it, and a loss of L.6000 has been created by the transaction; and that "the pursuers object to the said transaction as incompetent, illegal, and unwarranted by the said trust disposition and settlement of the said John Barns, and to the application of the said trust funds thereto."

At a late stage of the discussion in this action the defenders, by permission of the Court, stated the plea that the present action and demand are excluded by the negative prescription; and more particularly, any claim founded on the allegation and plea that the purchase of Hobsland was ultra vires and in breach of the trust is so excluded. The question of prescription thus raised is the only one now to be disposed of.

The negative prescription is pleaded by the defenders, in the first place, as entirely excluding the present action and demand. I am of opinion that this plea cannot be effectually maintained to that extent. The defenders admit that the trust has been carried on by the successive trustees from the time of the truster's death until the present time; that the free yearly revenue of the trust estate has been regularly paid to the beneficiary entitled to receive the same for the time; and that the lands of Hobsland, always since the purchase thereof, have been, and still are held under the trust, and the surviving trustee is ready to dispose thereof, in conformity with the directions in the trust deed, in whatever manner may be deemed advantageous. As the negative prescription of a debt owing by bond or otherwise is interrupted by every payment of interest thereon by the debtor, so the negative prescription of the general obligation to account for the trust estate and its proceeds and revenues has been interrupted by every payment made by the trustees to the beneficiary for the time of what they held to be the free yearly revenue, and indeed by every act done by them, or their factor in their name, in the exercise of their power, or in the performance of their duties under the trust. Hence their general obligation to account for the trust funds is not extinguished by the negative prescription.

But the question remains, whether the special objection which the pursuers, by the declaratory conclusion of this action, as explained by the above-mentioned statements in the record, have raised to the purchase of Hobsland, and to the application of a large amount of trust funds towards paying the price thereof, has been cut off by the negative prescription? The ground, as already mentioned, on which the pursuers object to that proceeding in the conclusion of the summons, and in the record, is that it was ultra vires of the trustees, illegal, unwarranted, and cannot be binding upon nor affect the trust estate. As the question whether or not the transaction was truly of that character has not yet been discussed before us, it cannot at present be decided by us. But in disposing of the defender's plea of the negative prescription we must assume this to have been truly the character of the proceeding.

And, assuming this to have been the case, the proceeding was from the first challengeable by the beneficiaries, and by any one of them. An action concluding like the present to have the proceeding judicially found and declared to be ultra vires of the trustees, illegal, unwarrantable, and not capable of binding or affecting the trust estate, might have been raised at the instance of all or any one of the beneficiaries existing in the year 1812, or at any time subsequent to the date of that proceeding. Or an action might have been instituted before 18th June 1813 (being forty years before the date of the summons in this action), concluding that the trustees personally should restore the L.5000 previously paid—viz., the L.3000 paid at Martinmas 1812, and the L.2000 paid at Whitsunday 1813, and to interdict them from implementing their obligation to pay L.4800 at Whitsunday 1814, and to burden the trust estate with the remaining L.2200 of the price. Hence the date of that purchase was the term from which the currency of the negative prescription commenced; and nothing is stated in the record which could operate as an interruption of that prescription, for the receipt by the beneficiary for the time of the yearly revenue of the property so purchased was the reverse of a challenge of that purchase. The more clearly the proceeding is held to be illegal and challengeable, so much the more clearly was a challenge of it competent by all or any of the beneficiaries ever since its date; and since none of them instituted any such challenge until more

This view of the matter appears to me to be not only clear upon principle, but Mar. 5, 1857.
 also to be established by authority. In Pollock v. Porterfield, 28th January 1778, Barns v.
 Mor. p. 10,702, a party holding money under trust to employ it in the purchase of Barns' Trustees.
 lands to be entailed on a series of persons to whom it was destined, misapplied it by paying it to the party who was to be the institute. After the lapse of forty years, an action was instituted by the substitute heir against the representatives of the trustee, and of the institute, who had received the money,—both of whom had died in the meanwhile,—concluding to have it found that the pursuer was entitled to the benefit of the trust, and to have the defenders ordained to pay over the capital to a person to be named by the Court to purchase and entail the lands in terms of the trust.
 The Court, on the ground that the substitute, as creditor under the trust, had a right to challenge every deed of the trustee in contravention of the trust, held that the objection to the misapplication of the trust funds was excluded by prescription, and assolizied the defenders. The judgment was affirmed by the House of Lords, 10th March 1779. Paton's Appeal Cases, II, 495.

The case of Rocheid v. Kinloch is a direct authority on the point. To understand the facts it is necessary to compare the different reports in Mor. Dict., Appendix to Prescription, Nos. 4 and 7, and in Patton's Appeal Cases, p. 85. It appears from such a comparison that Miss Rocheid, besides executing a strict entail of certain lands in favour of Alexander Kinloch and a series of heirs, conveyed also to him and the same series of heirs all her other estates and effects, on the condition that the same should be realised, and the proceeds be applied in purchasing other lands to be entailed on the same series of heirs, and on the same conditions as those set forth in her own deed of entail; that one of the conditions of the conveyance by Miss Rocheid was, that in case any of the disponees “shall before any purchase of land be made by them in manner before directed, happen to uplift any of the principal sums hereby disposed for that purpose, he shall be bound and obliged to lend and re-employ the same upon good and sufficient security, either real or personal, and the bonds and securities to be taken for the same shall always bear in express terms that the sum for which the same is granted was part of the money disposed by me to the person lending the same, and his or her heirs of tailzie, to be employed for the purchase of land when the same could be conveniently made, and the sum shall always be made payable to the heir of tailzie for the time who shall lend the same, and to his heirs tailzie herein named, according to the substitution and order of succession contained in this my right and disposition, to which particular reference shall always be made in such bonds and securities;” that Alexander Kinloch, the institute, accordingly did realise all the estate and effects (which amounted to about L.6000), excepting certain special debts and subjects mentioned in the reports; that he, however, contravened the directions in the settlement by not only delaying to purchase lands with the money realised by him, and entail them, but likewise by failing to obey the positive directions above quoted (as to which no discretion was allowed to him) of making such an interim investment of the funds as was directed in the settlement; and that, on the contrary, he,—often mixing up the trust funds so realised with his own proper funds, so as to render them undistinguishable,—left a settlement, destining everything which should belong to him at the time of his death to his son, and a series of heirs different from that in Miss Rocheid's settlement, and his son continued to enjoy all his estate and effects, including the funds realised by Alexander Kinloch from Miss Rocheid's estate. After the lapse of forty years from the date of Alexander Kinloch's intromissions with these funds, an action by the heirs of entail for an account thereof, and for investment of them in terms of Miss Rocheid's settlement, was found to be cut off by the negative prescription. The ground of this judgment (as appears from the report of date 1st March 1808, after the case returned from the House of Lords) was, “that the original right under the trust had been violated
 by the act of the defender's father to a certain extent, and that to this extent there had been an interest to pursue in the substitutes of entail, in consequence of which their right to the same extent was lost by prescription.” In that case, as in the present, it was pleaded that the general obligation to account under the trust was

scription, while it excluded all claim for the portion of the funds as to which Alexander Kinloch had contravened the direction in the trust-deed, did not protect his successor from accounting for the special articles as to which there had been no such contraventions, but which had been uplifted only by the successor himself within the forty years before the action was instituted.

In the different reports of this case some obscurity is created by the expression "general accounting" being applied to the debts and subjects which Alexander Kinloch had realised, as above mentioned, in his lifetime, and of which the particulars are not mentioned, and do not appear to have been fully known when the action was instituted. In the House of Lords there appear to have been doubts whether that expression was not used in a wider sense; but the report of the opinions of the majority of the Court in pronouncing the ultimate judgment in this Court makes it quite clear that the expression was then used in the limited sense I have stated.

On the principle of these authorities, it is plain that, assuming the purchase of Hoboland to have been illegal and a contravention of the trust, as is alleged by the pursuer, the challenge of that transaction was competent from the time it was entered into, and that forty years thereafter having elapsed before the challenge of it which is contained in the present action had been instituted, this challenge is cut off by prescription.

LORD DEAR.—Since this case came into the Inner House, a plea founded on the long negative prescription has been added to the record. In the course of the argument before me in the Outer House, prescription was certainly alluded to, but the grounds and bearing of the plea were not explained, nor was any proposal then made to add it to the record, so that I could not have proceeded upon it, even if it had been fully argued, which it was not. Its importance, however, if it had been duly stated, was obvious enough; and, accordingly, in the Note to my interlocutor, I observed that it might deserve attention if it should be necessary to go upon it. I further observed—"It appears to the Lord Ordinary that neither the claim for an accounting, nor the alleged liability for delay in reselling the surplus lands, can be held to be excluded by the negative prescription. It may be a nicer question whether the substantive objection to the act of purchasing Hoboland, in 1812, as altogether ultra vires of the trustees, can still form a ground of action, although more than forty years have elapsed since that purchase was made." All I have since heard has confirmed me in the opinion thus expressed as regards the general accounting and alleged liability for not reselling, and likewise in my impression that the applicability of the negative prescription, as barring the objection taken to the purchase of Hoboland, is a question of nicety and importance,—although it is a question upon which I have now formed a deliberate and clear opinion.

Your Lordship has pointed out the conclusion of the summons which directly strikes against the purchase of Hoboland, and seeks to have it found and declared that the whole transaction, relative to that purchase, was ultra vires of the trustees, and illegal and unwarranted, and cannot be binding upon or affect the trust-estate. Lord Curriehill has, in like manner, pointed out the passages in the record, extending from articles 11 to 19, both inclusive, which go to the same effect, and I need not repeat them here. Indeed the far as it asks your Lordships to do anything in the Outer House, is "to find that the pursuer has not proved that the purchase of the lands of Hoboland by the late John Barns, as an act of administration under the trust-deed and settlement terms of the declaratory conclusions of the Court, is not binding upon the trust-estate. I have already alluded to, which goes to the effect that Mr Hill, as sole survivor of the trust-funds in the purchase of the trust-deed—these being the only points in issue. As to the prayer to find the pursuer's claim not entered upon in the summons, anything said in my Note is favourable to the pursuer, and your Lordships could not be expected to Lord Ordinary. The precise, and, substantially, the only question, which is thus brought before your Lordships by the pursuers, is, whether they are entitled (in the words of the prayer of their reclaiming note), "to challenge or repudiate the purchase of the lands of Hobsland and others, made in 1812" ?

No. 137.

Barns v.
Barns' Trustees.

That challenge or repudiation may be barred either by prescription or by homologation, or both. I proceed now to inquire whether it is barred by prescription?

The pursuers seem, themselves, to assume the terminus a quo to be 1812. They say the purchase they seek to challenge was made in that year; and it is clear, from the documents before us, that it was so. The trustees made the purchase expressly in their character of trustees. They professed to bind, and did bind the trust-estate for the price, and they obtained right to the estate as trust-property. They entered into possession of it, as such, in 1812;—the crop of that year was reaped by the then existing beneficiary, Sir James Stevenson, and he purchased and placed the necessary stocking upon the lands; all, of course, by authority of the trustees. The granting and acceptance of the deeds and instruments which followed were merely the necessary consequences, which neither party could avoid, of the purchase made and acted on in 1812. If the purchase so made was, as the pursuers now say, ultra vires, illegal, and unwarranted, it appears to me too clear for argument that the beneficiaries interested in the disposal of the residuary estate might then have, at once, challenged the purchase and consequent misapplication of the trust-funds; and upon this point,—that is to say, as to 1812 being the terminus a quo from which prescription must run, if it runs at all, I have nothing to add to what has been stated by your Lordships. The purchase was publicly made and publicly acted upon—the parties interested were entitled and bound to inquire and to know (as in point of fact they did know) what the actings of the trustees were; and there is no room for pleading ignorance of the purchase and missives of sale any more than of the subsequent disposition.

Holding, then, the terminus a quo to be 1812, the question whether the negative prescription applies, seems to me to involve two points of inquiry—1st, Whether the statutes 1469, c. 28, and 1474, c. 54, would be applicable to the challenge of such an act as the purchase of Hobsland, supposing the investment of the residue had been the only purpose of the trust, and the act of purchase had brought the trust to an end? And if they would be so applicable, then, 2d, Whether, in respect that the trust still subsists, and that the trustees are still liable to account for their general intromissions, the negative prescription, which would otherwise have applied, becomes inapplicable?

The first enquiry turns upon the construction to be given to the statute 1469, c. 28, which is said to be limited to "obligations," and not to be applicable to a malfeasance, such as the illegal purchase here made, and relative misapplication of the trust-funds. The words of the Act are, "that the partie te quhome the obligation is maid, that hes interest therein, sall follow the said obligation within the space of fourtie zeires, and take document thereupon. And, gif he dois not, it sall be prescribed, and be of nane availe, the said fourtie zeires beand runnin, and unpersewed be the partie." Here the concluding words, as to the forty years being allowed to run without the obligation being pursued by the party, are not unimportant, as favouring the construction by which this Act has been held so extensively applicable as it has been to rights of action. Nor is it any great stretch of construction, even apart from authority, to apply the Act to a case in which trustees, being under an obligation to apply the trust-funds in one way, are said to have applied them in another way; and forty years have, nevertheless, been allowed to elapse without the party demanding implement of that obligation, and, as a necessary preliminary thereto, instituting a challenge of the act done in alleged contravention of it.

But we are not now to construe the Act for the first time. It has been construed by decisions and text writers for nearly four hundred years, and there are very few rights of action or rights of challenge (not involving questions of heritable rights), to which it has not been expressly held applicable. It was held to apply to a claim under a testament in Lindsay v. Balgony, 19th June 1627 (M., 10,718), "which" (the report bears) "was found, albeit these acts mention only prescription of obligations, and this title was a testament, whereto the pursuer alleged these acts could not extend." An obligation under a testament seems to me to be very analogous

No. 137. to an obligation under a trust-deed and settlement. In Lavers v. Dunbars, 26th July 1637 (M., 10,719), the Act was found to extend to a decret in foro, although the case of a decret is certainly less easily brought within the category of obligations than the case which occurs here. The report bears that the Lords “declared that they would observe this and the like decision, in all time coming, when the like question of prescription should be obtruded against decreets, albeit in foro contentioso, and found that the same comes under the Act of Parliament foresaid.” In Murray v. Irvine, 18th March 1707, M., 10,721, the report bears—“The Lords found the action of reduction ex capite lecti prescribed non utendo within the space of forty years.” This seems to me as strong an instance as can well be figured of a large and liberal construction of the Act, as applicable to rights of challenge and rights of action, or, as the concluding words of the Act expresses it, to pursuits by the party, although the pursuit be not, in the ordinary sense, either in respect of a violation or for implement of an obligation. The cases of Miller, 15th June 1757, M., 10,738, and the Magistrates of Linlithgow v. Mitchell, 21st June 1822, where a right to levy customs, or toll-duties, conferred, in the one case, by a grant from the Privy Council, and, in the other, by a Charter and Act of Parliament, was found to be cut off by the negative prescription, likewise afford instances of the same extended construction of the statute. The case of Porterfield, 6th December 1771 (M., 10,698), although it related to an obligation to execute an entail, seems to have been rested on the older statutes, and not on the statute 1617. Then the case of Pollock, 28th January 1778 (M., 10,702, Affd. on Appeal, Patton, ii. 495), seems to me to be conclusive upon the point that a right of action, founded upon misapplication of trust-funds, by applying them in one way and failing to apply them in another, may be cut off by the negative prescription, although the case, no doubt, does not touch the question, to be immediately considered, whether this will hold where the trust still subsists. The case of Dickson v. Brander, decided in the House of Lords, 2d March 1842 (Bell’s App., i. 167), has also an important bearing on this branch of the argument as well as upon the next; for there, the right held to be cut off by prescription was a right to demand consignment, while the only obligation come under by the bond of caution was an obligation to pay. But it was held that, although the application was not, and could not be founded upon the bond, but upon a right which accrued to the parties in the process of ranking, the right was nevertheless cut off by the negative prescription. I infer from the observations made, in that case, by Lord Chancellor Cottenham, that the Courts in England have shown a similar disposition (taking example from the Legislature), equitably to apply the principle of a statute of limitations, as the Courts of Scotland have shewn so to apply these old statutes of prescription. Lord Bankton seems to think (ii. 12, 16), that these statutes were declaratory of the canon law and civil law, and he states (section 18)—“Actions of all kinds, or grounds of action, prescribe if they have not been commenced by executing a summons within forty years. Thus reductions on the head of deathbed, or other grounds (except that of falsehood), prescribe in the same manner. This prescription, therefore, excludes all claims whatever.” Lord Stair (ii. 12, 11) says—“Our common rule of prescription is by the course of forty years, both in moveables and immoveables, obligations, actions, acts, decreets, and generally all rights, as well against those absent as present.” He afterwards (section 12) cites several of the cases to which I have referred and have still to refer, by which the construction of the statutes in question has been extended,—obviously approving of these decisions, his general doctrine just quoted being founded on them. Mr Erskine, in the same spirit, observes (iii., 7. 9).—“The right of setting aside any deed, upon extrinsic objections which do not appear ex facie of the writing, but require a separate evidence, ex gr. the right of reduction ex capite lecti, is lost if not exercised within forty years.” It may be worth while to observe, as indicating that there is no recent change in the views entertained on this branch of the law (although I quote no living author as authority), that Professor More, in his Notes upon Stair, says—“The effect of the long negative prescription is to extinguish and discharge all claims which have been allowed to lie over without being made or insisted in for forty years from the time they became exigible.” “In the construction which has been given to these statutes,” (and here he includes the statute 1617 along with the older statutes), “almost every right or ground of action or claim has been held to be cut off by prescription.”

Barns v.

Looking to all these authorities, I cannot hold that there is anything in the character of the act here challenged, or in the right of action and challenge here asserted, to take this case out of the category of cases to which the long negative prescription is applicable, unless there be enough under the next head of inquiry to do so.

2d, It remains, however, to inquire, whether the circumstance of there being here a subsisting trust, under which the trustees are still bound to account generally for their intromissions, be sufficient to prevent them from pleading the negative prescription against a challenge of the purchase of Hobsland, supposing such prescription would otherwise have been pleadable?

I am humbly of opinion that the subsistence of the trust, and the liability of the trustees to account generally for their intromissions, has no such effect.

Many trusts, either from accident or from their nature and objects, may last for more than forty years. And it would, I think, be very strange if, for no act whatever, done, it may be, at the very outset of the trust, openly, and in the knowledge of all the beneficiaries, could the trustees claim the protection of the negative prescription. If this were so, I do not see why the same principle should not apply although the trust were of a permanent nature, continued in the persons of heirs or of trustees ex officiis, and so leave acts done centuries ago as open to challenge as when they took place. I have no idea that any such principle applies either to temporary or permanent trusts. Nor am I prepared to say that prescription bars merely challenges of acts said to be ultra vires or amounting to breaches of trust, and does not equally bar a challenge of specific acts alleged to have been done from indiscretion, error in judgment, or mistake in point of law, such, for instance, as paying a legacy upon being advised by counsel that it had vested, when, according to a more correct view of the law, it had not vested, or the like;—although it may not be necessary to deal with such cases here, where the act sought to be challenged is alleged to have been ultra vires, unwarranted, and illegal.

The case of Kinloch v. Rocheid (M., App., Prescrip., Nos. 4 and 7) is, I think, when rightly understood, a direct and important authority to the effect that, in an action of accounting against trustees, they may effectually plead prescription against certain claims and objections, although not against others. I carefully studied that case at the time of the last hearing, and arrived precisely at the conclusion which your Lordship and Lord Curriehill have since arrived at, that the whole puzzle in regard to it is apparent and not real, and arises mainly from the use made in it of the terms “general accounting,” as applicable to items with reference to which prescription was sustained, whereas these words are more correctly descriptive of the items with reference to which prescription was repelled. The true import of the decision, I think, is, that with regard to those portions of the funds which were said to have been misapplied more than forty years before the raising of the action, prescription was applicable; but that in regard to items which had continued to be rightly dealt with as proper trust-funds within the forty years, there was no such prescription. These last items formed, correctly speaking, the subject of the general accounting, and the others the exceptions, although in the original interlocutor the application of these terms is reversed. The grounds of judgment are clearly and accurately expressed in the concluding portion of the last report, to which I take leave specially to refer; and to the observations your Lordships have made in explanation of that report, I have only to add, that, in my manuscript notes of Professor Hume’s lectures, I find the decision cited by that eminent lawyer as a sound decision upon the law of prescription.

Nor is the principle thus recognised either singular or startling. In the case of Lawder, 27th Nov. 1630, M., 10,635, an obligation in a registered contract of marriage, upon which marriage had followed, was found to be prescribed, in a suit at the instance of one of the parties, although that party had been compelled by the other, within the forty years, to fulfil a counter obligation in the contract, and it was pleaded that one part of the contract could not be prescribed and not the other. The case of Miller, and the case of the Magistrates of Linlithgow, both already referred to, also afford instances of the negative prescription being applicable to certain claims under subsisting deeds and grants, although not to others. In particular, in this last mentioned case, the right of the magistrates, under their charter and Act of Parliament, to levy dues at a particular ford on the river Avon, called Jinkabout, was held to be cut off by the negative prescription, although their right to levy dues above and below that ford, and for crossing the river generally, under the same charter and statute, was found not to be prescribed. So in the case, already mentioned, of Dickson v. Brander, the right to demand consignment in the action of ranking and sale (for, as already observed, the demand was not made under the bond) was held to be prescribed, although the action itself was not prescribed, and the terminus a quo was held to be the period when the right to demand consignment arose. All these cases seem to me to confirm the principle now under consideration, although none of them go so directly to the point as the case of Kinloch. The principle of the long prescription, as Mr Bell observes (Com. i. 3, 3, 6), "is not a presumption of payment, but a presumption of abandonment not to be overcome, but available to the debtor as equivalent to a discharge." Accordingly, it was found in the case of Napier, 7th December 1703 (M. 10,657), that, where the prescription has run, there can be no reference to the oath of party. This principle of abandonment is obviously just as applicable to the objections pleadable against a distinct act, like the purchase of Hobland, by trustees under a going trust, as it is to the objections to any other act whatever.

Interruption of the currency of prescription there, plainly has been none here. On the contrary, the estate of Hobland and its rents have, admittedly, been dealt with ever since the purchase as trust property.

Upon the whole I am clearly of opinion, with the majority of your Lordships, that, as regards the purchase in question, the plea of prescription falls to be sustained.

I must add, however, that I still think, on the grounds stated in the note to my interlocutor, that, supposing prescription not to be applicable, the challenge of the purchase of Hobland would be barred by mora, acquiescence, and homologation. I do not say that it would be so barred if the purchase had been altogether ultra vires, unwarranted, and illegal, as the pursuers allege it to have been. And I agree with Lord Curriehill, that if we are right in sustaining the plea of prescription, the character of the act can never be inquired into. But if we were wrong in that view, and the question were therefore open, I should say that such was not the true character of the act, and it was not upon the assumption of its being so that the observations in my Note were made, but upon the footing indicated in the passage which bears, "As to the excess of price, it is said on behalf of the trustees that they could not find, and could not be expected to find, a suitable property at a price precisely equal to the fund in their hands, and that to have bought at a price less than the fund would have resulted in leaving a balance unemployed." Now it was not, in my opinion, ultra vires of the trustees to buy an estate at a price somewhat greater than the residuary trust-fund. On the contrary, it was implied, I think, in the power and duty conferred and imposed upon the trustees, that they might do so. The question, to what extent they might go in excess of the trust-funds, was a question in which they might err in point of discretion; but I cannot regard an error of that kind bona fide committed by trustees, acting to the best of their judgment for the interests of all concerned, as amounting to an act ultra vires, unwarranted, and illegal, in the sense suers, and consequently as incapable of being gated by the beneficiaries for the time.

A question may remain behind as to present enter upon, because I understand solely to the question, whether a that, even with reference to that question prescription, although I have thought the act challenged in what I think it barred also by mora, acquiescence, and

THE COURT pronounced the following additional plea in law the same to form part of the the parties on the reclaiming defenders, and the additional

of prescription offered for the defenders, in regard to the challenge of the purchase of Hobsland, as being illegal and ultra vires of the trustees, or in breach of the trust: Repel the said plea of prescription, in so far as directed against the action, and demand for accounting generally: Find that the pursuers are not now entitled to challenge or repudiate the purchase of the lands of Hobsland and others, made in 1812, by the trustees of the late John Barns, for behoof of his trust-estate, and to that extent and effect adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary submitted to review: Recall the second finding in the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary in hoc statu, and remit to his Lordship to proceed further in the cause as shall be just; reserving all questions of expenses.”

Curator Bonis—Sinking of the capital of a lunatic in purchasing an annuity in Scotland.—Authority granted to the curator of a lunatic, with the concurrence of his relations, to sink the capital of his estate in the purchase of an annuity, but with the proviso that the investment must be with an Insurance Company within Scotland. In this case the lunatic had two children, who were stated to be taken care of by their aunt.

In 1852 Mr Paisley, accountant in Glasgow, was appointed curator bonis to John Adam, a lunatic in Morningside Asylum. In a report to the Accountant of Court, Mr Paisley stated that the whole amount of funds belonging to the ward was under L.500, being the balance of a provision in his favour under his grandfather's settlement; and although the trust-estate was not yet wound up, that if any farther sum, which the curator did not anticipate, became payable, it would be very trifling.

The curator farther stated that the annual proceeds of the ward's means had hitherto been insufficient to defray his board and maintenance; and consequently his capital had been already considerably encroached upon, and in the course of a few years would be altogether absorbed. To avoid such a result he proposed to invest the funds, or, at all events, the greater portion of them, in the purchase of an annuity upon the life of the ward, from the Anchor Assurance Company, London, from whom he stated he could purchase at the rate of L.8, 12s. per cent, which, upon a reduced scale of board, would suffice for the maintenance and support of the ward.

The lunatic was a widower, fifty-one years of age, with two children. A medical certificate bore that his complete recovery was not probable.

The Accountant of Court reported that the children, “aged sixteen and fourteen respectively,” have been from their infancy, and still are, in every way to be cared for by an aunt. Respecting the usual objection to sinking money on the precarious lives of lunatics, the factor explained that the lunatic's life in this instance was considered good as regards ordinary health; “and he was of opinion that powers ought to be granted to the curator to sink L.450, or a smaller sum, in a respectable Insurance Office.”

The Lord Ordinary verbally reported the case, and expressed himself favourable to the proposal,¹ which was also concurred in by the relations of the lunatic.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It is proposed to invest with the Anchor Insurance Company of London. I object to the money being invested out of the country.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I would farther suggest that the Court ought not to commit itself in favour of any particular Office.

In this case the following MS. note was addressed to the Lord President by all the parties to the cause:—"Mutual reclaiming notes for the above parties have this day been boxed to your Lordship in this case, which was originally attached to the First Division of the Court. As the case is one in which it is for the interest of the parties that a speedy decision should be obtained, and as they understand that the case would be taken up in its ordinary course in the Roll at an earlier period by the Second Division of the Court than by the First, they humbly crave your Lordship to move the Court to remit the case to the Second Division accordingly."

The note having been called in the single Bills,—

Fraser, in support of the competency of the course proposed in the note, referred to the 1 & 2 Vict. cap. 118, sects. 3 & 4; A. S. 24th Dec. 1838, sect. 2; 58 Geo. III. c. 121, sect. 9. He stated that he had not found any reported decision which he could refer to as a precedent; but he submitted that, inasmuch as the case was brought into the First Division by the choice of the pursuer, the pursuer and defender might of consent remove it into another Court of co-ordinate jurisdiction.

LORD PRESIDENT.—Consent of parties may remove after objections; but it is a very serious thing to say that the pursuer and defender may remove a case from one Division to another, if they choose. The question is, has the Court power to permit that?

LORD DEAS.—If the principle be right, the intervention of the Court is not necessary. The theory, however, is, that an action from the Sheriff Court may of consent be brought at once to this Court.

Fraser.—We are willing to take any risk, and to waive all questions as to competency.

LORD IVORY.—This is not a matter in which the consent of parties can avail. They ask the Court to do a certain thing, but they do not say that the Court have power to do it, and if the Court have not power to do it, they are not in the least helped by the consent of parties. The statutes to which we are referred are authority, but not in favour of this proceeding. As to the 58 Geo. III., which is the source of jurisdiction as between the Divisions of the Court, no doubt there is conferred a general jurisdiction in all cases before they take their proper places in the Roll. Both Divisions have the same jurisdiction till then, but not otherwise; and I remember a case which took place under an old Act of Sederunt, which shows that consent of parties is not sufficient to remove the difficulty which may arise in a question of jurisdiction. The Act held, that on the death of a Lord Ordinary, where a case was not moved in for a period of six months, it was then necessary to have a special remit to another Lord Ordinary. In this case the Lord Ordinary had died, and there was no special remit; but the case was proceeded with for four Judicial Factor on the estate of an intestate under the New Bankrupt Act—Stat. 19 & 20 Vict. cap. 79, sect. 164.—The parties interested in an intestate estate, which consisted partly of heritage and partly of moveables, were children who were creditors to the extent of their provisions under a marriage-contract; and the executors of the widow, who were creditors for a sum advanced by her to clear off a debt with which part of the heritage had been burdened. No title had been made up to the heritage or moveables; but the parties interested in the succession had entered into an agreement, by which they regulated their respective interests. To meet their claims a sale was essential, but the heirs-at-law were minors. Application was therefore made by them for the appointment of a judicial factor, under sect. 164 of the 19th & 20th Vict. cap. 79;—Held (dub. This petition prayed for the appointment of a judicial factor, under the 164th section of the Bankrupt Statute, 19 & 20 Vict. cap. 79, upon the estate of the late Alexander Macfarlane of Perth, who died on 14th February 1838.

By an antenuptial contract of marriage, Mrs Macfarlane conveyed to her husband her whole personal estate; while, on the other hand, Mr Macfarlane bound himself and his heirs to pay to his widow, after his death, an annuity of L.40 during her life. In security of the annuity he disposed a flat and shop in George Street, Perth. At his death, this property was burdened with a debt of L.400. He also assigned to her, in case she should survive him, the household furniture belonging to him at his decease. No. 140.

* Section 164 is as follows:—"It shall be competent to one or more creditors of parties deceased, to the amount of L.100, or to persons having an interest in the succession of such parties, in the event of the deceased having left no settlement appointing trustees, or other parties having power to manage his estate, or part thereof, or in the event of such parties not accepting or acting, to apply by summary petition to either division of the Court for the appointment of a judicial factor, and after such intimation of the petition to the creditors of the deceased and other persons interested as may be considered by the Court, the Court may appoint such factor, subject to such other conditions as the Court may think proper, to manage the estate, recover debts due to the estate, to sell by public or private sale, as may be most expedient, the moveable and immovable estate of the deceased, and to distribute the proceeds thereof, after payment of the claims of creditors, in conformity to a state of funds and considered and approved of by the Court; and the factor shall account for and expenses, to the parties having an interest in the estate, and the Court shall annually examine and approve of the accounts of such factor, which shall be reported to the Court thereon from time to time; and the factor shall generally exercise the like powers, as if he were a trustee under a sequestration, but subject to the control of the Court."

With regard to the children to be procreated of the marriage, Mr Macfarlane bound himself and his heirs to make payment to them of the sum of L.560 amongst them, if more than one, at their respective majorities or marriages, with interest during the non-payment. These provisions to the widow and children were declared to be in full of terce, jus relictæ, and legitim. Mar. 6, 1857. Macfarlane.

There were nine sons born of the marriage, all of whom survived their father, and attained majority. Mr Macfarlane died intestate. He was survived by his widow, who died in September 1854. Alexander Macfarlane, her son, and William Duncan and John Gray, were her executors.

This petition was presented by Alexander Macfarlane for himself, and as attorney for four of his brothers who were abroad—by the widow of the deceased John Macfarlane, the eldest son of the marriage, and by Mrs Macfarlane senior's executors. It set forth the property belonging to the late Mr Macfarlane, and the facts above mentioned, and stated that the creditor in the bond over the subjects in George Street for L.400 having called up the money in 1850, Mrs Macfarlane senior, in order to prevent the subjects being sold, advanced the L.400, and took a discharge from the creditor. The discharge bore that the money was paid by John Macfarlane, iron-founder in Perth, the eldest son; but the money was actually advanced by his mother. That, in June 1854, a deed of agreement was entered into between Mrs Macfarlane senior, Mrs Isabella Macfarlane, as executrix of her deceased husband John Macfarlane, the eldest son, Alexander Macfarlane, William Stewart Macfarlane of Montreal, then in Perth, for himself, and as attorney, duly authorised, for his brothers James Macfarlane, Peter Macfarlane, Henry Hepburn Macfarlane, and David Jobson Macfarlane, all at that time abroad. This deed narrated the contract of marriage, and particularly the provisions in favour of the widow and children. It also narrated that Mrs Macfarlane, senior, was executrix of her deceased son Robert Macfarlane, town-clerk of Perth; that the claims on the moveable estate of Alexander Macfarlane, senior, nearly equalled the value thereof, and that the whole available estate left by him consisted of the heritable subjects therein specified; that nothing had been paid to the children on account of their provisions under the contract; that Mrs Macfarlane, senior, had advanced the sum of L.400 for clearing off the debt on the subjects in George Street, which sum formed a debt due to her from her husband's estate; that she acknowledged to have received, in the manner therein specified, payment of her annuity up to the date of the agreement, and agreed to take the rent of the George Street subjects as payment in future; and further, that she agreed to set off the interest on the L.400, on account of rent for the subjects in the High Street tenanted by her. The other subscribers agreed to hold said narrative as correct, and the arrangement binding upon them. It was further set forth, "that as the said sum payable to us (the children) at our majority was never paid, because there was no funds for the purpose, we shall, and do hereby respectively agree to hold ourselves on an equal footing in regard to our right and interest under said marriage-contract at the time when the death of our said mother shall happen, and that the estate then existing, consisting, as foresaid, of the said property in George Street, subject to the debt to our said mother of L.400, the said property in High Street and Horner's Hall, and the said bank shares, shall form the only fund for division amongst us, and shall then, less expenses, be equally divided amongst the said executrix of the said deceased John Macfarlane, and the others of us, said children of said marriage surviving, and which equal shares shall be held by us respectively in lieu and place, and in full of any claim which we might have under the said marriage-contract, and which we bind and oblige ourselves, and those for whom we act, to receive and accept accordingly, so as to prevent any questions or disagreements amongst us at a future time, when the contingency shall arise which shall render said distribution under said contract necessary."

The petition farther stated, that in consequence of the death of Mrs Macfarlane, this agreement had come into effect. The surviving children, and the representatives of those who had predeceased, were now desirous to obtain payment of their provisions under the marriage-contract, and the executors of Mrs Macfarlane, senior, desired payment of the L.400. But in consequence of the state of the title, and of the minority of the heirs-at-law, a difficulty had arisen which prevented payment being made of the debt and provisions. The heirs-at-law were the four daughters of the eldest son John Macfarlane, three of whom were in pupillarity, and only one had attained the age of puberty. Alexander Macfarlane, senior, having died intestate, the property could not be sold, and the proceeds divided among the children without the heirs-at-law making up a title and selling, and dividing the price. But in consequence of their minority a title could not be given to a purchaser through them, of such a character as to insure a fair price from a purchaser.

The moveable estate of the deceased, consisting solely of certain bank shares, the value of which was about L.150, was totally inadequate to meet these obligations, and it was absolutely necessary, therefore, that the heritable estate should be sold.

In these circumstances this petition was presented. It was stated that the whole of the debts of the deceased Alexander Macfarlane had been paid, with the exception of the debts due to the children or their representatives under the contract of marriage, and the L.400 advanced by the deceased's late widow, and now due to her executors; and the children or their representatives, and the executors, were the only creditors of the deceased.

The prayer of the petition was for intimation on the walls and in the minute-book, in common form, and thereafter, on resuming consideration thereof, with or without answers, to appoint Robert Martin to be judicial factor on the said estate, with the powers conferred by the statute; and specially, with power to make up titles in his person to the heritable estate which belonged to the said deceased Alexander Macfarlane—he always finding caution before extract; or to do otherwise, &c.

When the case appeared in the single bills,—

LORD PRESIDENT—We are desirous to consider whether the statute applies to such a case as this. The proper course, therefore, will be in the meanwhile to order intimation as craved, reserving consideration of the competency. The Court have not yet passed any act of sederunt to regulate such appointments; and if we should eventually grant the prayer of this petition, it must be subject to the conditions of any act of sederunt we may hereafter pass, and it is rather an omission not to ask for such other service as the Court may deem necessary. We think the prayer of this petition should be amended in another point. In applying this statute, I am not prepared to say that the Court will be disposed to accept the nomination of any party; otherwise, it would come to this, that any petitioner might choose his own trustee.

The petitioner then amended the prayer by adding the words, "or such other person as your Lordships may think proper." Of this date the case was advised.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I have not the slightest doubt as to the competency of this appointment. There is no application here for powers to carry out the agreement. If there were, I should refuse it. But there is a narrative of the agreement, not for the purpose of being carried out, but to show that the petitioners are creditors to

This view of the matter appears to me to be not only clear upon principle, but Mar. 5, 1857.
also to be established by authority. In Pollock v. Porterfield, 28th January 1778, Barns v.
Mor. p. 10,702, a party holding money under trust to employ it in the purchase of Barns' lands to be entailed on a series of persons to whom it was destined, misapplied it Trustees.
by paying it to the party who was to be the institute. After the lapse of forty years, an action was instituted by the substitute heir against the representatives of the trustee, and of the institute, who had received the money,—both of whom had died in the meanwhile,—concluding to have it found that the pursuer was entitled to the benefit of the trust, and to have the defenders ordained to pay over the capital to a person to be named by the Court to purchase and entail the lands in terms of the trust.
The Court, on the ground that the substitute, as creditor under the trust, had a right to challenge every deed of the trustee in contravention of the trust, held that the objection to the misapplication of the trust funds was excluded by prescription, and assoilzied the defenders. The judgment was affirmed by the House of Lords, 14th March 1779. Paton's Appeal Cases, II, 495.

The case of Rocheid v. Kinloch is a direct authority on the point. To understand the facts it is necessary to compare the different reports in Mor. Dict., Appendix to Prescription, Nos. 4 and 7, and in Patton's Appeal Cases, p. 85. It appears from such a comparison that Miss Rocheid, besides executing a strict entail of certain lands in favour of Alexander Kinloch and a series of heirs, conveyed also to him and the same series of heirs all her other estates and effects, on the condition that the same should be realised, and the proceeds be applied in purchasing other lands to be entailed on the same series of heirs, and on the same conditions as those set forth in her own deed of entail; that one of the conditions of the conveyance by Miss Rocheid was, that in case any of the disponees "shall before any purchase of land be made by them in manner before directed, happen to uplift any of the principal sums hereby disposed for that purpose, he shall be bound and obliged to lend and employ the same upon good and sufficient security, either real or personal, and the bonds and securities to be taken for the same shall always bear in express terms that the sum for which the same is granted was part of the money disposed by me to the person lending the same, and his or her heirs of tailzie, to be employed for the purchase of land when the same could be conveniently made, and the sum shall always be made payable to the heir of tailzie for the time who shall lend the same, and to his heirs tailzie herein named, according to the substitution and order
of succession contained in this my right and disposition, to which particular reference shall always be made in such bonds and securities;" that Alexander Kinloch, the institute, accordingly did realise all the estate and effects (which amounted to about L.6000), excepting certain special debts and subjects mentioned in the reports; that he, however, contravened the directions in the settlement by not only delaying to purchase lands with the money realised by him, and entail them, but likewise by failing to obey the positive directions above quoted (as to which no discretion was allowed to him) of making such an interim investment of the sums as was directed in the settlement; and that, on the contrary, he,—often mixing up the trust-funds so realised with his own proper funds, so as to render them undistinguishable,—left a settlement, destining everything which should long to him at the time of his death to his son, and a series of heirs different from that in Miss Rocheid's settlement, and his son continued to enjoy all his estate and effects, including the funds realised by Alexander Kinloch from Miss Rocheid's estate. After the lapse of forty years from the date of Alexander Kinloch's intrusions with these funds, an action by the heirs of entail for an account thereof, and for investment of them in terms of Miss Rocheid's settlement, was brought and to be cut off by the negative prescription. The ground of this judgment (as appears from the report of date 1st March 1808, after the case returned from the House of Lords) was, "that the original right under the trust had been violated
by the act of the defender's father to a certain extent, and that to this extent there had been an interest to pursue in the substitutes of entail, in consequence of which his right to the same extent was lost by prescription." In that case, as in the present, it was pleaded that the general obligation to account under the trust was extinguished by prescription; but that plea was repelled, and the negative pre-

THE petitioner, as heir of entail in possession of the estate of Freswick, presented this petition, with consent of her husband, for authority to grant a bond and disposition in security for two-thirds of three-fourths of sums expended on entail improvements, in terms of the 18th section of 11 & 12 Vict. cap. 36.

On 5th June 1849, William James Sinclair, then heir in possession, brother of the petitioner, and to whom the petitioner succeeded, obtained decree of declarator in terms of the 10 Geo. III. cap. 51, for L.3048, 2s. 7½d. being three-fourths of a sum of L.4064, 3s. 5½d., expended by him in improvements previous to the 14th August 1848. He died on 20th February 1855, without having executed a bond of annualrent, or charged the entailed estate in respect of the improvement debt, as authorised by the Entail Amendment Act. The case was reported by Lord Mackenzie, who called the attention of the Court to the circumstances, 1st, that the present application was made at the instance, not of the heir who had executed the improvements and obtained decree under the Montgomery Act, but of his successor; and, 2d, that the said bond now sought was to be made payable not to executors in right of the debt due under said decree, but to a third party advancing the amount to be applied in discharging said debt. His Lordship reported in favour of the application.

THE COURT, without difficulty, authorised the bond to be granted.

Crichton v.
Campbell.

Proof—Oath on reference.—On a reference to oath, a defender deponed that he had paid to a relative with whom he had other pecuniary dealings money to discharge the claim sued for, but had never seen a discharge, nor had he been told that the debt was paid. His relative had left the country, and died without any settlement of their accounts taking place;—Held (aff. the judgment of the Lord Ordinary) that the resting owing was proved.

THIS was an action raised in 1855 before the Sheriff of Argyleshire by a 2^d Division. Surgeon, for payment of an account amounting to L.67, for medical attendance and medicines furnished between August 1836 and July 1837. The sum charged was, to the amount of L.49, for attendance and medicines for the defender's wife at the defender's house at Arihoulan, the balance being for attendance and medicines for the defender during an illness with which he was seized while on a visit to Mr Smith, his brother-in-law, at Glenevis. The defender pleaded prescription;—he alleged, moreover, that the account was overcharged,—an account for the same attendance, &c., previously rendered, having only amounted to L.41. In 1838 the defender had executed a trust for behoof of his creditors, who had discharged their claims on payment of a composition. The pursuer had not at that time made any claim. He was allowed a proof by the oath of the defender.

Ld. Benholme.
R.

The oath was to the following effect:—The pursuer was not the defender's ordinary medical attendant. He was called to visit the defender's wife at Arihoulan, and made some calls afterwards. The defender only recollected four or five visits. The pursuer was called upon to visit the defender by Smith, when on a visit to Smith, then residing at Glenevis. "I paid Mr Smith for Dr Crichton's professional attendance on me at Glenevis. I forget the sum I paid Mr Smith. Whatever Dr Crichton was to charge for attendance on me, Mr Smith was to pay for, as Mr Smith had sent for Dr Crichton. Dr Crichton and Mr Smith had running accounts. Smith had funds of mine in his hands, and he said he would settle Dr Crichton's account; and Smith charged me with the doctor's account. I don't recollect the amount that Smith charged me with as paid by him to Dr Crichton on my account. Smith and I had no final settlement of accounts; and he left the country indebted to me. Smith never exhibited to me an account of Dr Crichton's charges for attendance on me. On one occasion I wanted money from Smith, and he said that he had running accounts with Dr Crichton, and that the doctor's charges would stand as cash paid by Smith on my account. Smith's excuse for not giving me money at the time was, that he had accounts with Dr Crichton, which he had paid, or would pay, on my account, as he had employed him. I also left funds in Smith's hands to pay Dr Crichton for his attendances on Mrs Campbell, but I am not sure whether Smith paid the doctor." "Smith never said that he had actually paid Dr Crichton's account; but I considered that he had settled it, as Dr Crichton had not rendered an account to me for fifteen years of his professional charges." The defender farther deponed—The pursuer made purchases at a sale the defender had at Arihoulan, in 1838, to the amount of L.4 or L.5. This sum was never accounted for to the defender, but still for the money might have been granted and been discounted. The person who took charge of the sale stated that the proceeds of some bills which had been granted had been applied in payment of debts due by the defender and Smith.

The Sheriff-substitute found, with reference to the constitution of the debt, that the oath established the claim to the extent of four or five professional visits to Mrs Campbell at Arihoulan, with corresponding furnishings of medicine, and the whole visits to the pursuer at Glenevis, but not the furnishings of medicine there. With respect to the resting owing of the debt, found the oath negative of the reference, and assolized the defender.

The Sheriff, on 24th July 1855, altered this judgment, and found the oath established the resting owing so far as the Sheriff-substitute had found the constitution of the debt established, and quoad ultra adhered; and remitted to the Sheriff-substitute to proceed with the cause. *

* "NOTE.—The Sheriff agrees with the Sheriff-substitute regarding the extent to which the defender's deposition establishes the constitution of the debt. The idea that Smith was exclusively liable is founded on the pretence that he sent for the defender without necessity, which is contradicted by the defender's admission that he accepted the pursuer's attendance for a long course of visits; and is inconsistent with the anxious endeavour, throughout the deposition, to make out that the pursuer was paid out of the defender's own funds.

"The Sheriff has carefully considered the question of resting owing, but has been unable to arrive at the same conclusion with the Sheriff-substitute.

"It is not enough for a defender, who admits that he has not himself paid the debt, to depone in vague terms that he believes it to be paid; he must state the grounds of his belief, that the case the statement of the defender in the hands of his brother-in-law that Smith was to pay Dr Crichton never shewed the defender as having paid such; that the debt was in the country in his debt; but withholding money from the pursuer he had paid, or would pay, or left funds in Smith's hands; but not sure whether Smith paid.

"The Sheriff holds this statement to be supported by several decided cases, where the House of Lords, deponed that he believed the debt had been paid, from his having recovered, and they did not affirm the decision of the Sheriff. In Mette v. Dalziel, 8 Shaw reported in a note, it was held that he had given money to another person, without shewing him some receipt, principle ruled the decisions in 1841, where resting owing was sustained on the defence was sustained on the facts.

"Here the defender does not shew that he had paid the pursuer's clerk or servant, or the usual mode of payment held of weight in the cases at bar.

"It is clear that the statement of the defender's effects must be of an extrinsic quality. So the case is remitted.

"The case has been remitted to be allowed for medicines, and the pursuer has stated that he does not agree even in the number of visits to follow that he cannot be allowed. The Sheriff had been in a position to find, he would have found ex-

The Sheriff-substitute then found the pursuer entitled to the sum of L.19, No. 142. being for five visits to Mrs Campbell at Ariboulan, and for the visits to the defender at Glenevis, with interest on that sum from the date at which a claim for payment was first made, to which the Sheriff adhered.

Crichton v.
Campbell.

The defender advocated. The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the reasons of advocacy: Remits the case simpliciter to the Sheriff, and decerns: Finds the respondent entitled to expenses," &c. *

The defender reclaimed, and pleaded:—The question to be decided was, whether non-payment was proved? The inference, from the long time that had been allowed to elapse, and the pursuer having made no claim when the defender obtained a settlement on a composition with his other creditors, was that the pursuer had been paid; he was bound, in order to prevail, to shew that the oath was conclusive of the fact of resting owing, which it was not.¹

The pursuer pleaded;—The two things to be proved were the constitution of the debt and the resting owing; the evidence of each of these must be extracted from the oath, and must be different in character; the proof of the first must be affirmative, of the latter negative. The constitution of the debt was clearly proved by the oath, and there being nothing in it that could be held to prove payment, the pursuer must be held to have proved his case; or although it might be maintained that the defender had paid the money to his brother-in-law, that was no proof of payment to the pursuer.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am very unwilling to give effect to the oath in this case.

We must lay aside all consideration of the distance of time since the date of the pendances charged for by the pursuer.

If the oath of the defender had been to the effect that he did not know, at such distance of time, how the debt had been paid, but he was certain it had been paid, that oath would have been negative of the reference. But this person consents upon his reasons for thinking that the debt has been paid. He says that Smith, who had funds of his in his hands, promised to pay the pursuer, but he does not say that Smith ever shewed him an account discharged by the pursuer, or that there was ever any settlement of accounts between himself and Smith, and he admits that he did not himself pay this debt. We cannot tell, from the terms of this oath, whether the debt was paid. It would be introducing a very loose practice in regard to the effect of an oath, if such a statement, as is made by the defender here, of having paid a sum of money to another party to pay the debt, or allowed him to take credit for it, should be held to be proof of payment to the creditor. Where a party can prove a settlement by an arrangement to which there are fair grounds for holding that the creditor was a party, as in the case of Law v. Johnston, the case is very different. The pursuer never was a party to this alleged arrangement with Smith. Here there is just the defender's statement that Smith had funds of his in his hands, but there is no statement that Smith ever shewed the pursuer a state of accounts shewing payment of the pursuer's claim, or any receipt from the pursuer. Considering the long time during which this claim has been allowed to stand over, and the high rates charged (but which have been considerably cut down by the Sheriff), I must, with reluctance, adhere to the judgment finding that resting owing has been proved.

LORD MURRAY.—The oath is distinct enough in the first portion of it, but vague in the second, when the defender was interrogated more closely. There is no statement that there was any voucher produced by Smith for the money paid to the pursuer; there

Mar. 7, 1857.
Messer v. Simson's Trustees.

LORD COWAN.—I am of the same opinion. As regards the constitution of this debt, that is clearly established to the amount determined by the Sheriff. The defender exonerates himself from the resting owing by his arrangement with Smith; but to that arrangement the creditor was not a party, as in the case of Law v. Johnston. To my mind it is perfectly conclusive that this case is distinct from that of Cooper v. Hamilton, 20th Feb. 1824, which was taken to the House of Lords, and decided there of date 14th March 1826. The words of the oath in that case were very clear, making reference to receipts in process; but it was found, on looking at these receipts, that their terms did not support the oath.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall hoc statu the remit to the Sheriff: Quoad ultra refuse the prayer of the reclaiming note, and adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against: Find the claimer liable in the expenses incurred since the date of the reclaiming note: Allow an account," &c.

In his summons he described the moss as "a piece of moss or muir ground, consisting of thirteen acres, one rood, or thereby, being a part and portion of, and comprehended within the bounds and marches of the lands and estate of Nether Blainslie, the property of the pursuer;" whereas it was not so comprehended, but the error was avoided in the issue. In his condescendence, Messer averred that the moss, as stated in the summons, was comprehended in his lands, and the defenders denied that it was so comprehended. He now moved for leave to delete "and comprehended within the bounds and marches of," from the summons.

The defenders were not called on.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The description of this property in the schedule appended to the pursuer's issue is not in accordance with the conclusions of the summons, but quite the opposite. Where a party in this way changes the description of property he claims right to, one or other of two things must happen: Either the summons is irregular, because the averments do not support its conclusions, or it is a summons which concludes to have a piece of property declared to belong to a party, which, he says, is situated in one place, but which he afterwards wants to have it declared is situated in another place. I cannot conceive anything more inter essentialia than this, and I am quite averse to allow an issue where the conclusions of the summons are so opposed to the proposed terms of it.

LORD IVORY.—I have arrived at the same conclusion. The strict locality is of the substance of the case. The declaratory conclusions are at variance with the previous recital.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I am of the same opinion; and I do not think we have the power to grant this issue. The pursuer would not be in safety to go to trial with it as the record stands. But the practical question is, whether we shall allow an amendment of the libel at this stage of the case, and whether, without contravening the Judicature Act, we can do so? The hardship, after all, resolves into a matter of expenses, for this party can avail himself of the statutory privilege of abandoning this action, and bringing another in which he may be careful to avoid the objection which has proved fatal to this one.

LORD DEAS concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel for the parties,—Find that under the summons as laid, and the record, the pursuer Dr Messer is not entitled to an issue of the property of the piece of ground as described in the schedule to his proposed issues; and quoad ultra, Remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed farther in the cause as shall be just, reserving all questions of expenses, and granting power to the Lord Ordinary to dispose thereof."

The action was raised in the name of Mrs Gale, and Jonathan W. Gale, as his wife's administrator in law, and for his interest as her husband. It was stated that Mrs Gale was married in 1852. That in September 1854, her husband sailed in the capacity of steward on board the ship "Prince of the Seas" of Glasgow, on a voyage to Melbourne in the colony of Victoria. The vessel was wrecked on the Heads of Port Philip, and he being obliged to shift for himself, engaged as steward on board the cruising pilot cutter "Queenscliffe" of Melbourne, and had since continued to be employed on board that vessel. In these circumstances the defender pleaded,—That ante omnia the pursuers, at least the male pursuer, was bound to sist a mandatory.

Having heard counsel on this plea, the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the said plea in hoc statu, and allows the preparation of the cause to proceed, in respect that the female pursuer resides in Greenock; that the action is for damages on account of slander personal to her, and that the male pursuer sues only as her administrator, and for his interest as her husband: Appoints Mr Donald Beith, S.S.C., Curator ad litem to the female pursuer." *

The defender reclaimed, and pleaded;—The action was really at the instance of the female pursuer. A married woman had never been allowed to sue for damages and solatium without her husband or a mandatory for him, unless where he refused to join her in the vindication of her character,¹ or where she had been carrying on a business which was injured,² or, as in one case, where the pursuer was a widow and sued as her husband's executrix.³ The judgment reclaimed against seemed to have gone on the principle that the defender was not entitled to any security for the expenses of the litigation if he was assoilzied.

LORD JUSTICE CLERK.—I don't think that we can stop proceedings in this case until a mandatory be sisted, the defender not alleging that the male pursuer refused to concur in the action.

LORD COWAN.—I cannot hold that a married woman is not entitled to right herself when her character is attacked, even without her husband's concurrence. I do not think the defender's demand ought to be complied with by the Court.

LORD MURRAY concurred.

LORD WOOD absent.

The Court adhered, reserving the question of expenses.

* "NOTE.—The pursuer residing in Greenock, while her husband is at sea, brings this action for vindication of her character, and for such reparation as law can award for personal slander. It was stated by her counsel, that her husband is expected to be soon in this country. It is settled by the decisions in Mackenzie or Cullen v. Ewing, 19th November 1830, and Smith v. Stoddart, 5th July 1850, that a wife can sue such an action independent of her husband. A curator ad litem is appointed; and the Lord Ordinary does not think that a mandatory can be required at present."

Robertson v.

Lease—Joint tenancy—Assignment—Acquiescence and homologation.—A farm was let to two tenants, and the survivor of them, and the heirs of such survivor. The tenants (for their own convenience) divided the farm, and each paid the rents and burdens effeiring to his half. One of them assigned his right under the lease to a nephew, and soon after died; the assignee continued in possession for more than a year, and paid his share of the rent. His name also was entered in the landlord's rental book as joint tenant;—Held (affirming judgment of Lord Mackenzie) that the assignation could not overturn the rights of the other tenant under the lease, he having been no party to it, and that the acts libelled did not amount to acquiescence in, and homologation of the assignation, and were not such as to prevent him from vindicating his right as sole tenant of the farm under the lease.

THE nature of the deeds which gave rise to the question in this case, and Mar. 10, 1857.
the pleas of parties, are fully embodied in the note appended by the Lord Ordinary to the following interlocutor, pronounced by him on 22d May 1855:—“ Finds, that by a lease, dated 27th April and 1st May 1843, the declarator bonis of John Duke of Atholl let the farm of Westerton to the late John Malcolm and the pursuer, and the survivor of them, and the heirs of such survivor, but secluding assignees and subtenants, and that for nineteen years from Whitsunday 1843 as to the houses and grass, and the separation of that year's crop from the ground as to the arable lands; but subject to this condition, that the lease should come to an end at the first term after the Duke's death, unless the heir of entail entitled to succeed to the estate should agree to allow it to run to its natural termination: Finds that the pursuer and the late John Malcolm entered into possession of the farm of Westerton under this lease: Finds that after the death of the late John Duke of Atholl, in September 1846, the pursuer and the late John Malcolm were accepted as joint tenants under the lease by the present Duke: Finds that the late John Malcolm, on 21st April 1851, executed an assignation on the back of the lease, whereby he assigned to the defender his whole right and interest in the said lease: Finds that the said John Malcolm died in August 1851: Finds that the defender entered into possession of that part of the farm of Westerton previously occupied by Malcolm, and reaped the half of the crops in 1851, 1852, and 1853, and that he paid to the landlord the half of the rents for these years: Finds that on the 6th July 1853 the pursuer's agents wrote to the defender, intimating that he had no right or title to interfere with the lease, and requesting him to remove from that part of the farm possessed by him: Finds that, in consequence of the defender's refusal to comply with that request, the present action of declarator and removing was raised against him: Finds that, according to the special terms of the lease which was granted to the late John Malcolm and the pursuer, and the survivor of them, it was ultra vires of the said John Malcolm as one of the joint tenants, without the pursuer's consent, to assign his half share or interest in the lease to the defender, so as to deprive the pursuer of his right to succeed to the whole lease as the last survivor after Malcolm's death: Finds that the pursuer, as the last survivor, has now the sole right as tenant to the lease of the farm of Westerton, and is entitled to the exclusive possession thereof till the expiry of the said lease: Finds that the defender has no legal title to the said lease as tenant or joint tenant in whole or in part, and is bound forthwith to remove from the said farm:
Therefore, repels the defences, and to the above extent, finds, decerns, and declares in terms of the libel, and decerns and ordains the defender to flit and remove himself, his family, servants, goods, and gear, from the said farm of Westerton, and leave the same void and redd, to the end that the pursuer

Robertson v.

* "NOTE.—The object of this action, which was raised in March 1854, is to have it found and declared that the pursuer has now the sole right as tenant to the lease of the farm of Westerton, granted by the curator bonis of the Duke of Atholl in 1843 in favour of the pursuer and the late John Malcolm, and the survivor of them, and that the defender, as assignee of Malcolm, has no right to interfere with the lease, and is bound to remove from the farm. By a lease, dated 27th April and 1st May 1843, the curator bonis of John Duke of Atholl let the farm of Westerton 'to the said John Malcolm and Peter Robertson, and the survivor of them, and the heirs of such survivor, the eldest heir-female always succeeding without division, but secluding assignees of every description, and subtenants, and possessors for behoof of creditors,' and that for nineteen years from Whitsunday 1843 as to the houses and grass, and the separation of that year's crop from the ground as to the arable lands. It was declared, however, that the lease should come to an end at the first term after the Duke's death, unless the heir of entail entitled to succeed to the estate should agree to allow it to run to its natural termination. The pursuer and John Malcolm entered into possession of the farm of Westerton as joint tenants under this lease. For their own convenience they agreed to divide it into two separate portions, Malcolm having occupied the eastern and the pursuer the western division, while a small park was possessed in common. Each of the tenants paid half of the rent to the landlord.

"After the death of the late John Duke of Atholl, in September 1846, the pursuer and Malcolm were accepted as tenants by the present Duke. A minute was written on the back of the lease, bearing that the Duke renounced the power to put an end to the lease, and accepted the pursuer and Malcolm as tenants for the period still to run; 'but always under the conditions, provisions, and restrictions mentioned in the said lease, and also under the provisions after written.' This minute was duly subscribed before witnesses by the pursuer and Malcolm, on 12th February 1849; and, though it is not signed by the Duke, it was homologated and acted upon by him.

"The defender, Alexander Menzies, is the nephew, but not the heir-at law, of the late John Malcolm. On the 21st April 1851, Malcolm executed an assignation on the back of the lease of Westerton, whereby he assigned and made over to the defender 'my whole right and interest in the within written lease or tack, surrogating and substituting him, the said Alexander Menzies, in my full right and place of the premises.' This assignation was duly intimated to the landlord on 22d April 1851.

"In August 1851 John Malcolm died, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, whereby he directed his trustees to make over to the defender the whole crop, stocking, and effects on the farm belonging to him at the time of his death.

"In April 1851, the defender entered into possession of that part of the farm of Westerton, including the dwelling-house and range of offices previously occupied by Malcolm; the defender continued in possession after Malcolm's death; he was allowed to reap the half of the crops, and to pay the half of the rents and other public and parochial burdens; his name was entered in the rental-book of the landlord as joint tenant along with the pursuer; and, although the pursuer alleges generally that he objected to the defender's possession, it does not appear that any serious attempt was made to disturb it till on or about the 6th July 1853, being upwards of two years after the date of the assignation, and nearly two years after Malcolm's death. On that date the pursuer's agents wrote to the defender, requesting him to remove from that part of the farm possessed by him; although it is explained on the record that this requisition was only intended to apply to the defender's removal at Martinmas 1853. The defender having declined to remove, the pursuer adopted proceedings against him in the sheriff court; and these, having been unsuccessful, were followed by the present action of declarator and removing.

"1. In this state of the facts the first question which arises is, Whether it was in the power of Malcolm, as one of the joint tenants, to assign his half-share or interest in the lease to the defender without the pursuer's consent, so as to deprive the pursuer, as the last survivor, of his right to succeed to the whole lease on Malcolm's death? It was argued by the defender that the clause in the lease founded on by the pursuer was a mere gratuitous destination, which Malcolm was entitled to alter at pleasure; that this was effectually done by the assignation in favour of the defender; and that, if the landlord did not object, no other party could do so. To this it was answered by the pursuer that, looking to the special provisions of this lease and the strong delectus personæ necessarily implied in joint tenancy and the mutual relations arising therefrom, it was very questionable whether Malcolm could validly assign his interest in the lease, even during his own lifetime, without the pursuer's consent; but that, even supposing Malcolm could do so, he had no power to defeat the rights of the pursuer as last survivor under the lease; that this was not a proper case of gratuitous destination, the rights of the joint tenants being regulated by a mutual onerous contract, whereby the life of one party was set against the other, and it was stipulated that, on the death of either, the whole right to the lease should accrue to the survivor and his heirs, and that this express condition of the contract could not competently be altered or set aside by one of the joint tenants without the written consent of the other. Though the Lord Ordinary is not aware of any case precisely similar to the present, he is humbly of opinion that Malcolm had no power, without the pursuer's consent, to grant any assignation to the defender which could have the effect of defeating the pursuer's right to succeed to the whole lease as the last survivor.

"2. Another point maintained by the pursuer was, that the assignation granted in favour of the defender by Malcolm was a mere conveyance of his 'whole right and interest in the within written lease;' that this could only carry Malcolm's half-share or interest in the lease during his life, but nothing after his death; and that Malcolm did not alter or attempt to alter the clause of substitution in the original lease in favour of the last survivor of the joint tenants, even supposing he had power to do so. Though there is some plausibility in this view, the Lord Ordinary would not be inclined to adopt it if he was prepared to hold that Malcolm had full power to dispose of his half-share of the lease, not only during his life but after his death, without the pursuer's consent; because, upon that hypotheses, he thinks the assignation would be sufficient to support the defender's claims.

"3. But the chief difficulty which the Lord Ordinary has felt in disposing of this case has arisen from the conduct of the pursuer in permitting the defender after Malcolm's death to continue in possession of the half of the farm, to reap the half of the crops, to pay the half of the rents and public burdens, and to exercise all the powers and rights of a joint tenant under the lease; and all this apparently without challenge or interruption, till about the 6th July 1853, when his agents formally required the defender to remove from the farm. Assuming the defender's title under the assignation to be defective, the question remains, What effect is to be given to the proceedings which took place during this long period, in the course of which it is said, various improvements were executed by the defender, not only upon that part of the lands separately occupied by him, but upon the field possessed in common? It is not improbable that the pursuer was ignorant of the true nature of his rights under the lease till he consulted his law-agents in July 1853, when, for the first time, written notice was given to the defender to remove from the farm at Martinmas following. Be this as it may, if the Lord Ordinary be correct in holding that, on the death of Malcolm, the pursuer acquired the sole right to the lease, it follows that the defender could not insist on retaining possession of any part of the farm during the remaining years of the tack without a written title from him. The circumstance that the defender was allowed by the pursuer to remain in possession of the half of the farm for about two years after Malcolm's death may preclude the pursuer from calling him to account for his possession during that period, and may give rise to other questions, if money was bona fide expended by the defender in meliorations or improvements; but it is thought this cannot supply

No. 145. was tendered by the defender, averring that at the first term after Malcolm's death the pursuer and defender both attended at the collection of rent, when Malcolm's name was deleted from and the defender's entered in the rental-ledger. The pursuer was, upon the above occasion, aware of the deletion and entry, and that the defender was substituted for Malcolm as the joint tenant of the farm during the endurance of the lease. He approved of the insertion of the defender's name as such joint tenant along with him for the remainder of the lease; the subsequent payments of rent were made "on the faith of the foresaid entries, and of this adoption and reception as joint tenant for the full period of the lease." The Lord Ordinary "in respect it appeared to him, as intimated in the course of the debate, that the general averments made by the defender ought to be made more precise and specific, had allowed the minute to be received with that view, and to form part of the process, and appointed the pursuer to answer it."

Mar. 10, 1857.
Menzies.

The pursuer, who denied all knowledge of the assignation by Malcolm, denied this new allegation, except as to the fact of the entry in the rental, and the fact of the payment of rent, and then protested against the minute being held part of the record, on the ground that it was not merely an explanation of any statements in the record, but contained totally new matter, involving a new ground of defence which had occurred to the defender since the examination of havers.

The defender reclaimed, praying the Court to to assoilzie him, with expenses; or otherwise to allow the statements in the minute given in under interlocutor of 3d February to be added to the record, and, if necessary, to open up the record to that effect, and to allow a proof.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I say nothing as to the value of the averments in this minute, nor whether they would make the record very materially different from what it is, but I see no reason for allowing the minute to be added. The parties had ample opportunity of making up their record, and they did make such averments as they thought the facts would warrant. I see no good reason, therefore, for allowing the record to be meddled with by importing this minute into it.

That being so, the defender prays to be allowed to prove the facts averred by him in the record—and which are indicated in this document—in order to establish the fact of his being now in full right of Malcolm's share of this lease, and that he cannot be excluded from it. The view which presents itself to me, in the first place, in regard to the lease itself, is that it was a lease in favour of John Malcolm and Peter Robertson, and the survivor of them, and the heirs of such survivor. That is a question which does not admit of construction, and, therefore, I hold that if John Malcolm had died without having made any assignation of his interest, Robertson, being the survivor, would undoubtedly have been tenant in full possession. The arrangement between the parties, whereby, during the currency of their possession, they separated the lands to be occupied by them, did not affect this question of survivorship. But Malcolm the defender Menzies, the question, or under that assignation sion under this lease until the

 some time during the life of Malcolm. The averment that is made here is intended not to support merely the recognition of Menzies as assignee of Malcolm in any sense whatever, but to support his pretension as assignee to the full extent now set forth. Robertson may have consented or agreed to or acquiesced in the reception of Menzies as tenant with him during the life of Malcolm, without consenting to receive him as joint-tenant in the event of Malcolm's death. This would not exclude him from the right of survivorship under the lease which might emerge on the death of Malcolm, but what is contended here is, that he did so exclude himself from that right, either by allowing Menzies to get into possession under the assignation, or by those other actings which are said to have taken place with the landlord himself.

It is not a sound interpretation of the actings of a party to adopt, that when the fact of the actings may be to deprive that party of the rights that he possesses under writing, you are necessarily to construe these acts in the largest sense so as to deprive him of these rights. I am far from saying that Robertson might not have raised a question as to the admissibility of Menzies at all into this joint-tenancy.
 But there is nothing stated which fixes Robertson in the position of having recognised Menzies as coming in place of Malcolm's personal possession—that is, during Malcolm's life. The joint payment of a year's rent after Malcolm's death is another matter. That comes to be of importance on considering whether he surrendered his right to exclude Menzies from becoming tenant with all the rights which Malcolm would have had had he survived. But, of itself, it does not amount to a surrender of that right. These averments are not sufficient to overturn the right which Robertson had under the original lease, or to import that he ever surrendered these rights; and therefore I am, on the whole, of opinion that the Lord Ordinary has arrived at a right result.

LORD IVORY.—There was a portion of this case which I had not the advantage of hearing, viz., the argument for the pursuer in whose favour I am to decide, but, I have heard all that is to be said for the defender, I have no hesitation in saying that I entirely concur. As to the construction of the lease, there is no room for question. It is clearly a lease with survivorship; and as to the rest of the case, we have no reason to differ from the conclusion of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I also concur. The construction of the original lease is clear. Robertson contracted for half of the rights under this lease; but in the event of his being the survivor, it was provided that he and his heirs should have right to the whole, and of course Malcolm contracted on the same footing. The rights of parties and their heirs were ultimately to depend on the survivorship. But the thing is plain, that after the death of either of them there was to be only one tenant, and that tenant was to be the survivor, and his heirs. What Malcolm conveyed to Menzies was only the right, such as it was, which he himself had under the lease. But according to the construction contended for, he conveyed the right to one-half of the lease after his own death—when his own right was to cease, and when therefore neither he nor his heirs had any right to it; so that if the assignee should survive Robertson, then although Robertson was the survivor of the two parties to whom the lease was originally granted, and although his heirs, by the terms of the lease, would then have right to the whole of it, yet Robertson's heirs would be excluded altogether, and thus, according to the construction now contended for, that conveyance by Malcolm of what he, by taxative words, limited to his own right, would be held to be a conveyance of rights which did not belong to him at Robertson, because he was conveying a right to that half which would have belonged to Robertson in the event of his being the survivor. Now that is rather a violent construction to put on this conveyance, more especially as Robertson himself was no party to it. I cannot hold that that was the meaning of Malcolm, but only that he conveyed such right, present and contingent, as he himself then had.
 Now, the question is, Did Menzies, after he entered into possession, acquire any other right than the possession commenced; and, in particular, did he thereby

No. 145. acquire from Robertson the right which Robertson had under the lease? for that is what it comes to. Now, when you bring the question to that issue, it is very clear that all these proceedings can have no such effect.

Mar. 10, 1857.
Smith v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

LORD DEAS.—I agree with your Lordships, both as to not allowing the minute to be added to the record, and on the merits. Parties must attend to their records in framing them, or take the consequences. As regards the terms of the lease, I think the sole right of the survivor is just as much part of the contract as his joint right during the lifetime of both. It is true the words applicable to the heirs of the survivor are just as express as the words applicable to the survivor himself. But the difference lies in this: the heirs of the survivor were no parties to the contract, and any right conferred on them was a mere right of succession, which the survivor, if the landlord did not object, might defeat. It is on this principle that a lease to a person and his heirs, including assignees and sub-tenants, may be assigned by the tenant if the landlord does not object,—a principle which does not at all apply to the right of survivorship contracted for by two joint tenants.

As to the other point: the defender must either rest on homologation of the assignation, or on homologation of the entry in the landlord's rental book. But, unfortunately, homologation is here required for two purposes: first, to put a certain construction on the assignation and entry in the rental book, which they do not ex facie bear; and second, to homologate, or rather to adopt, the assignation or the entry (which are not the writ of the pursuer) as being his writ. I do not think we have here averments relevant to infer homologation to either of these effects, and still less to both.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel in this cause for the parties, and advised the reclaiming note No. 68 of process, refuse to allow the statement in the minute No. 66 of process, given in under the interlocutor of 3d February 1855, to be added to or to form part of the record: Adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary submitted to review, and refuse the reclaiming note; and allow decree to go out ad interim: Find additional expenses due, and remit," &c.

L.

THIS case was reported on the adjustment of issues. The action concluded for L.3000 of damages against the Caledonian Railway Company for an infringement of letters patent for "an improved wheel for carriages of different descriptions," and of which the pursuers were assignees. The following were the issues proposed by the pursuers, and the counter issues proposed by the defenders:—

"It being admitted that John Day, of York Terrace, Peckham, in the county of Surrey, on 25th November 1835, obtained letters patent under the Seal used in Scotland in place of the Great Seal of Scotland, on 20th January 1836, to subsist for fourteen years from and after said 25th November 1835, being No. 14 of process, and that, in terms of the proviso contained in the said letters patent, he duly enrolled a specification, being No. 15 of process:—[The words in italics objected to by defenders.]

"It being also admitted that the said John Day, by an indenture, dated 15th August 1845, sold and assigned unto the pursuer Henry Smith, and to Thomas Willey of Liverpool, engine-manufacturer, now deceased, their executors, administrators, and assigns, the said letters patent, and all right competent to him, the said John Day, under the same, for the residue of the term of fourteen years granted by the said letters patent : No. 146.

"It being also admitted that the pursuer Mrs Seney Willey is in right of the said deceased Thomas Willey's interest under said patent, as executrix under his last will and settlements : Mar. 10, 1857.
Smith v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

"Whether, between the said 15th day of August 1845 and 25th November 1849, or during any part of said period, the defenders did, by themselves or others, wrongfully, and in contravention of the privileges conferred by the said letters patent, manufacture or use wheels for engines, tenders, and other carriages, substantially the same, and manufactured by the same process, with the wheels described in said specification, and to the extent set forth in the said letters patent and specification, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers?—[The words in italics proposed to be added by the defenders.]—Or,

"1. Whether the invention, as described in the said letters patent and specification, or any material part thereof, is not the original invention of the said John Day?—[The words in italics objected to by the pursuers.]

"2. Whether the description contained in the said specification is not such as to enable workmen of ordinary skill to make the wheels therein mentioned, according to the process of manufacture therein mentioned?

"3. Whether the process of manufacture described in the said specification, or any material part thereof, is not practically useful for the purposes set forth in the said letters patent?"—[The words in italics objected to by the pursuers.]

The case was called on 3d March, when the defenders objected to the form of the pursuers' issue, in respect it did not specify what the infringement was, nor which of the two things complained of had been done—whether the defenders had manufactured wheels according to the pursuers' patent, or whether they had merely used the product of such manufacture? The pursuers proposed to separate these two things, and amended issues were lodged as follows:—

"1. Whether, between the said 15th day of August 1845 and 25th November 1849, or during any part of said period, the defenders did, by themselves or others, wrongfully, and in contravention of the privileges conferred by the said letters patent, use the invention, described in the said letters patent and specification, in manufacturing wheels for engines, tenders, or other carriages, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers?

"2. Whether, between the said 15th day of August 1845 and 25th November 1849, or during any part of said period, the defenders did, by themselves or others, wrongfully, and in contravention of the privileges conferred by the said letters patent, use wheels for engines, tenders, or other carriages, in the manufacture of which the invention described in the said letters patent and specification was used, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers?"

F. Inglis, for the defenders;—In regard to the first issue it is extremely doubtful how far the manufacture of wheels is an infringement of the patent, as these are used or sold, therefore the words "for use," or some such words, ought to be added; and in regard to the second issue, in order to give it relevancy to this question, it is necessary not merely that the use of a manufactured wheel shall be said to be in contravention of the patent, but that it shall be shewn that the manufacture of these wheels by means of the said patent is of itself an infringement of the patent, for otherwise the use of such wheels would not be unlawful. Farther, there is no date given, and it is not such as entitles the pursuers to complain, the use of the wheels is not unlawful.

ORD PRESIDENT.—The words "in contravention of the letters patent" imply

No. 146. that the use was subsequent to that date. I am not for holding that it is incompetent for the pursuers to shew the date of the manufacture to have been subsequent to their assignation, the date of which they have given.

Anstruther v.
Mitchell and Cullen.

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Mackenzie
I.

The late John Macfarlane, and his brother-in-law John Fulton Anstruther as joint owners of the ship "Reginald Heber," were sued by Dobie and Company and their mandatory for L.439, the amount of an account for repairs on the ship, supplied by them at the Cape of Good Hope, where she put in to repair damages in the course of a voyage from Calcutta. Dobie and Company obtained decree in absence. Anstruther stated to Dobie's agent that he had no means to pay his share of this sum, and offered L.55, as having been supplied by his friends, for a discharge of the claim. This was not accepted. When the decree was about to be enforced against Macfarlane, he left Greenock, having previously granted an assignation of his household furniture to his sister, Mrs Mitchell, which bore to be in consideration of the payment by her of L.72, and also granted in her favour a bond and disposition in security over some property belonging to him in the Bay of Newark, near Port-Glasgow. He also uplifted his funds from the bank, and redeposited various sums on receipts in name of his sisters; and, in particular, a sum of L.500 was so deposited in the Royal Bank of Scotland at Glasgow. The sole partner of the firm of Dobie and Company died, his son and executor, Richard Paxton Dobie, used arrestment in the hands of the bank against Macfarlane, and raised an action of reduction, declarator, and furthcoming against him and Mrs Mitchell, concluding for reduction of the deposit-receipt for the sum of L.500, so far as it bore to be her property; for declarator, that the money was Macfarlane's property, and liable for his debts, and that the Royal Bank and their cashier should be decerned to pay the same to Dobie, or at least so much as should be necessary to satisfy his claim against Macfarlane. Mrs Mitchell defended the action; in 1853, while it was in dependence, Macfarlane died. After his death issues were adjusted for trial by jury. Before the date of the trial, Mr Cullen, Mrs Mitchell's agent, acting on the advice of counsel, paid the debt due to Dobie and Company, and took an assignation from Dobie in his own favour to the decree.

Macfarlane left a settlement, whereby his whole property was disposed to his only child Annabella Sinclair Macfarlane; of those appointed his executors and tutors and curators to his daughter, Anstruther alone accepted. Cullen charged Anstruther for payment of the sum in the decree assigned to him; but, in a suspension of the charge, he insisted in it only to the extent of the proportion effeiring to Anstruther's share in the "Reginald Heber," which Anstruther consigned. The case was suspended to allow an action to be brought to try the validity of the assignation; but warrant was granted to Cullen to uplift the consigned money, on finding caution to repeat, in the event of the assignation in his favour being reduced or found to be in trust for Mrs Mitchell, who, Anstruther said, had advanced the money with which Dobie and Company had been paid out of funds belonging to her brother. As his executor, he now raised an action of count and reckoning against Mrs Mitchell and her sister. He also raised the two actions now disposed of in his own name, as Macfarlane's executor, and in the name of Miss Macfarlane; to whom in both a curator ad litem was appointed. These actions were—1st, an action against Mr Cullen and Mrs Mitchell, concluding for declarator that the money with which Cullen paid the debt due to Dobie and Company was really a part of Macfarlane's funds advanced through him for that purpose by Mrs Mitchell. That neither Mrs Mitchell nor Cullen was entitled to uplift from the pursuer as an individual, or the representative of Macfarlane, the sums contained in the assignation, and that they should be decerned to transfer the same to the pursuer, as Macfarlane's executor, and deliver up to him the decree at Dobie and Company's instance;

 Cullen.

I. In the action of declarator it was alleged that John Macfarlane and his sisters had, with the view of defeating Dobie and Company's diligence, or of throwing the whole of the debt due to Dobie and Company by him and the pursuer as joint owners of the "Reginald Heber" upon the pursuer alone, uplifted a sum of L.1200, lying in the Greenock Bank at his credit, and paid it into the Royal Bank at Glasgow, on a deposit-receipt in name of the defender, Mrs Mitchell, and her sister; by subsequent drafts and payments the sum deposited in the bank varied; he reduced it to L.1040, and afterwards paid in various other sums. After his departure from Scotland, the defender, Mrs Mitchell, and her sister, shifted the money from one bank to another, sometimes taking receipts in name of both, and sometimes only in Mrs Mitchell's name. That the money paid in satisfaction of the debt to Dobie and Company was truly part of this money belonging to Macfarlane, and the assignation in favour of Cullen was taken in his name for the fraudulent purpose of enabling Mrs Mitchell again to possess herself of the money she had so advanced.

Cullen pleaded;—This action was incompetent, as an attempt summarily to deprive him of what was effectually vested in him by a valid and formal assignation constituting him the assignee of the proper creditor, which could not be set aside, except by a reduction or declarator of trust. It was implied by the judgment of the Court in the process of suspension, at Anstruther's instance, of the charge given on the assignation, that it could not be impugned or set aside unless actually reduced, or found to be in trust for Mrs Mitchell, the alleged debtor to Macfarlane's estate. The averments of the pursuers were not relevant to support the conclusions of the summons against Cullen, whose position was that of an onerous and bona fide assignee, of which the assignation, while unreduced, was probatio probata. Even in a declarator of trust, the terms of the assignation and the consideration therefor could only be redargued by the writ or oath of the assignee. And in respect the funds, in consideration of which the assignation was granted, having been truly advanced by Cullen, the action was groundless.

The same grounds of defence were stated for Mrs Mitchell. It was pleaded for her besides;—The allegations were not relevant, because, even supposing she had, as custodier of her brother's funds, applied part of them in paying her brother's debt, the consequence would be the extinction of that debt. She might be liable to account in a proper action, but to that end this action was wholly inapplicable.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—(After repelling a plea stated by the defenders, but not insisted in, that the pursuer being neither decerned nor confirmed as Macfarlane's executor, had no title to sue; but reserving the defenders' right to insist on confirmation before extract)—
 "Finds that there is no incompetency in the conclusions of the summons: Finds that the averments of the pursuers are relevant to support these conclusions: Repels the defence so far as inconsistent with these findings, and decerns: Appoints the cause to be put to the roll, in order that parties may be heard as to further procedure, and, in the meantime, reserves all questions of expenses." *

* "NOTE.—There seems no doubt of the title of the pursuers to insist in this action, and the objection on this point was not pressed in the discussion before the Lord Ordinary.

"What the defenders maintained was, 1st, That as the summons contains no

The defenders reclaimed. In addition to the argument urged before the Lord Ordinary, they pleaded;—That as there had been already brought into Court an action of count and reckoning at Anstruther's instance against Mrs Mitchell, the present action was unnecessary for any purpose he could have in view.

Anstruther v.
Mitchell and
Cullen.

The pursuer answered;—This was a process for declarator that the pursuer, as Macfarlane's representative, had right to what was conveyed by the assignation to Cullen. The action was brought in that form, because the money in respect of which the assignation was granted was part of Macfarlane's funds. It depended on the circumstances of each case, whether it was necessary, in order to displace a party who stood on a probative deed, to have recourse to a reduction or declarator of trust.¹ If the pursuer set forth circumstances in which he was entitled to a right, that right might be competently sued for by a declarator.² In this case a declarator was the most proper form of action. The pursuer had no interest to reduce the assignation, it being a good conveyance from Dobie and Company. His interest was to have the nature of Cullen's right under the deed declared, and him (Cullen) decerned to transfer it to the pursuer.³

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—While the details of the facts which the pursuer proposes to prove are singular and complicated, the competency of the action depends, in my opinion, on one simple fact—that Cullen holds an absolute and unqualified assignation, ex facie regular and complete, vesting him in the right to the debt owing to, and decree obtained therefor by, Dobie and Company.

The pursuer Anstruther was a joint debtor under that decree. Cullen having, as the assignation at least bears, paid the debt, charged Anstruther on that decree. The procedure which followed is set forth by the pursuer. By our interlocutor of reduction of the assignation, and no declarator of trust, the conclusions to have it found that the pursuer Anstruther, as executor of Macfarlane, has a right to the debt, and that the defenders are bound to make it over to him, are incompetent; and 2d, That, at all events, the averments of the pursuers are not relevant to support the conclusions of the action.

“As to the first point, the pursuers state that a reduction of the assignation would not accomplish their object; that this would have the effect of leaving the debt with Dobie; and that they are entitled to have it made over to them for the benefit of Macfarlane's estate. They further contend that there was properly no relation of trust between the defender Cullen and Macfarlane, and that a declarator of trust would be inapplicable and out of place. In support of their views as to the competency of the conclusions, the pursuers refer to the judgment of the Court in the case of Gillies, 11th February 1846, where law-agents, who had acquired property with the funds of their constituent, were held to have done so for his benefit, and were ordained to convey it over to his representatives, without any reduction of the title.

“As at present advised, the Lord Ordinary does not see any objection to the competency of the conclusions, if the facts averred by the pursuers are relevant to support them.—(His Lordship here narrated the facts of the case).

“According to the view which the Lord Ordinary takes of the pursuers' case, it seems to be rested mainly on two grounds: 1st, That Dobie's debt was paid, not from any money belonging to the defenders, or either of them, but with funds forming part of the estate of the late John Macfarlane; and 2d, That the assignation was taken by the defenders in the name of Cullen, fraudulently, for the purpose of defeating the legal rights of the pursuers as Macfarlane's representatives. The case appears to be a very special one; and although the Lord Ordinary has held it to be attended with difficulty, he has come to the conclusion that the defences stated to the competency and relevancy of the action are not well founded, and ought to be repelled.”

Mar. 10, 1857.
Anstruther v.
Mitchell and
Cullen.

We certainly went far enough in Anstruther's favour in taking that course. I will not say that no other forms of action than those referred to in this interlocutor could have been raised, if under such other form of action the results contemplated by the Court could be obtained. But the object which the Court held to be necessary is very clearly stated, and if the pursuer has, in order to avoid, as he thought, difficulties in following the plain course, or from some predilection for the sort of action he has chosen to institute, thought fit to devise a different course from that pointed out by the interlocutor, which shall be found to be wholly insufficient, he has himself to blame. The object which the Court held to be necessary was to set aside the title.

The assignation is before the Court. It is distinct, regular, and complete. It is, therefore, a legal title in the person of Cullen to the debt, and to the decree. Now let us see what is the conclusion of the summons:—"And further, it ought and should be found and declared, by decree foresaid, that the foresaid sums of money belong to the pursuer, the said John Fulton Anstruther, as executor foresaid, and that he is the only party entitled to uplift and receive the same: And the said defenders ought and should be decerned and ordained to assign and transfer the said sums to the pursuer, as executor foresaid, and to deliver to him the said extract-decree at Dobie and Company's instance, to be used by him as executor foresaid, as his own proper writ and evident in all time coming."

It is not set forth, that as the money was Macfarlane's, therefore the assignation should be set aside and reduced; but that there is no title in Mrs Mitchell to uplift and to sue for and discharge the same, nor in Cullen. In Mrs Mitchell certainly not. But in Cullen there is a title, and the novelty is, asking us to find that a man has no title when the title is clear and indisputable, and is not challenged in the action.

Again, it is concluded that it should be found that the sums belong to the pursuer as Macfarlane's executor, and that he is the only person entitled to uplift them. Now, as to one-half of the sums, being Macfarlane's proportion of them, there can be no doubt, if paid out of his funds, that the conclusion should have been a totally different one on the pursuer's own notion of the case. Dobie being paid, granted a discharge, and therefore the debt due by Macfarlane, if paid out of his funds, was at an end, and no sum could be drawn out of Macfarlane's funds by the pursuer on pretence of that debt. The conclusion as to this half should have been, that having in truth been paid out of Macfarlane's funds, the debt was extinguished against him by such payment, and could not be in Cullen or any one else,—not that the right to uplift that half was in the pursuer. Indeed, this conclusion seems to proceed on the notion that Cullen had actually drawn and recovered that half. From the pursuer himself, no doubt, as an individual, there was to be drawn one-half of the debt wholly paid, as he says, out of Macfarlane's funds, by himself, as Macfarlane's executor—a very singular fact in the case.

But, according to the pursuer's statement, out of Macfarlane's estate nothing could be drawn. Hence the greater reason to reduce the title Cullen had improperly (as said) got to that half of the debt; but it was whimsical to conclude that the pursuer, as Macfarlane's executor, was to have the right to recover from Macfarlane's estate what was paid out of Macfarlane's funds, and, therefore, could not at all subsist as a debt. This is very strange. But the remainder of this part of the summons is still more curious.

It demands that it should be found that the defenders should assign and transfer the sums of money so alleged to have been paid to the pursuer, without reference to the actual application of them—of, as he says, Macfarlane's funds to pay Macfarlane's debt. This implies that Cullen has got the sums. How the pursuer is to get the sums not yet recovered I do not understand. His proper conclusion, even in this form of action, should have been, that they were truly applied to pay Macfarlane's debt,—not that they are to be recovered and uplifted—I own I do not comprehend from whom—except one-half from himself. But, at all events, to Dobie's right to recover the same there is a regular assignation,—standing directly opposed to any such notion of the pursuer's right. Further, there is no conclusion that Cullen should assign his right under the assignation to the pursuer,—that would have brought out the fatal objection to this form of action too prominently,—but only to the sums; and then “to deliver to the pursuer the extract-decree at Dobie’s instance, to be used by him as executor foresaid, as his own proper writ and evident.” This is the most curious conclusion I ever saw. The decree is assigned to Cullen. There is no demand that Cullen should assign it to the pursuer, but only to deliver it to the pursuer. What good could that do without an assignation? The pursuer is one of the defenders under that decree. Mere manual possession of a decree will not enable a defender to use it against another defender. But his own statement is, that the whole debt, for one-half of which he was himself liable, was already paid truly out of the other debtor’s funds. Then how is he to use this decree? He cannot pay the debt himself. It is paid. He cannot get an assignation to it from Dobie’s mandatory (supposing him still to be such), for he has assigned it, and proof of the reduction of that assignation the pursuer could not produce, and the creditor who was paid and assigned durst and would not assign again. Then what is the meaning of this mere delivery of the decree? It would not enable him formally, as Macfarlane’s executor, to sue himself as debtor in one-half the debt. And if he succeeds in a proper action to establish that the debt was paid out of Macfarlane’s funds, he may repay his half very easily without any other title. It is a very significant fact to prove that the pursuer wished to avoid some difficulty, that he did not even conclude that Cullen should assign the decree to him. In the way of any such demand, no doubt, stood the assignation to Cullen. That he did not choose to reduce; and yet, while that assignation stands, he calls on Cullen to deliver up a decree, to be used by himself, the only title to use which would still remain assigned to Cullen.

Anstruther v.
Cullen.

Even on the notion on which this action proceeds, the conclusions are quite inapplicable to the facts averred, and cannot be relevantly deduced from these facts. However, the main and radical objection to the action is the incompetency of trying to alter and take away rights vested by a regular deed, without any reduction of that deed, or a declarator of trust.

The incompetency of the action is made the more manifest by the issue which the pursuer proposes to take.

That issue, clearly, is one which could only be given in a reduction.

The argument stated in the outset of the discussion, viz., that a reduction would not have answered the pursuer’s object, as he did not wish to set aside the payment to Dobie, and so revive the debt, was plainly founded on a misconception; for it would not have been at all necessary to carry the reduction that length. On the contrary, founding on the fact that payment was made, as averred, out of the funds of Macfarlane, the only thing to reduce was the assignation taken by Cullen in his own favour.

I am not at all disposed to countenance the second proposition so anxiously contended for by the pursuer, that by simply stating the matters of fact to be proved in any ordinary action, you were entitled to obtain a declarator of right without any reduction of the deeds vesting rights in another party, and so take away in that loose manner the rights under such deed. While it was very confidently said that this was common in practice, no case whatever could be produced sanctioning such a course. And the two cases referred to were conspicuously against the pursuer’s proposition. I could find no example of such a style of summons in the Juridical Styles.

The pursuer seems to have taken up an erroneous idea of the action referred to in Lord Stair, iv. 4, 1, as to the trial of questions of right in regard to heritable property. It often happens in a competition of titles, that there is no necessity for any reduction at all, and that the case involves no question as to any fraud or illegality in the titles of the defender. The whole case may depend on priority of right—sufficiency of prescriptive possession on one title, against a prior title, or of possession as part and pertinent,—or on consolidation, and innumerable other similar questions.

But this is an action based on fraud—fraud, in the concoction and preparation of the deed, which is itself quite regular and complete. That deed vests absolutely a complete right to the debt in question in the person of the assignee. To take

No. 147. away the right so created, reduction is necessary, or a declarator of trust, which I think could be quite relevantly libelled in the facts of the case. But on allegations of fraud the pursuer might have a wider course of proof in a reduction than in the other form of action.

Mar. 10, 1857.
Anstruther v.
Mitchell and
Cullen.

The present action is in my opinion quite incompetent. There is no distinction in not only the practice, but in the principles of the law of Scotland, more firmly established than the difference between an ordinary action and reduction. It would be very dangerous to allow new forms to rush in upon that distinction, which is founded on the broad ground, that deeds in themselves regular and complete must receive effect until reduced, and the right thereby validly constituted cut down and taken away in that established form of procedure. Such a case as that of the pursuer might as competently be stated ope exceptionis as in this ordinary action, and all our rules, most valuable, as well as established from the earliest period, would be at once overturned, and the forms of procedure thrown into utter confusion. I am not disposed to give the pursuer the benefit of such innovations.

But, further, the pursuer has no special case to state, in order to make out the necessity of departure, in this instance, from the fixed principles applicable to deeds giving one party a complete title, but which the other wishes to set aside, so as to take away the right so disposed. He has chosen, without cause, to run his head against a pretty stiff and well built wall.

I suppose that the pursuer has a reason for adopting this course, in order to avoid some difficulty he foresees in his proof, or to give him a greater command over the decree, in which he is a joint debtor along with Macfarlane. But, in any view, the Court ought not to assist.

The case of Gillies, 11th February 1846, is misapprehended by the Lord Ordinary; but it is so complicated that one is not surprised that there should be mistake about it. As it has had obviously much influence on the Lord Ordinary's mind, it is important to explain the case, which underwent much discussion in this Division. Gillies, who had been a private soldier, connected originally with Glasgow, had employed M'Lauchlan and M'Pherson to attend to some claims he had, and to recover and make good his right to some heritable property. They had intrusions with some funds, as he said, belonging to him, while he was in the Peninsula and afterwards, and the accounts had not been adjusted. He raised an action of count and reckoning against their representatives, which had no reference to any heritable property at all. This action was raised on the 10th April. Whether he got further information I do not know; but on the 30th of April he raised a reduction and declarator of trust as to some heritable property, the title to which was in the heirs of M'Lauchlan. He averred that the firm having made good his right to some heritable property, pretended to sell it to a person of the name of Rodger at a small price, which they credited him with, but then took the title in their own favour, being of much greater value at the time, and of increased value at the time of this discovery. He then raised a reduction and declarator of trust. The facts might have been stated in a way very similar to the pursuer's allegations here. The action there was not, in the least, of the character supposed by the Lord Ordinary. But the origin of the mistake is easily explained. The defenders in the reduction gave in a minute in the Outer-House, for the purpose of trying more necessary to adopt the form of reduction, in order to get, in the real foundation of the case, grounds for sweeping away the regular deed. No. 147.

LORD MURRAY.—We have been told by both parties that this is a case turning on the form of process, but we have been little assisted in considering it by any decisions or recent authorities which have been referred to. It has thrown me back on my earlier studies, and the practice of the Court from my first acquaintance with it, more than half a century ago. Mar. 10, 1857. Anstruther v. Mitchell and Cullen.

The Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of the 13th of January, after repelling the objections to the title of the pursuer, has two important findings :—(1.) That there is no incompetency in the conclusions of the summons ; (2.) That the averments of the pursuers are relevant to support these conclusions. I shall arrange the observations which I have to submit to the Court under these two heads. Under the (first), I shall consider the summons, and the condescendence, which forms a part of the summons.

(First,) Whether this action is competent in form ?

(Second,) Whether it is relevant to authorise the conclusions deduced from what is set forth in the summons, and condescendence, which forms a part of it ?

The summons brought at the instance of John Fulton Anstruther, executor under a deed of settlement by the deceased John Macfarlane and his wife and the only surviving child—and as disponent—and as accepting curator to Miss Macfarlane. The facts are set forth in the condescendence, which, according to the recent Act of Parliament, forms part of the summons.

The first point is, whether there is any incompetency in the conclusions of the summons ; and I have not, in considering this case, been able to find out that there is, and therefore I agree with the Lord Ordinary. According to what is set forth in the summons, the pursuer does not maintain that the defender Mr Cullen is a trustee for him or for Macfarlane's family. If he is a trustee at all, according to these allegations, he is a trustee against them, and he is engaged, as Mrs Mitchell's agent, in a design to take from Macfarlane's family what truly belongs to them, and preserve it for Mrs Mitchell, for whom he is acting. I do not pretend to say how such a case would be tried in England—whether it would be tried as a conspiracy, or by an action of trover, or on the case, or whether it would be thought more appropriate for proceedings in Chancery.

In the discussions which take place in the Court of Appeal we have not always the full benefit which might arise in the full consideration of our forms. There is one most orthodox class of English lawyers, who adopt to its full extent that everything in the law of England is perfect. These are usually those whose practice is confined to the Courts of Common Law, and who talk almost as contemptuously of the proceedings in Chancery as they do of Scotch Courts. That seems to have been the tone adopted by Sir Fletcher Norton, a great English common lawyer. Yet others maintained that there is more property disposed of in Chancery in a week than in all the Courts of Common Law in a year. Our Scotch law forms are something intermediate between the precise forms of the Common Law Courts in England and the proceedings in Chancery, which are of a more indefinite nature, though I do not pretend to be able to describe them.

It was the great object of the bill introduced by Lord Rutherford to preserve all that is good in our forms, and exclude what was indefinite, and also to supersede, to a great degree, discussions which frequently took place in our Courts with regard to the media concludendi, less necessary. With the view of promoting that bill I published a letter to Lord Rutherford in the year 1850 ; and I believe it is generally acknowledged Lord Rutherford rendered a great service to the country by the statute he introduced.

In a question of form and competency I have always found Lord Stair the best and most satisfactory, for the comprehensive views he had ; and in order to go fully through this case, it would be necessary not only to consider many parts of his excellent work in the 4th tit. of the 4th book, but also various parts of the 6th tit., Declarators of Trust, and the 16th tit., Declarators to insist with certifications and actions cogitationis causa, which, as Lord Stair observes, are declaratory, because they do not conclude for payment, and the effect of the decree is only to declare what debt was due by the defunct.

No. 147. It is also necessary to consider the different passages of Lord Stair's writings in which he refers to the effect of fraud.

Mar. 10, 1857.
Anstruther v.
Mitchell and
Cullen.

In the 9th tit. of the first book, sec. 10, Lord Stair specially refers to the edict de dolo malo, which he quotes in these terms:—"Quæ dolo malo facta esse dicuntur, si de his rebus alia actio non erit, et justa causa esse videbitur, iudicium dabo." Lord Stair observes, "that the action was personal, and so reached no further than the person committing the fraud, and not in rem reaching the thing, if lawfully it came to any other not partaking of the fraud."

Lord Stair, therefore, clearly held, that if the party was cognizant of the transaction, he was liable to the extent of the subject, whatever it was.

Lord Stair concludes his disquisition of this subject by observing—"We have in this also resumed the sentence of the civil law, because it is most equitable and expedient, and therefore is generally followed by our custom."

Lord Stair then enters at some length into the proof of fraud, and it appears to have been in his time somewhat arbitrary. He says, "it will be hardly presumed in a person of entire fame and honest life; but more easily in those who have been found to defraud, or are so reputed."

After referring to various cases his Lordship observes—"A discharge was found null (as to an assigny) of a bond granted by one brother to another, the discharge being of the same date with the bond, which could have no construction, but that the brother, by assigning the bond, might deceive, unless there were instructed a just cause of that date."

The case of a party and agent would not have been considered by Lord Stair as entitled to peculiar favour.

Lord Stair commences the 12th section by stating, that under fraud simulation and collusion are comprehended. Simulation, he observes, occurs mainly in two cases:—in gifts of cash and liferent, and in dispositions relativa possessione; and that collusion occurs chiefly where the debtor or common author opposes some creditors and concurs with others, and favours one or other class.

He sums up the subject in the 14th section, where he says—"Fraud gives remedy by reparation to all that are damaged thereby, against the actor of the fraud, either by annulling of the contract or other deed elicited or induced by fraud, at the option of the injured." Actor, here, must equally be extended to actors where more than one are said to be parties engaged in accomplishing the fraud.

The fraud of an author has been found competent against a singular successor in personal rights or in incomplete real rights of land, even although that author had an infestment, since that infestment was null, as flowing from a person not infest. This was so held in the case of Burden v. Whitefoord of Dunduff, 4th June 1742; and a similar judgment seems to have been pronounced in the case of Dunlop v. Cruikshank, also reported by Lord Eleanore.

I have come to the conclusion, therefore, from consideration of all the cases which seem to me to have a bearing on this case, that the Lord Ordinary is right. I hold that any fraud may be reached by a declarator setting forth the acts of fraud.

I find the second question—whether the conclusions of this action are relevant—attended with greater difficulty. I have no doubt, in any case where acts of fraud are set forth, the action may be maintained, and such acts may be proved by the law of Scotland; but it is a very difficult question often to say whether the acts of fraud, if proved, will authorise the conclusions of the summons; and it is attended with peculiar difficulty until the proof is made. The subject of discussion before me times the subject of discussion before me that the media concludendi in the summons; and here I must import the whole which here read the statement which was the assignation was taken in Cullen's was truly paid by Mrs Mitchell from the assignation was taken in Cullen's name by raising diligence on the decree and herself, to the prejudice of Macfarlane Dobie and Company).

It appears to me, that if these facts they would fully authorise a conclusion but I have some doubt whether they sufficiently authorise a conclusion that it belongs to the pursuer. I rather think they do, and so agree with the Lord Ordinary on that second point, for there seems sufficient media for finding that the money belonged to some person or another, and if not to Mr Cullen or Mrs Mitchell, the legal conclusion seems to be that they belong to Anstruther, his executor, or to Macfarlane's daughter, and heir, for whom a tutor ad litem has very properly been appointed. Anstruther v. Mitchell and Cullen.

While I have stated the views I entertain with regard to this action, I fully acknowledge that the practice for many years has tended very much to such actions having conclusions of reduction or of trust.

A conclusion of reduction adds great power and scope to a summons, and declarator of trust affords very great assistance to the Court.

I do not understand why the summons did not contain conclusions of a reductive nature and also of declarator of trust, as alternative. Neither do I see any objection in a case so very peculiar as this (and where Mrs Mitchell's conduct seems to have been very extraordinary, if not tortuous), to allowing an action of reduction with conclusions declaratory of trust, to be repeated. It must be satisfactory to both parties to have the case placed on a footing in which all the points would be properly probed and fairly decided.

LORD WOOD absent.

LORD COWAN.—This is not a case where a probative written title is attempted to be put aside as of no effect by way of exception. The very object of this action is to have the deed of assignation founded on judicially held unavailing to the defenders, as fraudulently concocted, and obtained in prejudice of the pursuer's rights; and the only question regards the competency of the form in which its legal efficacy is challenged.

Besides the statements in the 20th article of the condescendence, in which the ground of action is set forth, the facts alleged in the prior articles are important. The scheme devised between Macfarlane and his sister Mrs Mitchell to avoid payment of Dobie & Co.'s debt, and by which she obtained possession of his funds,—the proceedings taken by Dobie and Co., by whom this assignation was granted, against Mrs Mitchell, as holder of those funds,—and the settlement of the case on the eve of trial by payment of Dobie & Co.'s debt on condition of its being assigned, more especially the letter of the defender Cullen, acting as agent of Mrs Mitchell,—these are all very material to be kept in view as introductory to the 20th article.

Such being the device fraudulently got up as alleged, and in which the two defenders were participant, what we have to consider is, not whether the most apt and expedient form of action has been adopted, but whether the form actually adopted, be incompetent.

1. It is contended that there should have been reductive conclusions, fitted to set aside the ex facie valid title by assignation in Cullen. But, (1.) this is not a challenge by the granter of a deed, because of its having been obtained from him by fraud, and being, therefore, reducible, in which case, unless the deed be ex facie null, reduction might be requisite.

Neither (2.) is it a challenge of a deed fraudulently concocted between the granter and grantee, to the prejudice of third parties, and wholly voidable on that ground.

Further, (3.) it is not a deed against which the alleged fraud of the grantee is urged to the effect of having it wholly set aside; for, as an assignation, the deed is proposed to be preserved and made use of in order to give effect, not to the fraudulent views of the defenders, but to the just rights of the pursuers as those may be found judicially.

And, lastly, the deed is not in reference to heritage or real property, or one of a series of connected titles, but has regard to a moveable subject, fraudulently, as alleged, put into the person of the defender, when the right under it truly belonged to the pursuers.

Looking to the peculiarities of the case, therefore, the relative position of the pursuers and defenders, the nature of the fraud averred as the ground of action, and the limited purpose and object in the view of the pursuers—I do not think, if the summons be otherwise well laid, that the absence of reductive conclusions can be held to render the action incompetent.

The necessity of reductive proceedings more frequently occurs for consideration,

No. 147. when it is doubtful whether the defence can be properly stated ope exceptionis; and whether, to get the better of the ground of action, it is not necessary for the defender to insist in a recissory action; and not, as here, whether the pursuer must institute such proceedings to obviate the effect of a deed founded on by the defender to exclude the action. The principle applicable to such a case is well stated by Lord Gillies in his opinion in Gibb and M'Donald v. Sir Paul Baghott, 1st June 1827. Applying that principle to this case, I do not think that the pursuer's action is incompetent from the want of reductive conclusions. And this view appears to me supported by the passage in Mr Bell's Commentaries, ii. 194, where he treats of the form of action proper to be adopted in challenging preferable securities in bankruptcy.

Anstruther v.
Mitchell and
Cullen.

2. Esto that reduction is not necessary, it is objected that the declaratory conclusions of the summons are inept and insufficient, inasmuch as they are not declaratory of trust, which alternatively is contended to have been indispensable.

This objection proceeds upon a mistaken view as to the relative position of the parties. The relation of truster and trustee was never constituted, and does not subsist between the pursuers and either of the defenders. There may be such relation between the two defenders, but it is that which subsists between two parties acting together to commit the fraud which it is the object of the pursuers to have found of no effect as against them. And as to any allegation of a trust having been constituted by the deceased John Macfarlane in the person of his sister Mrs Mitchell, there is no proper case of that sort in the facts stated in the record. On the contrary, the averment is that the funds in Mrs Mitchell's hands were well employed by her in payment of the debt of Dobie and Co., and the plea is that the funds belonging to Macfarlane's estate having been so employed, that estate alone is interested in the assignation of the debt. Had the action been directed solely against the defender Mrs Mitchell, the declaratory conclusions, when taken along with the petitory, are so expressed as to bring out the true point in the case, and properly state the pursuer's demand. The defender is told, in so many words:—"You have got part of my (pursuer's) estate, which you have fraudulently appropriated to yourself, and you must assign it over to me, the true owner." The case of Gillies, referred to by the Lord Ordinary, supports this view. In like manner, where a tutor or trustee has fraudulently taken rights in his own name belonging to his constituent, action will lie against him to account and to transfer those rights to the true owner.—Vide case of Wilsons, 1789, D. 16,376. And this being so, the use of the defender Cullen's name in the transaction cannot affect the question as to the form of the action. He is the mere hand or instrument, according to the allegation, employed by his client to accomplish her fraudulent purpose. The conclusions are such as to put in issue the fraud alleged to have been practised. If no fraud be proved there is an end of the case. It seems to me that no just or equitable right or interest in either of the defenders can be affected by our sustaining the action as laid.

On the whole, therefore, I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to.

The Court adhered.

It having been agreed that the cause should be disposed of without a remit to the Lord Ordinary, parties were allowed to lodge issues, for trial by jury. The following issues were adjusted:—

"It being admitted that, upon the 23d day of May 1855, Wallace Walker, merchant in Liverpool, mandatory and attorney of Richard Paxton Dobie, merchant, Cape Town, Cape of Good Hope, executed in favour of the defender Cullen the assignation No. of process:

"1st, Whether the several sums of money therein specified, bearing to have been paid by the defender Cullen to the said Wallace Walker, were not paid by the said defender from his own proper funds, but were paid by the defender Mitchell, or by the defender Cullen, on her account, with funds furnished by her, forming part of the estate of the late John Macfarlane, sometime shipmaster in Port-Glasgow?

"2d, Whether the said assignation was taken by the defender Mitchell in the name of the defender Cullen, fraudulently, and for the purpose of defeating the legal rights of the pursuers as the representatives of the said John Macfarlane?"

Anstruther v.
Mitchell and
Cullen.

II. In the action of reduction, it was alleged by the pursuer, in his condescendence (stat. 4), that Macfarlane was, in the course of the year 1852, threatened with diligence at the instance of Dobie and Company; and with the view of protecting his estate from their diligence, he conveyed his whole estate to the defender Mrs Mitchell, and to another sister, ostensibly for their own behoof, but really in trust for himself; in particular, he granted the assignation of his furniture, under reduction, ostensibly in consideration of L.72 paid to him by the defender.—(Stat. 5) the transaction narrated in the deed was fictitious, no sale of the furniture having been made, and no price paid therefor; the assignation was granted under the apprehension that the furniture might be attached under Dobie and Company's diligence, and to protect it therefrom. It was accordingly understood and agreed, between Macfarlane and the defender, that she was to hold the furniture in trust for him, and for his behoof, and to reconvey the same when required, but she now fraudulently pretended that she had purchased the furniture from Macfarlane, and paid him the price thereof, and that the assignation was valid.

The assignation bore to be granted in consideration of L.72, 3s. 10d., paid by Mrs Mitchell. It conveyed to her, her heirs, executors, and assignees, all the granter's household furniture, and made reference to an inventory and valuation thereof by a licensed appraiser, wherein the furniture was valued at L.72, 3s. 10d.

The defender pleaded;—I. The pursuer had no title to sue, being neither decerned nor confirmed executor to the late John Macfarlane, and there being no evidence that the other parties named as executors had declined to accept. II. The reasons of reduction were not relevant, in respect—1st, it was not alleged that John Macfarlane was insolvent, or in any way restrained in the disposal of his property; 2d, there was no averment of fraud by the defender or by Macfarlane; and 3d, the statements which resolved into a declarator of trust were irrelevant, as they did not amount to a ground of reduction, while there was no conclusion for declarator of trust. III. The object imputed to Macfarlane in executing the deed was jure tertii to the pursuers, and one in which they had no interest. IV. The transaction was a bona fide sale for a full and adequate price, paid at the time simul ac semel with the delivery of the furniture, and the assignation was confirmed by Macfarlane having allowed the transaction to rest upon it undisturbed till his death.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the objection to the pursuers' title is not now insisted in by the defender, and repels the same, the pursuers being bound to produce a confirmation before extract: Farther, repels the second and third pleas in law for the defender, and decerns: Appoints the case to be put to the roll, in order that parties may be heard as to further procedure." *

* "NOTE.—This action has been brought by the pursuers as representing the late John Macfarlane, to reduce an assignation of household furniture, granted by him to the defender, Mrs Mitchell, his sister, on the 24th September 1852, and to obtain from the defender restitution of the furniture, or payment of its value.

"The pursuers' allegations are denied by the defender, and her defence on the merits is, 'that the transaction as to the furniture was a bona fide sale by John Macfarlane to the defender, for a full and adequate price, paid at the time simul et cum with the delivery of the furniture.'

Anstruther v.
Mitchell and
Cullen.

In the single bills an objection to the reclaiming note, as not having been presented within ten days of the interlocutor being pronounced, was repelled.

The defender reclaimed. When the case was advised,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question raised by this reclaiming note is of the greatest importance in point of practice, but still more of principle. The interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary appears to me to proceed on an erroneous view of the object and effect of the Statute 1696, respecting the proof of trusts. Latterly, the counsel for the pursuer seemed to wish to make out that the assignation which he challenged was not a trust, according to his view, in the person of Mrs Mitchell. The attempt was vain. No other view can be taken of his case than that pointedly and unqualifiedly averred on record as his ground of action; and the facts stated show that the case is an averment of trust, even if that had not been averred to be the character of the alleged transaction. In articles 4 and 5 he distinctly sets forth that various dispositions and transactions were carried through by the deceased John Macfarlane (in whose right the pursuer, as executor, is), to vest in his sister, the defender, parts of his funds and effects, in order to exclude the diligence of a particular creditor, but still, seemingly, to be held for his behoof. The general plan by which the pursuer and another sister were to hold his property in trust for him is narrated; and article 5 states that the assignation was fictitious to defeat diligence, and that the furniture was only to be held in trust, and reconveyed when demanded. This is the ground of action. This is the allegation which the pursuer undertakes to prove. Then, beyond all dispute, this is a plain averment of a trust, and nothing else or less. In the close of the section he says the defender fraudulently pretends that the assignation was onerous. Now this the more proves that the issue he raises is trust or onerosity in the original transaction. In every case of alleged trust, of course, there is fraud in the party obtaining the deed in trust (if that shall be proved) attempting to take advantage of the ex facie character of the deed, and to maintain an unqualified right of property under it. But that allegation of an improper use of the deed (according to the pursuers' averments) in no degree alters the character of the case, which is an averment of a trust against an absolute deed of conveyance. Neither can it, in my opinion, affect the character of the case, or render any other action than a declarator of trust, or an equivalent declarator, competent to establish such a case, that the pursuer avers that the object of the alleged trust on the part of the granter was to deprive creditors of the means of getting at his property. It may have been very wrong in him to resort to such a device, and wrong in a sister or friend to aid him so far as to agree to hold his property in trust for such a purpose. But still a trust it was on such an averment, and a trust must be established in order to take away the absolute right created by the deed. It might perhaps be thought that the only effect of such a statement of the intended fraud against creditors should be to bar the party or his representative from recovering property which he had passed from himself, with such a fraudulent purpose. But, then, if he is right in averring that the property was really taken in trust, to exclude him, on a personal exception, from proving the trust, would enable the defender, against the truth of the case, to retain as her own, property which belongs to another. Accordingly no such exception was pleaded by the defender. In truth, the object of the alleged trust does not in any manner alter the character of the case to be proved, viz., the establishment of a trust.

“ Apart from this defence on the merits, it is objected by the defenders that the statements of the pursuer are not relevant to support the conclusions of the action, chiefly because it is brought in the form of a reduction, and not of a declarator of trust. Now, if it had been necessary to keep up the assignation as a link in the title, a declarator of trust might perhaps have been the appropriate remedy. But as this was not requisite or advisable, and the assignation purported to be a deed of sale by Macfarlane to the defender for a full and adequate price, it is thought the proper course was to challenge the transaction by a reduction, and to follow this up with petitory conclusions for restitution of the furniture, or payment of its value. Looking at the grounds of action as set forth in the condempnations, the Lord Ordinary has no doubt that they are relevant to support the conclusions of the summons; he has therefore repelled the 2d and 3d pleas in law for the defender.”

Anstruther v.
Cullen.

The argument of the pursuer latterly took a turn which, I own, I did not understand. It was said—this assignation purports to be a sale for a price. No price was paid—it was not a sale. It gave no title, it was said, against the granter—it was null and void from the first; and the granter might have reclaimed the property next day. To be sure; but how? This question was jumped over in the argument, and never answered when put to the pursuer. This process shows that it could only be done by action, and then the point is—what is it that, after all, the party has to prove who says the transaction was not such as the deed declares, but that the defender holds for him—that is, in trust; and how is that to be established in a declarator of trust? The truth is, the plea that the deed was no title of property against the granter, proceeded on a strange jumble of things. To maintain that a regular absolute assignation is not a title against the granter, is a contradiction in terms. It must be set aside somehow, and so the pursuer has felt. But title was confounded with real and true right, and when the right to the property is proved, in the proper action, then the title will fall. But the proposition that an ex facie absolute assignation, bearing to be for onerous causes, is no title against the granter, is certainly the most singular novelty which could well occur, for it happens that the deed actually divests the granter till he establishes that the true right remains still in him, and that the deed was only a trust.

The pursuer has proposed to accomplish this result by a reduction, but his ground of action is distinctly and in terms the averment of trust, and that is the plea he puts on record.

The pursuer's next step is to maintain, that as this is a reduction, he does not lie within the prescription as to the mode of proof in the statute, and hence, as Mr. Clerk distinctly avowed, his object is to have an issue to be tried by a jury. Really this proposal, put alongside of article 5, brings out most conspicuously the fallacy of the whole argument of the pursuer.

It is a sacred principle of the law of Scotland (Lord Gillies said in Scott v. Miller), "that a trust cannot be proved by parole, either under a declarator of trust or otherwise."

This simple action of reduction appears to me to be quite incompetent. I do not say that an action, although not called a declarator of trust, may not be libelled in such a form as to embrace a conclusion to establish a trust, and then the case is in shape, and the Court can declare the right ex facie absolute to be only a trust. But in one form or other, and in a distinct and pointed form, there must be a conclusion under which the Court can declare a trust.

I do not proceed on the narrow and somewhat artificial ground that the reduction is incompetent because it seeks to set aside the deed, in common words of law, to have been from the beginning null and void, whereas, on the pursuer's showing it was intended to be a conveyance, but in trust, and was therefore at first valid. It does not follow that, if we entertained the action, it would be necessary to pronounce decree in the very words of the summons, if the pursuer should be successful. But further, these are words of style, for the purpose of obtaining the decree entirely reposed against the deed. And further, the expressions would be inappropriate on the pursuer's showing, for his object is to make out that the assignation never did establish an onerous valid right of property, as the defender contends. My objection is founded on this broad ground, that the ground of action is the averment of trust, and that a trust is the case disclosed; and that being the case, there must be an action which will enable the Court to declare the trust. Reduction is not the conclusion to deduce, and hence the form of action is not the proper process best adapted in order to withdraw the case of trust set forth on record from the operation of the Act 1696.

LORD MURRAY concurred.

LORD COWAN.—The pursuers have not disputed that the assignation, as the conclusion of a latent trust, would fall under the provisions of the statute 1696, had it not been for the peculiarities on which they rely to justify the form of challenging the deed, to which they have resorted. This could not have been successfully disputed. Although the subjects assigned are the ipsa corpora of moveables, the title to them has been vested in the defender by a formal deed; and it has not been alleged that the effect of that written title can be got quit of upon allegations of trust, because of its having relation to moveables, in any other mode than it must

No. 147. have been had it related to an heritable subject. It is this which gives its importance to the question raised in the discussion.

Mar 10, 1857.
Anstruther v.
Mitchell and
Cullen.

Holding, then, this deed not excluded from the operation of the statute 1696—and the question was so dealt with in the argument—what is the case attempted to be made by the pursuers?

The conclusion of the summons is for reduction of the assignation in usual style, as from the beginning, now, and in all time coming, null and void; and decree of reduction to that effect being pronounced, there is a petitory conclusion for delivery of the effects, or payment of their value; but there are no conclusions which, either expressly or by implication, raise a question of trust. The only point, then, is—whether the statements in fact are relevant to support this reductive conclusion! I am clearly of opinion that they are not. The statements in the record have been referred to. They are in substance that John Macfarlane, who is represented by the pursuers, devised a scheme, with the view of protecting his effects from the diligence of his creditors, and in furtherance thereof conveyed them to his sister, the defender, and another sister, “ostensibly for their own behoof, but really in trust for him;” and in particular, executed in favour of the defender the assignation under reduction. Then it is alleged that the transaction was fictitious; that no price was paid by the defender for the conveyance; that Macfarlane’s sole purpose in granting it was to protect the furniture from the diligence of his creditors, and that the understanding and agreement between him and the defender was, “that the defender was to hold the said furniture in trust for him, and for his behoof, and to reconvey the same when required.”

This is the nature of the transaction as regards its origin, according to the pursuers’ own statement. The object avowedly was to constitute an ex facie absolute title, but truly a latent trust in the person of the defender. And the purpose contemplated, as averred, was to carry through, it may be, what the law cannot but designate an unlawful purpose, but still a purpose designed by the grantor himself. While the transaction, therefore, may be designated by the pursuers “fictitious,” and originating ex turpi causa, it was the act of the grantor, in whose room the pursuers stand, as certainly as it was that of the defender. The relation between the grantor and the grantee of the deed, as set forth in the record, was nothing else than that of truster and trustee. It is impossible to take any other view of their legal relation.

No doubt it is further averred that the defender now fraudulently pretends that the transaction was a real one; that the assignation is a good deed; and that the effects conveyed by it belong to her in absolute property. This is the precise statement always made when a latent trustee dishonestly attempts to support the absolute title, and to found upon it as evidence of a real transaction. It is the very fraud which had become so common at the time as to call for the interposition of the Legislature in 1696. The act proceeds upon the supposition that persons without any declaration or being entrusted, are occasions of fraud, as at the enactment that no action of declaration of trustee or his heirs or assignees, “except lawfully subscribed,” “or unless the citer.” Any one entrusting another in trust, without taking a declaration exposes himself precisely to that dishonesty of the defender. Such an allegation can be the ground of fraud to be established, and virtual abrogation of the statute.

The proposal is to have the deed supported by the allegations of trust, to support this conclusion. There is no exception of the truster’s own fraud, in the deed. The deed gave true expression and effect to what was granted and received; and this is what the law relates. Wherever written title is necessary to the conveyance of the property, whether heritable or moveable, it applies. Here there is a written title, ment, for the application of the statutory rule. The deed sets forth the truth of the case as between the parties to it, and it took effect, as the truster intended. It never was, and cannot be held to have been ab initio null and void. As an assignation to the furniture it was a perfectly good deed; and, on the accomplishment of the alleged object for which it was got up, a totally different kind of action was indispensable. Some conclusions in the summons involving declaration of the trust, were requisite as a basis for the alternative petitory conclusions for delivery or payment.

National Exchange Co. v.
Drew and Dick.

Were the question with a third party it would be quite otherwise. The creditors of the truster, for example, might reduce the deed as fraudulently got up, and granted to their prejudice. Or any other third party having an interest to challenge the right might set it aside on that ground. No better statement of the distinction exists than will be found in the opinions of the Court in Lord Elibank v. Hamilton, 16th November 1827.

Here the pursuers cannot occupy any better position than their author John Macfarlane, whom they represent. The defender is entitled to have this case disposed of on the same footing as if Macfarlane himself had instituted proceedings. The question is thus entirely one between truster and trustee in a latent trust. But, supposing this to be the case, it was argued that the fraud upon his creditors, to accomplish which the deed was concocted, takes the case out of the ordinary rules applicable to latent trusts, and entitles the pursuers to the extraordinary remedy of reduction to which they have resorted. The turpitude of the truster in granting the deed is founded on as having the effect of placing him and his representatives in a better position than if the trust had been for legitimate purposes. This is certainly a novel plea. The usual rule is that in turpi causa melior est conditio possidentis. But it would not have served the pursuer's purpose to plead that maxim; and it has not, fortunately for him, been pleaded on the other side. Its effect might have been to exclude the pursuer from legal remedy of any kind. In the most favourable light, the pursuers cannot ask to be regarded as in any better legal position than if the trust had been granted for an unexceptionable purpose.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Alter the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary: Sustain the objection that an ordinary reduction, without any declaratory conclusions, is not the proper action in which to insist for establishing the trust averred and set forth on record; and therefore dismiss the same, and decern: Find the pursuer liable in expenses, and remit," &c.

Process—Proof—Examination of Havers.—Held (1) that a specification for recovery of "all ledgers, journals, cash-books, bill-books, and other books, documents, and papers," included letters, and copies of letters; (2) that access to books for the purpose of getting excerpts did not entitle a party to make notes and carry them away as his own private property.

In this case the Court, on 16th July 1856, granted diligence against havers, in terms of an amended specification, the first article of which was as follows:—"All ledgers, journals, cash-books, bill-books, and other books, documents, and papers, kept by the National Exchange Company, Glasgow, that excerpts may be taken therefrom, shewing the state of their affairs at the date of the reports to the annual meetings in September 1846 and September 1847, and at the date of the purchase and transfer of the shares in question: Also all books and other documents kept by them in connection with their business as sharebrokers, shewing the state of the Company's affairs at the date of the sale and transfer of the shares in question."

The case now came before the Court on appeal against deliverances of

No. 148. the commissioner. A haver having deponed that he had in his possession all the books and papers of the National Exchange Company, and having produced certain books under the specification, the report bore:—
 Mar. 11, 1857. National Exchange Co. v. Draw and Dick.
 “The defenders’ agent here proposed that the books should be lent to him by the commissioner, for the purpose of being examined by the accountant, that excerpts may be taken therefrom of all the entries therein relative to the matters in dispute, and to the specification sustained by the Court,—or otherwise, that access should be given to the books and others in the office of the haver in Glasgow for that purpose. The agent for the pursuers objected to this course. He was perfectly willing that the books should remain in the hands of the commissioner, or that they should be exhibited, as proposed, in Glasgow, and that the defenders should get excerpts of all the entries falling within their call; but the books contained entries of other matters, which it was neither expedient nor right the defenders should see. It was accordingly arranged that the books now exhibited should be removed by the haver to Glasgow, and that access should be given to them, as well as to the other books and documents of the pursuers, which the haver states he has not brought with him to this diet, for the purposes of the specification, in the office and at the sight of the haver or his clerks,—reserving to the parties to bring under the notice of the commissioner any question that may arise in the course of the examination of the books and others. “It was further arranged, with reference to the remaining articles of the specification, and the various documents falling within the same, that the haver should in like manner allow access thereto, in order that the various productions and excerpts to be made by him may be adjusted by the parties.”

In consequence of this arrangement, Mr M’Phun, on behalf of the defenders, obtained access to the books; and at a subsequent diet the haver deponed as follows:—“The only documents which Mr M’Phun requested were the books of the National Exchange Company. I refused all access to the books, and was advised, that the specification, No. 60 of process, required the production of the letters of the Company, as forming the specification, for the purpose mentioned—To this call the pursuers’ agent objected, on the ground that the specification, repels the same, and appoints a diet against which deliverance the pursuers are entitled to.”

The report also contained the following statement made by the haver to the commissioner:—“The haver here stated to the commissioner that the terms of the arrangement made at the diet of the 11th inst. required that the books exhibited by the haver should be removed from the haver’s office, and be deposited, and he moved the books to Glasgow, and he moved the books to be delivered to Mr M’Phun, in order that he may advise thereon, and also that he may advise thereon to the defenders, in the view of preparing the specification.”

“The pursuers’ agent stated that the proper sense of the word, but that the specification, which might be quite intelligible to other parties. That these notes of the specification, and went beyond the specification. That the pursuers are quite willing to give full and complete excerpts of every entry in the books, and that the defenders are entitled, and these excerpts the notes which Mr M'Phun had taken were not of that nature, and therefore the defenders were not entitled to get possession of them as contended for.

"The commissioner, in respect that the notes or excerpts in question have been taken by Mr M'Phun under the arrangement minuted at the diet of 22d August, whereby it was agreed that full access should be given to the books of the pursuers' Company with a view to the preparation of excerpts in common form, and in respect that the defenders' agent does not insist on the said notes or excerpts being produced in process, finds it unnecessary hoc statu to dispose of the objection stated by the pursuers' agent, and appoints the notes or excerpts in question to be delivered to Mr M'Phun, the same appearing to the commissioner to be his private and exclusive property, and acquired in a legal and competent mode."

Against which deliverance the pursuers' agent appealed. It was now contended that the letters did not fall under the specification, and also that the notes taken by Mr M'Phun were not his private property.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords having considered the appeals in the commission granted to Mr Boyle, and heard counsel thereon, Find, on the first objection and appeal regarding the production of letter-books and letters, that letter-books and letters do fall within the first article of the specification, and that therefore the defenders are entitled to production or excerpts of all letters, or copies of letters, kept by the Company, shewing the state of their affairs at the several dates mentioned in the first article of specification * * * On the third appeal, Find that Mr M'Phun is not entitled to carry away the notes referred to as his private and exclusive property, but that the parties may hold their consultations at the office or other apartment of the haver, where the documents are kept.

Exclusive privilege—Provisional specification—Date of patent—Cotemporaneous invention—Prior use—Statute 15 & 16 Vict. cap. 83, sects. 8, 23, 24.—An inventor having filed a "provisional specification," obtained, within six months, letters patent, which were dated as at the date of the provisional specification. Another party made a similar invention prior, but did not use it for his trade till after the date of the specification being filed, though the machine invented by him was capable of being so used earlier. The patentee brought an action of damages for infringement of his patent,—Held (1), that in such questions the date of the patent was that of filing the provisional specification; (2), that there was not such prior use as to invalidate the patentee's right; (3), that it being not the discovery in which the public are interested but the disclosure, the patentee was entitled to be protected; therefore, that the patentee was entitled to put down the use of the cotemporaneous invention;—Opinion, that the use of his own invention during the period between the filing of the specification and the granting of the patent did not subject a party as an infringer.

THIS case went to trial on 23d July 1856 before the Lord President and Mar. 11, 1857.
Jury on the following issues:—

1. Whether, on or about the 1st day of February 1854, the pursuer obtained letters patent under the Great Seal of the United Kingdom, bearing date the 14th day of November 1853, for an invention therein described as 'Improvements in Ruling Ornamental Figures,' and did thereafter duly

" 2. Whether, during the years 1854 and 1855, or part thereof, and during the currency of the said letters patent, the defenders did, by themselves or others, wrongfully, and in contravention of the said letters patent, use improvements in ruling ornamental figures, substantially the same with the improvements described in the said specification, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?

" Or,

" 1. Whether the improvements mentioned in the said letters patent and specification are not the original invention of the pursuer?

" 2. Whether improvements, substantially the same as those mentioned in the said letters patent and specification, were known and used within the United Kingdom prior to the date of the said letters patent?"

The jury returned the following verdict:—

" On the first issue for the pursuer, find for the pursuer; and on the first alternative issue for the defenders, they find also for the pursuer. And in regard to the two remaining issues, being the second issue for the pursuer, and the second alternative issue, they find (1), that the defenders did, in the years 1854 and 1855, use improvements in ruling ornamental figures, substantially the same as the improvements described in the specification filed by the pursuers. (2), That the improvements used by the defenders were invented by the defender Davidson before 14th November 1853, being the date of the provisional protection. That Mr Davidson did not use his invention for the purposes of his trade before 14th November 1853; but that the machine invented by him was capable of being so used before that date. That Mr Davidson used his invention for the purposes of his trade between the 14th November 1853 and the 1st of February 1854. But whether the use by the defenders of the improvement was wrongful, and in contravention of the letters patent, the jury leave the Court, as matter of law, to determine, upon a consideration of these findings, and of the notes of evidence, and to enter up a verdict upon these issues for the pursuer, or for the defenders, according as they shall decide the matter of law. And in the event of a verdict being entered up for the pursuer, they, of consent of parties, assess the damages at one shilling."

An exception taken to the charge of the presiding judge was now abandoned

The pursuer now pleaded;—That it being established that there was no use of improvements the same as those patented prior to the date of the letters patent, he was entitled to a verdict.¹ A patentee had the right of stopping the secret use of his patent. A party having got a patent for an invention, was the only party that the legislature recognised as the inventor. It might be that another party had also invented the same thing, but the law conferred the privileges of a patentee upon that party alone who accepted the conditions which the public offered for the benefit of that invention, and took out a patent. His right was then good against all the world.

No person can use the invention to the prejudice of the patentee. There might be a practically harmless use of an invention for mere amusement which the patentee had no interest to challenge. But where the patent is used for sale or profit, or secretly to save the expense of buying it, the patentee had an interest to challenge that use of it, and would be entitled to suppress it. It was optional for an inventor to keep his invention secret, or take a patent for it. He might keep it secret in the belief that he would make more profit by doing so than by disclosing it on the conditions offered by the public.

 Smith v.
 Davidson and
 Wilson.

But he kept it secret at the risk of other persons by the exercise of the same ingenuity as he himself had displayed finding it out, and taking a patent for it. If any such person, having made the discovery, offered to disclose it as a new invention, he was entitled to the usual privileges offered to all inventors. Although it had been already invented, it had never been disclosed. The public had never got the benefit of it, and there was no reason, therefore, why the monopoly given to the person so disclosing it should not be equally good against the person who had been making a profit by it in private, as against every one else. He had been playing a selfish game, and there ought therefore to be no particular tenderness on the part of the public towards him, who had refused to give them the benefit of his invention on the terms which they offer to all inventors.¹ But here the jury had found not that Davidson was using the machine, but that it was only ready for use. It was only capable of being used. This action was brought with reference to the 15 & 16 Vict., sections 8, 23, 25, under which a party may use a patent for six months without it being held to be a publication of the patent. Here the provisional specification was dated 14th November 1853; and although the patent was not issued till several months afterwards, yet the effect of it drew back to November, and by sect. 8 the patentee was entitled to debar the use of his invention after that date.

Pleaded for the defenders;—This is unquestionably a new point in patent law.² If the principle contended for by the pursuer be well founded, the taking out of a patent for a process which may have been in operation for half a century, but secretly carried on, will entitle the patentee to put down that manufacture. But the right of a patentee rests on an exception to a great general rule. The statute of James I. is the foundation of the patent law of this country. The policy of that statute was the extinction of monopoly; and the right of a patentee is grounded entirely on an exception to that rule. The question first to be considered arises under the issue of infringement. The jury have found that the defender was using a machine not the same, but substantially the same, as that covered by the pursuer's specification; and, second, that that machine was an original invention. The right claimed by the pursuer to prevent the defender using that machine receives no countenance or authority from statute or decision. There never has been a case in which the parties to the suit have been, as here, two rival inventors. The true doctrine of law was, that a patentee is secured in nothing but the exclusive use of his own invention. He is entitled to put down the use of that invention by everybody else; and it was no answer for the person using it to say, that somebody else had already thought of it, although confessedly the person so challenged for using it derived his whole knowledge of it from the patentee. That was the ordinary case that occurred; and here unquestionably the patentee was entitled to protect himself in the exclusive use of his invention. But if his right be confined to the exclusive use of his own invention, was he therefore entitled to put down the use of a similar invention not borrowed from his at all?—not a colourable imitation of his invention, nor an attempt to evade his right, but an independent and complete invention, the result of separate and independent thought and experiment, and coming into perfect and complete existence before any patent right had been created. The Crown grant conferred upon him no right to interfere with similar inventions, although they might be prejudicial to him. The only thing secured to him was the use of his own invention; and the defenders' answer to the pursuer's charge of infringement was, that they

No. 149. were not using his invention.¹ The great merit of some inventions was, that they should be kept secret. Suppose that I invent a mode of producing a chemical substance well known in the market—not better than what is already in the market—but by a mode which enables me to undersell every one else that the public has been using this product of mine for many years, but that another person then discovers my mode of manufacturing it, and takes out a patent for it: Is he entitled to put down my manufactory?—and yet that would be the result of the pursuer's argument, although the public have been getting the benefit of my invention, inasmuch as they had been getting an article at a cheaper rate. There certainly was no authority for that. Farther, where there was no identity between the inventions, yet where they were so much alike, that if the one had followed on the other which had been patented, it would have been a colourable imitation: In such a case suppose a mode invented to attain some result in chemistry, would a later inventor who had attained the same result by a mode very nearly the same yet not identical, be entitled to go back on the prior invention, and say that also is my invention? Clearly not. Suppose a party perfects a machine and another party seeing his way to the same result, but not having attained the same perfection, puts in a provisional specification, he prevents the issue of the perfect machine; yet his own invention is not complete, and the specification is put in not for publication but to postpone it, inasmuch as he is merely groping his way in the direction of the end which the other party has already achieved. A person in the position of Davidson, therefore, cannot by using his own invention commit a piracy of a thing which another person invented. But it does not follow, and is not contended, that because a person who has invented a machine is entitled to use it, that therefore every other person is also to be entitled to use it.

Again, in reference to the question of public use, the question is, whether the date of the patent is the date it is made falsely to bear, or the date at which the letters are truly issued? The lodging of a specification is a protection in this sense, that if any man use the same invention, or a substantially the same, with that which is afterwards patented, or as the result of an independent invention, there is anything to protect the patent against that. The use which will void the patent is not the use of that which is disclosed, but the public use of a separate and independent invention, having no reference to the discoveries of the patentee at all. The object of the 16th and 17th Vict. is very plain. The party is left at liberty, after he has so far disclosed the nature of his invention, by lodging a specification to go on to mature it, without any restraint as to publication. But the prior use is a totally different thing, and stands on a different footing altogether from that upon which the validity of the grant depends. The condition of granting letters patent by the statute of James is, that no one should use this particular invention; but here there was a prior use arising from an invention independent of the patentee.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The exception to the direction at the trial having been drawn, we are now to dispose of the case as if none had been taken. They have, on certain issues, returned a verdict in favour of the pursuer; and, in relation to certain others of the issues, they have pronounced special findings of fact; with the concurrence of the parties, have devolved on us the duty of entering a verdict for the pursuer or defenders, according as we shall decide the matter upon these findings.

The action is brought on the ground of alleged infringement of patent. It includes as usual for damages; but, as the object of the pursuer was not so much to recover damages as to try the question of right, it was arranged at the trial in the event of a verdict being entered up for the pursuer, it should only be entered up for the nominal damages of one shilling. No. 149.

The defences to the action were of a twofold character. Some of them resolved into a challenge of the validity of the patent, and others into a denial of the alleged infringement. The issues sent to trial were framed so as to comprehend both branches of the defences. Then, again, while the defenders denied having used the pursuer's invention, although Davidson admitted having used one substantially the same, he took a counter-issue impeaching the validity of the patent. These issues impeached the validity of the patent on two grounds, which appear from the issues themselves. The first issue calls in question the originality of the invention as the invention of the pursuer; and, under that issue, if it had been found that the invention had not been truly the invention of the pursuer, but of somebody else, which the pursuer had passed off as his own, the patent would not have been valid. Under the second issue, the question is raised as to the prior use of the invention;—by anybody, no matter by whom. If so used before the issuing of the letters patent, it does not signify who was the inventor. If the pursuer was the inventor, and allowed his invention to be used, then his patent was invalid; and, if any one else was the inventor, and allowed the invention to be used, the patent was equally invalid. Prior use destroys the right to obtain a patent, and the validity of a patent if obtained.

Mar. 11, 1857.
Smith v.
Wilson.

These issues having gone to trial, the jury, by a verdict, found in favour of the pursuer upon his first issue. By that finding it was established that he had obtained letters patent as there pointed at. Then, on the first alternative issue, the jury, by their finding, determined the pursuer's originality of invention. Therefore, upon that ground, the patent was sustained. But there was another ground of challenge, in reference to which the jury pronounced certain special findings. They found that the improvements used by the defenders were invented by the defender Davidson before 14th November 1853, the date of the provisional protection. That Mr Davidson did not use his invention for the purposes of his trade before 14th November 1853; but that the machine invented by him was capable of being so used before that date. That Mr Davidson used his invention for the purposes of his trade between the 14th November 1853, and the 1st of February 1854.

The first question to be considered arises upon the second alternative issue, which goes to invalidate the patent by reason of previous use; and such might have been the result although the pursuer was the original inventor, for he might have allowed it to get into public use. After giving his invention to the public without conditions, he could not reclaim it and secure the privileges of a patentee. The jury have found that the improvements used by the defenders were substantially the same with those invented by the pursuer, and that they had been invented by the defender Davidson, and brought to perfection before 14th November 1853, and were used by him for the purposes of his trade between the 14th November 1853 and the 1st February 1854. It is that use which raises the question of the validity of the patent, for there was no attempt made to shew that the invention had been used by any other person than the defenders. The jury have disposed of this issue by finding special facts applicable to it, and have left it to us to say whether the use was such as to entitle the defenders to a verdict on it. If they be, it will be unnecessary to enter farther into this case; because, in that event, the patent would not be valid, and there could be no infringement of it so as to subject the defenders in damages, or entitle the pursuer to a verdict on the separate issue of contravention.

In order to invalidate letters patent on the ground of previous use, it is necessary not only that the use shall have been prior to the date of the letters patent, but that it should be a public and not a secret use. Accordingly, in this case, the issue puts the question, "Whether improvements substantially the same as those mentioned in the letters patent and specification were known and used within the United Kingdom prior to the date of the said letters patent"? Now, "known and used" means known to the public, and openly used. The jury have by their verdict fixed the nature and extent of the use. They find that, prior to 14th November 1853, the machine invented by Davidson was capable of being used for the purposes of his trade, but was not so used till after that date, and they have not found that it was used for any other purpose before that date, nor does it appear that it had been published or made known before that time. Indeed it

No. 149. appears from the evidence that Davidson at that time contemplated applying for a patent, and, consistently with that, he could not do otherwise than avoid publication of his invention. His experiments were over, and the invention was complete and ready for publication and to be put in use, but it was not so published or used. In these circumstances, it cannot be held that, prior to the 14th November, the improvements patented by the pursuer were "known and used" in the sense of the issue, or in any sense which could be held as invalidating the letters patent.

Mar. 11, 1867.
Smith v.
Wilson.

But the jury have found that, between 14th November 1853 and 1st February 1864, being the date at which the letters were issued, the defender, Davidson, did use the invention for the purpose of his trade—that the invention was his own invention, although substantially the same with that of the pursuer, and it is not found that the use which he so made of it was anything else than that open and public use of it which the ordinary exercise of a trade imports or implies. Indeed the evidence shews that the use—during that period at least—was not secret, but open and public. The question arises, therefore, whether that use was such as to entitle the defenders to a verdict on the second alternative issue, and so invalidate the pursuer's patent on the ground of prior public use.

I am of opinion that it cannot have that effect: In the first place, because the issue does not embrace that period of time, and, in the second place, because the law would not give such effect to the use during that period. The letters patent bear date 14th November 1853, and the duration of them is for fourteen years from that date. The 14th November 1853 is the date they actually bear, and that date was given to them in strict accordance with the provisions of the statute 15 & 16 Vict. c. 83. The question put in issue is distinctly limited to use before the date of the "said letters patent," which cannot mean anything else than the date which the letters lawfully bear, and actually do bear; that is the 14th November 1853; and it could scarcely have been intended to embrace use subsequent to that date, for the defenders have no plea on record founding on such use, and the way adopted was the true way of putting the issue in this case. Even if the terms of the issue could be extended so as to cover that period, I do not think that the use by Davidson of the invention during that period would invalidate the patent, because the provisional protection, which the pursuers had obtained on 14th November, protected his patent against such consequences. In this question of previous use, it is of no importance who was the inventor of the thing used; for I think that letters patent protect the party against the consequences of use during that intervening period between the date of the provisional specification and the actual issuing of the letters patent. The provisions of the statute on that subject are the 8th, 23d, and 24th sections. Section 23 provides,—"the power of lodging a provisional specification is allowed, then the inventor from the date of the application for letters patent published without prejudice to any letters patent such protection from the consequences referred to as provisional specification."

I read that section as protecting the inventor of the patent, founded on the intermediate

Then section 23 provides, that "it shall be issued in pursuance of this Act, to the applicant for the same; and in case of provisional registration under the 'Protection of such provisional registration, or when it was referred, or the Lord Chancellor, that as aforesaid may be sealed and bear date the day of such sealing, or of any other day between registration and the day of such sealing, the letters patent issued under this Act, shall bear date: Provided always, that save in respect whereof a complete application for the same under this Act had upon such letters patent in respect of any infringement committed before the No. 149. same were actually granted."

Therefore, although a party may use the invention in the meantime, that use is not to subject him to an action for infringement; and, on the other hand, while not exposing him to such an action, such use does not invalidate the patent. There is an exception, where, instead of a provisional specification, a party lodges a full specification. In such a case, the use of the invention after that date and before the date of issuing the letters patent, renders the party so using it liable to an action for infringement. But if the patentee lodges only a provisional specification, that saves his patent, but does not entitle him to raise an action for infringement.

Mar. 11, 1857.
Smith v.
Wilson.

It therefore appears to me that if the defender Davidson used the invention during that intermediate period for the purposes of trade, it had not the effect of invalidating the patent, and that, consequently, the verdict here ought to be entered up for the pursuer on that second alternative issue, in so far as such use can be founded on as invalidates the patent. That disposes of both grounds on which the validity of the patent has been questioned. The jury have negatived the objection founded on the want of originality of the invention, and, on the facts found by them, it necessarily follows that we must enter up a verdict for the pursuer on that second alternative, negating the objection founded on previous use. The patent must then be held to be a valid patent, for it is not challenged on any other ground.

But that does not exhaust the case. It only settles the validity of the patent. There remains the question of infringement, and that is perhaps the part of the case attended with most difficulty. This is a case not very common,—one of contemporaneous invention. The jury have found in effect that the pursuer and defenders were each of them original inventors of improvements in their department of trade,—that their inventions were substantially the same,—and that they were contemporaneous inventors. The pursuer obtained a provisional specification on 14th November 1853, before which time the defender Davidson, acting independently, had perfected his invention. He used his own invention from and after that day. The provisional protection did not, during its currency, disable him or disentitle him from using his own invention, and the question is, whether the giving out of letters patent disentitles him to continue the use of it under pain of being liable as an infringer of the patent. No case has been cited to us ruling this precise point. We have been referred to some dicta in which the point has been suggested, but there is no indication of opinion on the subject given in any case, nor do the suggestions appear to have been made in any case in which the opinions upon that point would have been of any value, or from which we can infer that the Judges had given the question full consideration. The utmost that can be said of them is, that they are suggestions, and as to some of them, I am not sure that we are to consider them as suggestions on this particular matter. It is contended that the defender is still entitled to use his own invention without being liable as an infringer, because the patent could not prevent him doing what he was doing before it was granted, and because at most it could only prevent him using the pursuer's invention, but not his own. These are the grounds on which the argument is maintained, and the case presented to us for decision.

The first of these grounds admits of two answers—First, if the 14th November 1853 be taken to be the true and legal date of the letters patent, as I think it must, there was nothing done by Davidson before that date which amounted to use of his invention, and therefore it cannot be a hardship to prevent him doing what he was not doing before that date. Therefore, if he is now to be limited to the condition he was in before the date of the letters patent, that is a condition in which he was not using the invention for the purpose of trade. Second, although the use of the invention during the subsistence of the provisional protection does not expose the user to prosecution as an infringer, there is nothing in the statute from which we can infer that it entitles him to continue such use after the letters patent are given out. The case of the defenders, therefore, must rest on the other ground, that Davidson was using, not the pursuer's invention, but truly his own invention; and that view is supported by the fact which is found by the jury, that he was an original inventor, that this machine was made by him, and that he was using that machine till the 1st February 1854. He also founds on an inference to be

No. 149. deduced from the terms of the letters patent, which limit the monopoly of the pursuer to the use of his own invention.

Mar. 11, 1857.
Smith v.
Wilson.

That raises a question of novelty and importance. Cases were put to us of extreme hardship as tests of the principle. An invention, it was said, which had been used by the inventor for a length of time, might be put a stop to by a party taking out letters patent, and therefore, such a result was not to be implied in a grant of monopoly of this kind. In this particular case we are not compelled to deal with a question of that kind, because the use of the machine had not commenced at the date of the letters patent; but still the principle is involved. After all the consideration I have been able to give to this case, I am of opinion that the argument so maintained on the part of Davidson is not sound in law. When a patent is validly granted—is held in law to be a valid patent—then I think that the party who obtains the patent is held to be the owner of that invention described in the letters patent. It is held in law to be his invention. A monopoly of it is given to him as being his invention, because he is the party who has given to the public that invention. He has given it to the public under the condition that he shall obtain a monopoly, and so it comes to be his invention in that sense. The discovery is not the thing the public have an interest in; what they have interest in is that they shall have the benefit of that invention. A party may live and die, taking the knowledge of his invention with him, but the disclosure of the invention and the means by which it shall be put in use, are the conditions on which he obtains a monopoly of it from the public, and the party who comes forward and complies with that condition, being himself the true inventor, gets the right to the monopoly of that invention. It becomes his invention in law. The consequence is that his monopoly must be protected, and although there may be others who have made the discovery, but who have not brought it to the same perfection, and have not made their bargain with the public in regard to it, they cannot disturb the integrity of the monopoly of the party who first makes his bargain with the public. In all cases the statute provides for sufficient notice being given to every one, that if there be any good objection to giving the monopoly to the party who has applied for it, such objection may be stated; and although I do not rest my judgment on the circumstance that it is now too late to object, yet delay is a circumstance to be considered, as also that it is only after full publication that a monopoly of the invention is given to the party as being truly his invention, and in the exercise of that monopoly he must be protected. The invention is then his. It is used by no other party. A separate inventor who comes after him does not borrow the invention if he is truly original in his invention. But that will not entitle him to use such invention against the interests of the patentee; and if this defender, who was an inventor before the date of the patent, but had not then brought his invention to perfection or made it public, is now entitled to use it merely because he can say he did not take it from the patent, what consequences will follow? May not any person take the invention from the defender, using his invention, and not the invention of the patentee, and so the patent may be altogether destroyed by a growth of users springing from this other source of invention? To allow this, therefore, would be to destroy the validity of the monopoly. I see no ground for the defenders' doctrine, from the policy of the statute, from the history of this monopoly, or from the terms of the letters patent. On the contrary, I think that the true reading of all is, that by giving the public the benefit of the invention, that invention, and everything that is substantially the same with it, and which was not public before the date of the patent, is the invention of the patentee, and that no person has right to destroy his monopoly by using machinery or improvements substantially the same with his. I therefore think that the verdict ought to be entered up for the pursuer on the second issue.

I may add, that at the trial both parties were examined, and that their examination was perfectly creditable to them. They were evidently running a race of invention. Both of them spoke with perfect candour, but it so happens that the pursuer was lucky in the race.

LORD IVORY.—I concur in the result at which your Lordship has arrived, and substantially in the reasoning. I am of opinion that the verdict must be for the pursuer.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I also concur.

LORD DEAS.—We have had the advantage of a full consultation in this case, and I concur in the result of your Lordship's opinion, and also in every one of the observations by which that result is arrived at.

Mrs Pollock, the widow, died in 1853. Her son, James Ross, was also deceased. He left an only son, a pupil, residing at Sharrington in Norfolk, who succeeded to his father's interest in Hume Pollock's estate.

This petition was presented by the widow of James Ross, now wife of William Melbourn, residing in Norfolk, with consent of her husband, stating that Hume Pollock having appointed his wife and son to be his executors, there was at present no person legally authorised to uplift the rents of the heritable property belonging to the pupil, and therefore praying for the appointment of a factor loco tutoris to the pupil, "in order that the estate might be preserved without injury for behoof of the pupil, and of all persons living right therein." The pupil had no tutors. An interim appointment of a judicial factor was made during the Christmas Recess. When the petition was moved, the Court expressed an opinion that a factor loco tutoris was the proper appointment to be made in the circumstances. The original application was accordingly withdrawn; and on this amended application being presented,

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having resumed consideration of this petition,—Nominate and appoint James Black Dill, banker, Newton Stewart, to be factor loco tutoris to James Ross, the pupil mentioned in the petition, with the usual powers,—the said James Black Dill always finding caution before extract, and decern ad interim."

1ST DIVISION.

THE late Mr Lamb, a domiciled Englishman, died on 29th November 1856, leaving a will executed in the English form, by which he appointed the Earl of Eglinton, Sir Frederick Leopold Arthur, Bart., and Henry Danby Seymour, Esq., to be his executors; and appointed the petitioner Mrs Lamb, and, after her decease, the gentlemen nominated executors, to be guardian and guardians of the persons and estate of his children during their respective minorities.

Mr Lamb left one son, Archibald Lamb, a pupil, and two daughters. At the time of his death he held a heritable security for L.22,500 over the estate of Glassfoord in Lanarkshire. In his will this was dealt with as personal property—such mortgage being personal by the law of England. Mrs Lamb now presented this petition, stating that these circumstances had given rise to a variety of questions of international law, that she was advised that the English will was defective in the technical terms and solemnities requisite to carry the heritable security as Scotch heritage, and that the nomination of guardians contained in the English will was not sufficient to entitle the parties named to act in relation to heritable estates in Scotland belonging to their ward; “and it becomes therefore necessary that the guardianship of the said Archibald Lamb quoad hoc should be committed by your Lordships to a proper party as his factor loco tutoris, with the usual powers.”

The Court expressed an opinion that such an appointment would be incompetent, in respect the pupil was resident in London, and furth of their jurisdiction; and recommended that an application for the appointment of a judicial factor should be substituted. This was done, and special intimation having been made to the executors,

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—“The Lords having resumed consideration of this petition, appoint Roger Montgomerie to be judicial factor on the said heritable estate in Scotland, with the usual powers, he finding caution before extract, and decern ad interim.”

Pro indiviso proprietors—Division and sale.—Where two parties were pro indiviso proprietors of certain subjects not divisible, either separately or by apportionment;—
Held that declarator of division and sale at the instance of one of the parties was Ld Rutherford competent. Observed, that the principle of the Roman law, de communi dividundo, is recognised by the Court of Session, and applies to such a case.

THIS was an action of declarator and division and sale of certain subjects in Glasgow, held by two pro indiviso proprietors, one of whom was bankrupt, Brock (the pursuer) being his trustee.

The following interlocutors were pronounced by Lord Rutherford, Ordinary, and were acquiesced in:—

“12th July 1851.—The Lord Ordinary holds the record closed upon the revised condescendence and defences, and relative notes of pleas in law, No. 20 and 21 of process, and appoints counsel for the parties to be ready to debate; reserving to both parties to produce such writings as they may consider necessary within eight days.”

“11th November 1851.—The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel for the parties, makes avizandum to himself with the process.”

“Edinburgh, 25th November 1851.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties’ procurators, and made avizandum, and thereafter considered the closed record, writs produced, and whole process—Finds that the pursuer’s author and the defender are proprietors pro indiviso of the subjects libelled, partly by succession and partly by purchase: Finds it admitted by both parties, and especially founded upon by the defenders, that the subjects are not divisible, either separately or by apportionment, between the parties: Finds, therefore, that the conclusions for sale and division of the price are competent, and sustains the action to that effect accordingly: Finds that no relevant defence otherwise has been stated against these conclusions: Quoad ultra appoints the cause to be enrolled in the motion roll, with a view to determine the steps which it may be necessary to adopt for carrying through the sale.”

NOTE.—The present action is of the nature of an action de communi dividundo, and concludes for division of the common subjects, or in the event of its being found that they are indivisible, for sale under authority of the Court, and division of the price. The pursuer, while he inserts the conclusions of division, following the style book in the matter, avers that the subjects are indivisible, meaning, as was distinctly explained, that they could not be divided into two equal lots, either separately, or by any apportionment of the three. The defender admits this statement to be correct, and, indeed, founds upon the fact that the properties are indivisible in either of those senses, as the ground of the plea on which he has mainly insisted, namely, that the action, though it might be competent in its conclusions for division, if division were possible, is altogether incompetent, in so far as it concludes for sale and division of the price. This view of the matter raises a question of importance. The elements of the decision exist in the case, on the admission of the parties, and without farther inquiry.

The competency at common law of an action for division between co-proprietors of a common subject, and at the suit of one, does not seem to be denied by the defender. It cannot, indeed, be disputed, in the face of clear authorities, that we have borrowed from the Roman law, and introduced into our common law actions of the same nature and import with those of the Roman law familie eriscunde and de communi dividundo. The defender referred to Erskine, 3, 3, 56, et seq., as shewing that the action of division was, by the law of Scotland, limited to moveable subjects, and that an action for division of heritable subjects, except under a brief of division, as between heir and tencer, and between co-heirs, had no place in the law of Scotland, but required the aid of statute, as in the case of commenties, or of judicial sale. But if the passage of Mr Erskine referred to be held to express anything beyond a statement, and that, too, in itself vague, of the progress of the law, it must be disallowed as plainly of no authority. Lord Stair, I. 7, 15, says expressly, "under the obligation of restitution is comprehended the obligation of division, whereby that we possess in common with others, or indistinct from that which they possess, we are naturally obliged to divide with them, whensoever they desire to quit the communion, for thereby we restore what is their own, and we are not obliged thereto by any contract or delinquence. It is true the contract of society includeth the obligation to divide after the society is ended. But communion falleth many times when there is no society nor contract;" he then refers to the actions in the Roman law already mentioned, but adds, "because they do chiefly concern immoveables or ground rights," he proposes to treat of them thereafter. Accordingly, in his fourth book, in mentioning the brief of division in which the partition is to be made by the writ of division between the portionarios dictarum terrarum, he defines portioners to be such "as bruk, pro indiviso, whether they be heirs portioners or portioners by apprising or adjudication, or if there be divers tencers who have not been kened to a particular division, for in that case the brieve of terce is not the competent way of division, for that is only competent between the tencer and the heir." There can be no question, it is thought, after the authority of Lord Stair, referring to the Roman law, that an action for division of heritable property held pro indiviso, though by singular titles, was imported into the common law of Scotland in the form of a brief of division in very ancient times; Bell's Comm., vol. i. p. 64. The remedy easily assumed the form of an ordinary action, the brief of division being one of those which was subject to advocacy, even where the proceedings before the inquest resulted in verdict, and an ordinary action being of itself more suitable, when, as in this case, the equitable powers of the Court might require to be interposed. This was strongly recognised in the case of Milligan, February 8, 1782, as reported in the Faculty Collection, and also in Lord Hailes, volume ii. p. 897. The discussion there did not depend upon the fact that the subject had been employed in a copartnery, but resolved simply into the rights of parties holding, and by singular title, a common subject. And though the more recent case of Stewart, Shaw, vol. xiv., p. 106, 4th December 1825, may have depended upon the subjects having been at one time copartnery property, the action was sustained upon the principles of the Roman law, which applied not only to copartnery, but in those circumstances which created quasi-er societas the relation of co-copartnery.

But the defender, while he admitted under these and other authorities that an action of division would lie at common law, as it might be held to have come in place of a brief of division, denied entirely the competency of this action, limited as its conclusions practically must be, by the shewing of both parties, to a sale under authority of the Court and division of the price, contending that the reference to the Roman law had no place here, sale and division of the price being matters simply of remedy, not necessarily flowing from the principle upon which the action de communi dividundo proceeds. The Lord Ordinary cannot concur in this view, or in any such restriction in the reference to the Roman law. That law and our common law following it, proceed upon the principles that no one should be bound to remain indefinitely in communione with another or others as proprietors of a common property; that for reasons of public policy, and especially to ensure the advantageous management of such property, any joint proprietor should have it in his power, against the will of the others, to put an end to the communion; and that there arises out of the situation itself an obligation to divide, or where division or any other arrangement is impracticable, consistently with retaining the property, to adjust their respective interests by sale and division of the price. Under the civil law accordingly, subhastatio was had recourse to in the last resort; and so it is in most countries in Europe that have adopted the Roman law; but all this is founded upon the obligation which arises ex contractu, where there is a proper contract of society; and quasi ex contractu, where the relation has arisen, not under contract, but by succession or any other title or titles through which parties may hold a subject as joint proprietors. In this last case they were considered by the Roman law as socii in the matter, and because as either party could put an end to this, it might be involuntary, society when he chose, there emerged similar obligations to those which arose on the termination of copartnery, and the law gave similar remedies. Pothier accordingly treats the subject in his appendix to the Contract of Society. It is not a matter therefore of remedy as regards its form, that the conclusion of sale and division of the price is granted; it is the appropriate remedy in justice, resulting from the situation of the parties, where the easier and more obvious remedy of division has no place. The Roman law looked in the first instance to division, and that was the leading conclusion and object of the action, de communi dividundo, but when that could have no effect from the nature of the subjects, or where the parties could not agree, that one should take the subjects, paying the other the value of his share, and especially where the different estimates of value excluded any similar adjustment, public sale, under authority of the Court, became plainly the only course.

The Lord Ordinary, therefore, can have no doubt that the action is clearly competent in all its conclusions, and he thinks the Court has full equitable jurisdiction in the matter. He does, not, however, think the pursuer bound to shew equity for division, or, where division is impossible, for sale. He considers the pursuer's right, in that respect, to be clear. But circumstances may easily exist in which the defender may shew, in equity, a good defence against the demand for division or sale. No such defence, however, had been made here; for the Lord Ordinary cannot consider the circumstance, that the defender may draw a larger income from the subjects as they now are than the interest of any price that is likely to be realised, affords any ground for binding the pursuer to remain in communion, especially where the rental has fallen, and is probably falling, and where one of the co-proprietors has become bankrupt.

The Lord Ordinary has not thought it necessary to make any observation on the specialty, that the pursuer in this action is trustee on the bankrupt estate, who has an immediate and direct interest in the proper administration of the estate, to dissolve the communion and wind up the affairs of the bankrupt. He wishes to put the case at once upon the broad and satisfactory grounds on which he thinks it would rest if the bankrupt had been pursuer,—and the specialty, at any rate, might be subject to the answer, that the trustee might sell his interest. Further, all the difficulties in the case would arise if the action were brought at the instance of any purchaser from the trustee.

On 21st January 1852, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor: —“The Lord Ordinary interpones his authority to the minute of the parties, and decrees in terms thereof in all respects.”

No. 152. The case was again continued, to adjust the interlocutor.

Mar. 11, 1857. LORD DEAS.—The remit now to be made proceeds on the footing that an action of this kind is a common law proceeding. The pursuer of it does not appeal to the nobile officium of the Court. He merely seeks to enforce his common law rights, which entitle the pro indiviso proprietor to have the subject divided, and, if not divisible, to have it sold. The ordinary rule is, that no man is bound to remain longer in communion than he pleases.

THE COURT then pronounced the following interlocutor:—"11th March.

—The Lords, on the report of Lord Ardmillan, Ordinary, of new appoint the subjects described in the summons to be sold by public roup, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to take and authorise such steps as may be necessary for carrying through the sale, and for disposing of the cause."

On 17th March 1857, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having resumed consideration of this cause, and the remit from the Lords of the First Division, ordains the subjects described in the summons to be exposed to sale, by way of public roup, within the Parliament or new Session House of Edinburgh, upon Wednesday the 20th day of May next, between the hours of two and four o'clock afternoon, at the upset price of L.182 sterling, being the value fixed by the proof for the pursuer, No. 70 of process, upon minutes and articles of roup, to be adjusted at the sight of the Lord Ordinary. Judicial factor—Joint adventure—Special powers.—A judicial factor appointed of consent on a joint adventure, with power to wind up the concern, and take all steps necessary for the protection of the interests of the adventure, and with power to sell the whole property or carry on the business.

Mar. 11, 1857. BELL presented this petition, on the allegation that in May 1855 he and the respondent entered into a joint adventure, without a written contract, having for its object the publication of a newspaper called "The North Briton," which had ever since been published in Edinburgh. That the respondent represented that the capital was not to exceed L.150, and he had on the day of the adventure, that, nevertheless, he had advanced private funds, to advance L.907, responsible to the extent of L.17 premises. The petitioner therefore prayed "to grant warrant for serving this petition on the said James Williamson, and to appoint him to lodge answers thereto within a certain short space; and on resuming consideration hereof, with or without answers, to nominate and appoint the said James Cunningham, or such other fit and proper person as your Lordships may fix upon, to be judicial factor on the estate and affairs of the said joint adventure, he finding caution before extract in common form, with all the usual and necessary powers for winding up as speedily as practicable the affairs of the said joint adventure; and in particular, with power immediately to enter into possession of the said newspaper, and of the premises in which the business of the joint adventure is carried on, and to take possession and charge of the whole books and effects belonging to the joint adventure; as also with power to take all steps that may be necessary for the protection of the interests of the joint adventure, and for the realisation of the whole property and effects belonging to it; and especially with power to sell and dispose of the said newspaper and good-will of the business of the joint adventure, as well as of the whole printing machines, steam engine, and other printing materials, and that either by public roup or private bargain, as he may judge best, and to hold the proceeds thereof, and any other monies that may come into his hands after defraying the necessary charges and disbursements for behoof of all parties interested, and subject to the orders of the Court; with power also to the said factor to manage and carry on the said newspaper business, and to employ suitable persons for that purpose, till the same can be disposed of to advantage: and in the meantime, and as the interests of the parties in said joint adventure are subject to the imminent risk of being sacrificed if a neutral party is not appointed to take immediate charge of the same, your Lordships are prayed to appoint the said James Cunningham, or such other person as your Lordships may think proper, to be judicial factor forforesaid ad interim until the case comes to be further advised by your Lordships, and that with all necessary powers of interim management, and especially with power to take charge of the said newspaper business, and the printing machines, steam engine, and others; as also to prohibit, prohibit, and discharge the said James Williamson from collecting in any way intruding or interfering with the money due to said joint venture, or with the management thereof; and in the event of his making unnecessary opposition to this application, to find him liable to the petitioner in the expenses that may be thereby occasioned to him; or to do otherwise," &c.

Answers were lodged by the respondent. He stated that the petitioner, who knew that the respondent had no great amount of capital, undertook to agree to make all advances necessary for the purchase of types, presses, &c., in order to set the paper a-going,—the respondent, on the other hand, agreeing to give his time and attention to the management of the paper and the details of the business of printing and publishing it and keeping of the books, an editor being appointed for the literary department. It was also agreed that the profits of the paper, when it should yield any, should be divided equally between the petitioner and the respondent. In coming into this agreement it was well understood by both parties that it would take some time before the newspaper could be so established as to yield any profits, and that considerable advances would require to be made. It was equally well understood that much care and attention would be required in the conducting of it, so as to make it profitable. And it was agreed that the respondent, while giving his time and attention, was

Johnston.

He then stated that for a long time he had got no remuneration for his services; and, after narrating at great length the proceedings which had taken place between himself and the petitioner, and denying the allegations in regard to his management of the funds, he stated that he was quite "willing that all proper means be taken for realising the property of the copartnership, and winding up the affairs. And he has no objection to the appointment of a judicial factor, with the requisite powers. The powers proposed in the prayer seem to be unusual, and to exceed what the Court is in use to grant. But the respondent objects entirely to the appointment of Mr Cunningham."

THE COURT then pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Of consent, appoints James Torrop, residing in Argyle Place, Edinburgh, to be judicial factor on the estate and affairs of the said joint-adventure, with the powers prayed for, and with the usual powers he always finding caution before extract, and decern ad interim; and remit to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills to proceed with the farther adjustment and execution of this matter, in so far as may be necessary, during vacation, and also with powers, in case of the present appointment falling, or not being timeously carried out by finding caution, or otherwise, to appoint another person as factor ad interim."

Thomas Johnston died on the 2d, 1857. According to the pursuer, "a meeting was to be held on 9th July. Mr Robert Johnston, agent for the deceased, and knew the contents of the settlement, and the contents at the time and particulars of his property securities on which it was invested. Of all these matters the pursuer did not know anything until sometime after his said brother's death, and then all the information he got was very general and imperfect—given him verbally by Mr Swan, upon whom, as having been in some matters his law-agent, though he was not then acting for him, the pursuer relied. Mr Swan, in giving him such information, erroneously and improperly told the pursuer that a sum of L.1600, secured by bond of Mr Baillie of Jarviswoode, was moveable. In this situation of matters, Mr Swan, at his own hand, and without instructions from the pursuer, did, previous to the said meeting at which he was to be present, prepare and cause to be written out a minute," &c., in which, after a narrative of the opening of the repositories, and of the provisions of the settlement, there was the following passage:—"A note of the whole estate which belonged to the deceased is annexed, and subscribed by the above named parties, with reference hereto; and considering that it is doubtful whether the said sum of L.1600 mentioned in the said state be heritable or moveable, and as Mr Alexander Johnston will be entitled to the sum of L.2000, lent to the Misses Whale, it is agreed by the said Alexander Johnston that the said sum of L.1600, which is held in trust by Messrs George Johnston and John Johnston, shall be considered moveable, and be divided as such in terms of the said disposition and settlement."

The first two items of the note of funds were these:—

"To sum lent to Misses Whale, Earlstoun, upon their bond and disposition in security to Mr Peter Johnston deceased, assigned to Mr Johnston, L.2000.

"To sum lent to George Baillie, Esq. of Jarviswoode, part of L.2800 in bond and disposition in security to Messrs George and John Johnston, L.1600."

Of this minute and agreement the pursuer brought the present reduction, so far as regarded the said sum of L.1600, and the pursuer's right hereto."

The facts with regard to the security for the L.1600, seem to have been these:—At the term of Whitsunday 1846, Mr Baillie of Jarviswoode required a sum of L.2800, to replace a similar sum called up by a Mr Nisbet, to whom late Mr Baillie had granted a bond and disposition in security over the lands and barony of Langshaw. Through Mr Swan, who also acted as factor for Mr Baillie, the Johnstons agreed to make up among their friends the sum required to meet the demand made by Mr Nisbet. It was arranged that an assignation to the security held by Mr Nisbet should be taken to the lenders George Johnston junior, and John Somerville Johnston, in express absolute terms. At the sametime a declaration of trust was executed in favour of the various parties who had contributed the money, in which, after setting forth the assignation, proceeds,—“We hereby bind and engage ourselves, and our successors, as assignees foresaid, to account for the principal sums advanced by them to us for the purpose of obtaining said assignation, viz., to Thomas Johnston, tenant in Primside, for sixteen hundred pounds,” &c.

As to what passed at the meeting when the agreement was signed, the pursuer alleged—“At the meeting Mr Swan read the above minute and agreement hurriedly; and no further information or explanations were given, no discussion or deliberation took place regarding it. The pursuer was informed what reason there was for holding that the defunct's right to L.1600, contained in the security over Langshaw, was moveable. It was stated when, or under what circumstances, the money was so invested; was the declaration of trust mentioned. The existence and terms of the deed were not known to the pursuer, who had no knowledge of or information regarding this and the other subjects and investments of which the deceased's estate consisted. So far as regards this part of the minute and agreement, for which he had previously given Mr Swan no authority whatever, the pursuer subscribed the minute at the request and by the directions of Mr Swan, without really understanding, or having the means of understanding, the matter, and on the faith of Mr Swan's representation that the right to the L.1600 was of a moveable nature. The pursuer was the more induced to rely on Mr Swan's statements, for that he had acted as the pursuer's agent for some time, and in some matters, although he was then acting for others having an adverse interest to the pursuer, which was not known to the pursuer at the time. The arrangement was a contrivance of Mr Swan's, principally in order to benefit another party not present at the meeting, and without the least regard to the pursuer's legal rights. The pursuer was thus kept in ignorance, and was under essential error as to the nature of his rights, and the effect of this agreement. Any information which was given to him was intended, at least was calculated, to mislead and deceive.

"The statement that the right in the person of the defunct to the L.1600 was moveable, was a misrepresentation. It was an estate heritable in natura, and the defunct's right to, and interest in it, was of an heritable nature. But of all this the pursuer was at the time ignorant, and was kept in ignorance, or rather was misled and misinformed in regard to it, and in the surrender of his right he did not stipulate or receive any value or consideration whatsoever, nor was any value or consideration expressed in the agreement."

The defenders pleaded as preliminary defences;—That the sum L.1600 must be held moveable as in a question as to the right of succession to the deceased Thomas Johnston, in respect, 1, that the investment was the act of the deceased; and, 2, even if it had been, the right vested in him was merely to call upon the trust-assignees to account for and pay to him that sum.

The first of these pleas was based on the following allegation:—"At the time the investment was made in the name of Messrs Johnston, Thomas Johnston did not act in the management of his own affairs from his then state of his health; and from mental imbecility and the failure of his memory, he was incapable of giving directions in regard to his money matters, or other transactions, and, though he continued to sign orders on his bank-account, according to the request of his nephew, he was not aware of, and was not capable of, understanding the purposes for which such orders were signed. His whole farming and other concerns were solely managed by his nephew, George Johnston, and in so far as Mr Swan, who had all along been Thomas Johnston's agent, acted in his affairs at this time he did so under the instructions, and by the authority of George Johnston. In the matter of the advance of the L.1600, which was made on the security of the assignation by Mr Nisbet, and which was made by uplifting gold belonging to Thomas Johnston from a bank, and which had never been previously vested on heritable security, the transaction was carried through solely by the authority and under the instructions of Mr George Johnston, acting as manager in his uncle's affairs: and if Thomas Johnston was himself, either then or at any subsequent period, informed of the fact that such an investment had been made, he was entirely incapable, from the state of his mind, of appreciating its nature, or of understanding its effect."

The preliminary defences were reserved, and a record made up on the merits, the defenders contending that the pursuer's allegations were unfounded in fact and irrelevant to infer reduction, and that at any rate he had acted under and homologated the minute and agreement.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"It is alleged by the pursuer that the sum of L.1600 was advanced by late Thomas Johnston, in order to be invested on heritable security; and No. 154.

 that the said sum, along with other smaller sums advanced by other parties, was invested on the security of the assignation to the heritable bond for Mar. 11, 1857.
 L.2800 referred to on the record; and the assignation was taken in name of Johnston v. Johnston.
 George Johnston and John Johnston, but the same was held by them in trust for the parties severally advancing the money, and, in particular, in trust for Thomas Johnston, to the extent of the L.1600 so advanced by him: Finds that, assuming these averments to be correct, the right of Thomas Johnston in the heritable security to the extent of L.1600 so advanced by him, and held by his trustees for him, was heritable; but that the defender's averments that Thomas Johnston did not effect, and was not a party to the effecting the investment of the said sum on heritable security, remain to be required into, and are now reserved: Finds that, by the minute of agreement sought to be reduced, the pursuer appears to have abandoned and departed from the claim for L.1600 without any consideration whatever, and not on transaction or compromise, or mutual adjustment of opposing interests:
 Finds that the pursuer has alleged facts and circumstances relevant to infer reduction of the said minute: Therefore repels the objection to the relevancy pleaded by the defenders; and appoints the pursuer to lodge issues within eight days." *

The defenders reclaimed, contending that the pursuer's case on record fully amounted to nothing more than,—that he had himself committed an error in judgment in trusting to Mr Swan's advice, and that he was entitled to prevail in his reduction, because Swan was wrong in saying that the nature of the fund was doubtful;—but even if he were wrong, that would not be a ground for reduction.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a speech on the merits. It must be perfectly left to Mr Baillie to maintain all he has now said upon the documents themselves, and the whole circumstances; but this is too early a stage for his argument.

The following interlocutor was pronounced:—"14th February 1857.—
 Call the interlocutor of Lord Ardmillan reclaimed against: Find that the pursuer has averred on the record facts and circumstances relevant to be taken to probation: Reserve all questions of expenses; and allow the parties to lodge issues within ten days."

The following were the issues which were at first proposed by the pursuer:—"It being admitted that the pursuer is nearest and lawful heir of and of conquest of the said deceased Thomas Johnston, late tenant in possession, and is also disponee of the said Thomas Johnston, in his whole lands, heritages, and other subjects of an heritable nature:

1. Whether the defenders, or any of them, did by themselves, himself,

NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the right of Thomas Johnston in the sum of L.1600, standing on heritable security, was heritable. It was his money, advanced by himself, and invested in name of trustees, who declare they hold for his behoof. The declaration of trust qualifies the investment; the subject of the trust is the heritable security, the right of the truster to the heritable investment made with his money, and held for his behoof, cannot be otherwise heritable. Then, assuming as must be done in hoc statu, the truth of the pursuer's statements, that the minute sought to be reduced was brought ready before the meeting by Mr Swan, and that the pursuer, acting with no other person than Mr Swan, and being in ignorance of his rights, signed it to the effect absolutely giving away L.1600 without equivalent or consideration,—the case seems to be within the principle of Dickson v. Halbert, 17th February 1854. It does not appear that anything was done on the faith of the minute before the pursuer objected, so as to bar his doing so; and, on the whole matter, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the facts must be investigated.

No. 154. or herself, or by another or others, induce the pursuer, by misrepresentation of material facts, to enter into the minute and agreement No. 6 of process?
 Mar. 11, 1857. Johnston v. Johnston.

“2. Whether the defenders, or any of them, did by themselves, himself, or herself, or by another or others, induce the pursuer, by concealment of material facts, to enter into said agreement?”

“3. Whether the said minute and agreement, so far as it relates to the sum of L.1600 therein mentioned, and security therefor, was entered into by the pursuer without value, and in ignorance of his legal rights?”

The defenders objected to these issues. So far as laid on fraud they were utterly unsupported by any averment on record.

The averments merely amounted to an allegation that Swan intimated an opinion which may have been correct or otherwise. There was no averment of any concealment of any material circumstances by them (the defenders), or by those for whom they were responsible. Therefore there remained no ground on which the pursuer was entitled to rest, except essential error.

The pursuer replied;—That his averment of concealment of the ground on which Swan rested his opinion, and of the fact of the existence of the declaration of trust, was quite sufficient to support his issues; and if the defenders stood by the agreement, that made them responsible for the act of Swan.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In regard to the case for the pursuer, it appears to me when there are separate grounds of reduction, always to be a simpler matter for the jury to have separate issues. The directions of the Judge can be simpler, and will be more easily understood. Whether the issue of “essential error” alone will enable the pursuer to prove all he avers on record, is another matter. I should think it hazardous before the trial to decide that point. If essential error will enable the pursuer to prove misrepresentation or concealment, then I think it better to make the latter the subject of a separate issue. But it is objected that it is not averred that there was any misrepresentation or concealment by the defenders, or those acting at the time for them, and hence that no issue ought to be granted on these grounds. To that objection I am decidedly opposed. In the first place, it is to be remembered that by the interlocutor of 14th February we have already found that the “pursuer has averred on record facts and circumstances relevant to be sent to probation.” I think the issues should be so framed as distinctly to set forth the averments so made without restricting the case to one ground. The defenders support and adhere to the minute of agreement as duly obtained, and as binding on the pursuer. Now if the family agent present at this meeting (whether intending to favour the defenders or not) did mistake the question which the pursuer had to consider when he entered into the agreement, or concealed, whether wilfully or by ignorance, facts which it was material for the pursuer to know, and if the pursuer was thereby induced to enter into this agreement to his own prejudice, and if the defenders getting the benefit of such agreement by means of that misrepresentation and concealment, adhere to the deed, and insist that it is binding on the pursuer, they adopt the act so brought about, and must meet the allegation of such misrepresentation and concealment, although not aware of it at the time. They make themselves parties to it to the extent to which the pursuer avers it, not as their act, but as an act bringing about the agreement, and if they deny that it was so brought about, and adhere to the deed, he is entitled to prove it against them, just as much as if they had been cognisant of it at the time. The man of business referred to was not to assume, their agent at the time. But he may have intended to favour them. Whether he did or not, when they insist that the agreement is binding on the pursuer, they must meet any relevant ground of reduction;—and that it is a relevant ground for setting aside the agreement, that the pursuer was induced to enter into it by misrepresentation or concealment, cannot, in my opinion, be made matter of controversy.

LORD MURRAY agreed with the Lord Justice-Clerk.

LORD COWAN.—There are no facts averred in the record to permit of an issue

the defender, or others acting for him in the transaction. Had there been such averments, the pursuer would have got the issue usual in such a case, in addition to that Mar. 11, 1857.
 on the ground of essential error. But when the alleged misrepresentation or con- Johnston v.
 cealment is not connected directly or indirectly with the defender, I do not think Johnston.
 there is room for the issue proposed on the specific ground of the one or other as distinct from the general issue. Not that the pursuer is to be excluded from moving any of his allegations in the record. In the trial of an issue on essential error, the whole circumstances in which the minute of agreement was entered into must be laid before the jury. I think that great embarrassment may arise from moving both of the proposed issues. What would become of this case if there were two contrary verdicts—for the one party on the first, and the other on the second issue? If there were a denial of misrepresentation on the first issue, how could we deal with a verdict for the pursuer on the second? I think the splitting of these issues perils the case so far as laid on essential error.

The pursuer then proposed the following amended issues:—

“1. Whether, at a meeting of the relatives of the said deceased Thomas Johnston, held on 9th July 1855, the pursuer was induced, by misrepresentation or concealment of material facts, to enter into the minute of agreement No. 6 of process?”

“2. Whether the said minute of agreement, so far as it relates to the sum L.1600, therein mentioned, and security therefor, was entered into by the pursuer, without value, and under essential error?”

The defenders proposed to take a counter issue, to which they prefixed a narrative of the uplifting the L.1600 from bank, the investing it in the signation, and the declaration of trust:—

“Whether the said investment was not the act of the said deceased Thomas Johnston?”

On this issue they contended that they were entitled to take, as the real question between the parties was the true character of a sum of money, and they could prove that the acts founded on as having changed its character heritable were not the acts of the deceased at all, but of one who managed him, then the pursuer’s whole case was excluded; for no one managing another is entitled to do any act which shall affect his succession.¹

The pursuer objected to the defenders’ issue as wholly inadmissible. It was quite incompetent in such a process to make the acts of the manager a party, not under legal disability, the subject of judicial inquiry.

ORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—There can be no doubt that the defender’s proposed issue as to the alleged imbecility of the old gentleman cannot be entertained in this process. It is open to numerous objections—1. It has no relation to the real merits of his cause, and the only question truly to be decided. The pursuer alleges, on grounds set forth, that he is entitled to get rid of the document by which he renounced, as heir, a claim to the heritable security to which he says he was entitled as heir. He may have no such right as heir. The subject may turn out to be heritable in the view of law. But, in the meantime, his claim is excluded by this deed of renunciation. The defenders stand by that deed, and if he reduces it he cannot raise the question whether the subject was heritable, whether, as heir, he is entitled to it. Now in this reduction, the only issue is, on the grounds for reducing the agreement so far as it relates to the L.1600.
 may he be entitled to reduce the deed, and yet, when he raises the point (which he cannot now do), the subject may turn out not to be heritable. But the defenders say the heritable title was taken when the old gentleman was in mental imbe-cility, and, at all events, not cognisant of how his matters were managed by relatives, and that this state of things had continued for years, and hence, that these relatives could not, by any investment of money, make that heritable by their act which in fact was moveable. This may be proved in another process. But it is

No. 154. Mar. 11, 1857. Hamilton v. Christie. no answer to the case of the pursuer that he was deceived, or in error, in renouncing at once his claim, whether good or bad. 2. The matter could not be finally disposed of in this action, even if the defender's issue were allowed. 3. It is utterly impossible to allow the defender, ope exceptionis, to attempt to establish the imbecility of the old gentleman. There is no instance of such a procedure. They must proceed in the usual way to establish his incapacity, and hence that the investment of the money was not his act. 4. I should, at all events, be prepared to say that the allegations on this record were not sufficient to entitle them to try such a point. But this last matter it is unnecessary to consider. The matter attempted to be raised is quite incompetent in this action.

LORD MURRAY concurred.

LORD WOOD was absent.

LORD COWAN.—I am still of opinion that the only ground of reduction relevantly set forth in the record is essential error, which is the subject of the second issue, and that the first issue proposed by the pursuer ought to be disallowed.

I concur in holding that the issue proposed by the defenders is inadmissible under this record.

THE COURT approved of the issues last proposed by the pursuer, and disallowed that proposed by the defenders.

Process—Reclaiming note—Decree by default—Interlocutor—Clerical error.
Decree by default was pronounced in the Outer House against the pursuers. On a reclaiming note they were reponed. In default of making payment of the expenses found due by the Lord Ordinary, decree was again taken. After this interlocutor had become final, the Lord Ordinary corrected a clerical error, pronouncing decree of new. The Court refused a second reclaiming note as incompetent, and found the reclaimers liable in expenses.

Mar. 11, 1857. 2D DIVISION. Ld Mackenzie. I. THE record in this case was made up and closed, and an order to debate granted on 8th June 1855. On 16th July 1856, an interlocutor was pronounced dismissing the action, "in respect the pursuer had made no appearance at repeated callings in the debate roll." On a reclaiming note, the Court remitted to repone. After hearing parties, the pursuer was reponed on condition of paying eight guineas of expenses within eight days. On 18th December 1856, the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor—"In respect the pursuer has failed to make payment to the defenders L.8, 8s., on the motion of the defender, the Lord Ordinary of new dismisses the action: Finds the pursuer liable in expenses," &c. After this interlocutor had become final, it was noticed that the word "pursuer" was erroneously used for "pursuers." On 17th February the Lord Ordinary pronounced a new interlocutor, in which the mistake was rectified.

The pursuers reclaimed, and prayed the Court to recall the interlocutor complained of as incompetent.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—We cannot permit such a practice. If a party is to be reponed against one decree by default after another, there is no saying when such a system may end.

THE COURT refused the reclaiming note, and found the defenders entitled to the expense of discussing its competency; modified the same to four guineas.

Duff v.
Lady Keith.

Lease—Construction of clause of destination—Mora—Abandonment.—The destination of a lease was in favour of the tenant and his heirs, secluding assignees, unless with consent of the proprietor, without prejudice to an assignation in favour of one of the tenant's children; declaring that when the succession fell to heirs-female without any assignment, the eldest should succeed without division, "such assignment or succession not to become effectual without the proprietor's approval." The proprietor declared no option;—Held (aff. judgment of the Lord Ordinary, abs. Lord Wood), (1) that the eldest heir-female was entitled to the farm; (2) that she was not barred by mora from taking it up, although fourteen years had elapsed after her father's death without her claiming it, in respect she had been all the time in America, and the defenders did not aver that she knew the terms of the lease; (3) on the same ground a plea of abandonment was repelled.

Judicial manager—Expenses—Mandatory.—On allegations of the farm being mismanaged and understocked, as the tenant was in America, the Court appointed a person to manage the farm for behoof of all concerned, but found that the pursuers' mandatory could not be held liable for the expense of the management.

THE late Charles Duff in 1839 entered into a lease of the farm of Milltown 2^d DIVISION.

the crop of that year. The clause of destination in the lease was as follows:
—"To the said Charles Duff and his heirs, but expressly secluding assignees and sub-tenants, legal or voluntary, unless with the special consent and approbation of the proprietrix or those acting for her, but without prejudice to the tenant assigning the lease to any one of his children, and declaring that in all cases where the succession shall devolve on heirs-female, and no special assignment, that the eldest shall always succeed without division; but declaring that no such assignment and succession shall become effectual without being approved of by the proprietrix or those acting for her at the time."

Charles Duff occupied the farm till his death in 1840. He left a widow and three daughters, the oldest, Mrs Crichton, residing in North America; the second, Mrs Gellatly, and her husband, were resident with her father at his death; and the third, Mrs Reid, at her father's death, resided in Aithness-shire. Duff left no son, and did not execute any assignation of the lease of Milltown. The widow resided on the farm till her death in 1846. Mrs Gellatly and her husband afterwards continued to reside there, and managed the farm. On Gellatly's death in 1851, Mrs Gellatly emigrated to America, leaving the farm in the occupation of her son James Gellatly.

This action was raised by Mrs Crichton and Mrs Reid, against Lady Keith, the Count de Flabault, her husband, for his interest, and James Gellatly. The summons concluded for declarator that the lease of the farm of Milltown was, notwithstanding Charles Duff's death, an unexpired and subsisting lease, and that the parties therein specified as his successors were entitled to enter to the occupation of the farm; that the pursuer Mrs Crichton, as his eldest heir-portioner, or, in the option of Lady Keith, she and Duff's two other daughters were his successors in the lease, and that the defenders should be decerned to cease from molesting the pursuer Mrs Crichton, or her and her sisters, in entering upon and continuing to occupy

No. 156. the farm. The pursuers alleged that, being resident, the one in America, and the other in Caithness-shire, at the date of their father's death, they were unaware of their rights under his lease, which they were only informed of in 1854, and shortly afterwards this action was raised.

Mar. 11, 1857.
Duff v.
Lady Keith.

The defenders pleaded;—Heirs-portioners were excluded from the lease and the succession of an eldest heir-female could only take place with the approbation of the proprietrix;—the claim of the pursuers was barred by mora, no claim to occupy the farm having been made for fifteen years after their father's death;—the pursuer Mrs Crichton, by her continued residence abroad since her father's death, must be held to have abandoned any right she might have under the lease, and she was by such residence abroad disqualified from being a tenant under it.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer, Mrs Janet Duff or Crichton, as eldest heir-female of her father, the late Charles Duff, is, under the lease libelled on, the successor in said lease and is entitled to enter into the occupation and tenancy of the lands and others let under said lease; and in respect the defender has not declared any option, in terms of the alternative conclusions of the action, of taking the whole heirs-portioners as the successors in the said lease, finds, decrees and declares in favour of the pursuer, the said Janet Duff or Crichton, in terms of the primary conclusions of the summons: Finds the defender liable in the expenses of process," &c.*

* "NOTE.—There are three points of considerable importance to be separately considered and disposed of. The first is the construction to be put on the clause of destination of the lease. The tenant died, leaving three daughters, and without having executed any special assignment of the lease. The defender pleads that heirs-portioners are excluded, and that the eldest heir-female can only succeed with the approval of the proprietor. The present action is to assert the right of one of the pursuers, the eldest heir-female, but at the same time to give an option to the proprietor to accept, if she chooses, the whole of the heirs-portioners as successors in the lease. The defender declines to recognise the right of succession of the eldest heir-female, and resists the conclusions of the action in toto. Undoubtedly the terms of the above clause are of difficult construction. The difficulty lies in assigning the meaning and import of the words 'and succession' in the last member of the clause, 'no such assignment and succession should become effectual.' Does it qualify the previous declaration, that on the succession devolving on heirs-female, the eldest should always succeed without division? This was contended for by the defender, and if correct, it makes the succession of the eldest heir-female dependent on the approval of the proprietor. And farther, as by the declaration, that when the succession devolves on heirs-female, the eldest should always succeed, heirs-portioners are excluded, the result, this clause being so interpreted, is to exclude female succession altogether, and at the will of the proprietor to forfeit all right in the children of the tenant, being only females. There is certainly room under the words 'and succession,' to hold by that construction, but the Lord Ordinary has been unable to adopt it. He thinks that the words used are not clear in their meaning as to necessitate a construction so severe in its operation. He thinks there is ambiguity in the meaning of the words 'and succession,' coupled with they are with those preceding—'no such assignment and succession,' and without some additional words as—'of the eldest' or 'eldest heir-female,' following the words 'and succession,' there is obscurity in the construction contended for. The preceding member of the clause declares positively that the eldest should always succeed without division, in the case of succession devolving on heirs-female and no special assignment, and it is thought that the effect of this declaration is insufficiently qualified as to the eldest by the words of the declaration following. In a case such as the present, the Lord Ordinary apprehends it was the duty of the proprietor to make lucis clarius a stipulation, which was to take away the common law rights of the heirs of the tenant, by leaving them wholly dependent on the proprietor's will."

Lady Keith reclaimed. It was pleaded;—The lease excluded heirs-portioners, as was usual in agricultural leases; and the stipulation that

No. 156.

Duff v. Lady Keith.

dent upon her pleasure. In the outset of the lease, the lands are let to the tenant and his heirs generally. It was for the landlord to take off the effect of this destination, by distinct stipulation, to meet apprehended circumstances; and if it was intended that females were to be excluded of all right to succession at common law as heirs-portioners, while the limitation to the eldest was to be defeasible by the landlord, it ought to have been made very plain indeed. The rule of law appears applicable—‘in stipulationibus cum quaeritur quid actum sit, verba contra stipulationem interpretanda sunt.’ It is not to be supposed that a tenant, and the circumstances of the present case are adverse to it, would readily take a lease, which made his heirs, as they existed at the time, incapable of succeeding to the benefit of the lease, except at the mere pleasure of the landlord. The Lord Ordinary thinks that, upon a fair and sound construction of the lease, the eldest heir-female is entitled to succeed. Suppose the tenant had left an only daughter, would she have been excluded? Plainly not, when the clause is in the plural—heirs-female. But if the female succession is not wholly excluded, except with consent of the landlord, should not the declaration in favour of the landlord of the succession in favour of heirs-female being to the eldest be construed as giving an absolute right of succession to the eldest, and not a defeasible one?

“If the Lord Ordinary should be mistaken on the first point, the other defences of the proprietor are superseded. On the opposite view, the second point of mora is to be considered. The defender raises that plea solely on the facts appearing on the pursuer’s condescendence. There is no statement by the defender, which is a significant circumstance. The plea of mora rests on the time which has elapsed between the date of the father’s death and the bringing of the present action. No doubt the number of years is very great. But the eldest daughter avers that she was ignorant of her rights—resident abroad at the time of her father’s death, where she has continued to reside—and that the terms of the lease were unknown to her; and it appears, indeed, not to have been in possession of the family, and a copy of it only obtained some few months before raising this action. These averments of the pursuer are not denied upon record. The answer is merely that they are not admitted. Then as to the possession of the farm, it appears all along to have been in the members of the family. The widow and her second daughter continued to occupy until the widow’s death, after which this daughter and her husband continued in the occupation till June 1854, after which the daughter’s son remained in the occupation, and still continues in it. These facts are admitted by the defender. If the legal right to the lease is in the elder pursuer, it is conceived that the delay in asserting her right will not forfeit it. And, indeed, the defender been able to aver that, relying on presumed abandonment of the lease, the lands had been let to other parties, and new contracts entered into; or even that there had been an adoption of the second daughter as tenant on presumed dereliction of the lease by the elder, there might have been grounds for holding the pursuer precluded from now claiming possession of the lands. But there is nothing on record alleging that the defender’s interests have been injured by the pursuer’s delay, or will suffer by vindicating her right to the lease. As to the sister, who has been in possession since the widow’s death, and her husband the present possessor, they are both called as defenders in this action, and do not resist its conclusions. Under these circumstances, the Lord Ordinary considers it unnecessary to examine the application of the plea of mora to discharge the right of the heir to a lease. He thinks the facts upon the record in this case do not support the plea of mora with effect.

The third point is raised by the additional plea in law added by the defender to the debate. It is that the defender’s continued residence abroad since her father’s death is to be held as an abandonment of her right under the lease,—that it is a disqualification of her being tenant, and bars her present claim. The validity of the plea of abandonment of her rights must, like the plea of mora, rest on her knowledge of her rights under the lease, and which she forbore to claim. But no knowledge is not averred by the defender, and the pursuer’s allegation of her abandonment of her rights is not even denied by the defender. Mere residence

Buchanan v.
Cowan.

The Court having intimated an opinion that Mrs Crichton was entitled to succeed, it was stated by the defenders' counsel that the farm had not been properly managed during last crop,—that part of the stocking had been sold,—what remained of it then was entirely insufficient, and had been sequestrated, and moved that in the meantime, and until it was possible for the pursuer Mrs Crichton, who was in America, to state whether she intended to enter to and stock the farm, measures should be taken to have it properly laboured, so as to protect the interests of the proprietrix.

The following interlocutor was pronounced:—"Adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against: Find the defenders liable in additional expenses, and remit, &c.; and in respect of the pursuer Mrs Jane Duff or Crichton being at present in America, and of the statement now made at the bar, by the defenders' counsel, and not denied by the pursuer's counsel, in regard to the present condition of the farm and lands of Milltown of Tullybeagles, described in the summons, on the motion now made for the defenders, Find that a manager ought now to be appointed to take possession of the said farm and lands, and labour and manage the same for behoof of the pursuer concerned, and appoint William Menzies, factor to the defenders, to be such manager accordingly, with all the powers usual and necessary, reserving all questions between the said pursuers and the said defenders of liability inter se arising out of the said appointment, by declaring that the pursuer's mandatory is free from all such liability and decern."

abroad cannot of itself operate a forfeiture. Though there are no conventional irritancies in the lease, the pursuer, if she obtains decree in this action, is of course bound by the common law obligations incumbent on a tenant. She has stated of record her readiness to implement the lease, and proposed by minute, if required, to express her resolution to take possession and reside. Her present residence abroad, while this process is in dependence, is conceived to be immaterial, the defender resisting altogether her right as heir to the lease. She will, it is thought, be entitled to reasonable notice that personal residence is insisted on. In the case of Living v. Millar, June 29, 1813, Fac. Coll., where the heir in a lease, who had signified personal occupancy and residence, had gone with her husband to America, and an action of declarator of irritancy was brought against her on account of not residing upon the farm, time was allowed to her to return and reside.

left a trust-disposition and settlement in favour of his two sons, the defender James Cowan, and one William Marshall. His widow was to enjoy the liferent of certain subjects, which, after her death, were to go to his son Walter in life-rent, and to his children in fee. Another heritable subject was to go to James in liferent, and his children in fee; and another to the children of the defender Cowan in fee; but this last was under burden of payment of £50 to a third party, and of payment of feu-duties applicable to the subjects liferented by his widow. His trustees, who were also executors, were farther to pay the widow a sum for mournings, and a sum of L.200, in security of which the rents of the heritable subjects were assigned to her. It was alleged that Buchanan left considerable personal estate, and few debts, with the exception of one to the defender, amounting to L.200. And in the 8th article of his condescendence, it was stated, "the pursuer, although named an executor, never accepted the office, and he had no intromissions, either with the moveable estate of the deceased, or with the rents of the heritable properties disposed by the settlement. The defender, who was a son-in-law of the testator, assumed the entire management of the personal estate of the deceased, and, as the pursuer believes, alone intromitted with the same. The defender never made up any title as executor, and although frequently called upon to produce a state showing his intromissions with the moveable estate of the deceased, and the appropriation thereof, he has hitherto refused to do so. The defender has farther intromitted with the rents of the heritable subjects, other than those liferented by the widow, and, in particular, has intromitted with the rents of the property disposed to the pursuer in liferent and his children in fee, and also with the rents of the subjects conveyed to the testator's grandsons, John and James Cowan. The rents of the aforesaid mentioned subjects, and of the property conveyed to the pursuer in liferent and his children in fee, were assigned to the widow, in security of her provision of L.200. The defender, and the widow of the deceased, have jointly or severally drawn and uplifted the rents of the said heritable properties for payment, as alleged by them, of the said provision of L.200, payable to the widow, and of the said debt of L.200, due to the defender by the testator at the time of his death. The pursuer was aware that the personal estate of the deceased was insufficient to satisfy the claims of the widow and the defender, and that for a short period the rents of the property conveyed to him in liferent would be required in order to their liquidation. Notwithstanding although these claims have been long ago fully satisfied and paid, the pursuer, up to the present moment, has not drawn a single farthing of the rents of the said property, the liferent of which belongs to him in terms of the father's settlement."

On these allegations the pursuer brought the present action, in order to bring the defender to account for his intromissions with the deceased's estate, whether personal or moveable, either separately or jointly and severally with the pursuer's Margaret M'Kinlay or Buchanan, the widow.

The defences, besides making various explanations as to the state of the deceased's funds and affairs, contained the following statements:—(Stat. 2.) On the death of Mr Buchanan, which took place upon the 9th August 1839, the four executors nominate appointed by him, including the pursuer, accepted of the office, but made up no title by confirmation, as they were not required to do so by any debtor, to the moveable estate of the deceased, and there was no reason why the expense of obtaining confirmation should be entailed as a burden upon the estate, which was already far exceeded by the liabilities. The executors, as such, held several meetings, at which minutes were drawn out and signed by those present, and on these occasions the pursuer was present, and adhibited his subscription to the minutes, along with his co-executors; and from the time of Mr Buchanan's death, until a very recent period, the pursuer acted and concurred with his co-executors

No. 154. the deceased's estate consisted. So far as regards this part of the minute and agreement, for which he had previously given Mr Swan no authority whatever, the pursuer subscribed the minute at the request and by the directions of Mr Swan, without really understanding, or having the means of understanding, the matter, and on the faith of Mr Swan's representation, that the right to the L.1600 was of a moveable nature. The pursuer was the more induced to rely on Mr Swan's statements, for that he had acted as the pursuer's agent for some time, and in some matters, although he was then acting for others having an adverse interest to the pursuer, which was not known to the pursuer at the time. The arrangement was a contrivance of Mr Swan's, principally in order to benefit another party not present at the meeting, and without the least regard to the pursuer's legal rights. The pursuer was thus kept in ignorance, and was under essential error as to the nature of his rights, and the effect of this agreement. Any information which was given to him was intended, at least was calculated, to mislead and deceive.

Mar. 11, 1857.
Johnston v.
Johnston.

"The statement that the right in the person of the defunct to the L.1600 was moveable, was a misrepresentation. It was an estate heritable sua natura, and the defunct's right to, and interest in it, was of an heritable nature. But of all this the pursuer was at the time ignorant, and was kept in ignorance, or rather was misled and misinformed in regard to it, and for the surrender of his right he did not stipulate or receive any value or consideration whatsoever, nor was any value or consideration expressed in the agreement."

The defenders pleaded as preliminary defences;—That the sum of L.1600 must be held moveable as in a question as to the right of succession to the deceased Thomas Johnston, in respect, 1, that the investment was not the act of the deceased; and 2, even if it had been, the right vested in him was merely to call upon that sum.

Johnston v.
Johnston.

The defenders reclaimed, contending that the pursuer's case on record really amounted to nothing more than,—that he had himself committed an error in judgment in trusting to Mr Swan's advice, and that he was entitled to prevail in his reduction, because Swan was wrong in saying that the nature of the fund was doubtful;—but even if he were wrong, that would not be a ground for reduction.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a speech on the merits. It must be perfectly open to Mr Baillie to maintain all he has now said upon the documents themselves, and the whole circumstances; but this is too early a stage for his argument.

The following interlocutor was pronounced:—"14th February 1857.—Recall the interlocutor of Lord Ardmillan reclaimed against: Find that the pursuer has averred on the record facts and circumstances relevant to be sent to probation: Reserve all questions of expenses; and allow the parties to lodge issues within ten days."

The following were the issues which were at first proposed by the pursuer:—"It being admitted that the pursuer is nearest and lawful heir of line and of conquest of the said deceased Thomas Johnston, late tenant in Primside, and is also disponee of the said Thomas Johnston, in his whole lands, heritages, and other subjects of an heritable nature:

"1. Whether the defenders, or any of them, did by themselves, himself,

* "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the right of Thomas Johnston to the sum of L.1600, standing on heritable security, was heritable. It was his own money, advanced by himself, and invested in name of trustees, who declare that they hold for his behoof. The declaration of trust qualifies the investment; the subject of the trust is the heritable security, the right of the truster to the heritable investment made with his money, and held for his behoof, cannot be otherwise than heritable. Then, assuming as must be done in hoc statu, the truth of the pursuer's statements, that the minute sought to be reduced was brought ready prepared to the meeting by Mr Swan, and that the pursuer, acting with no other advice than Mr Swan, and being in ignorance of his rights, signed it to the effect of absolutely giving away L.1600 without equivalent or consideration,—the case seems to be within the principle of Dickson v. Halbert, 17th February 1854. It does not appear that anything was done on the faith of the minute before the pursuer objected, so as to bar his doing so; and, on the whole matter, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the facts must be investigated.

 Johnston v.
 Johnston.

“2. Whether the defenders, or any of them, did by themselves, himself, or herself, or by another or others, induce the pursuer, by concealment of material facts, to enter into said agreement?”

“3. Whether the said minute and agreement, so far as it relates to the sum of L.1600 therein mentioned, and security therefor, was entered into by the pursuer without value, and in ignorance of his legal rights?”

The defenders objected to these issues. So far as laid on fraud they were utterly unsupported by any averment on record.

The averments merely amounted to an allegation that Swan intimated an opinion which may have been correct or otherwise. There was no averment of any concealment of any material circumstances by them (the defenders), or by those for whom they were responsible. Therefore there remained no ground on which the pursuer was entitled to rest, except essential error.

The pursuer replied;—That his averment of concealment of the ground on which Swan rested his opinion, and of the fact of the existence of the declaration of trust, was quite sufficient to support his issues; and if the defenders stood by the agreement, that made them responsible for the acts of Swan.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In regard to the case for the pursuer, it appears to me, when there are separate grounds of reduction, always to be a simpler matter for the jury to have separate issues. The directions of the Judge can be simpler, and will be more easily understood. Whether the issue of “essential error” alone will enable the pursuer to prove all he avers on record, is another matter. I should think it hazardous before the trial to decide that point. If essential error will enable the pursuer to prove misrepresentation or concealment, then I think it better to make the latter the subject of a separate issue. But it is objected that it is not averred that there was any misrepresentation or concealment by the defenders, or those acting at the time for them, and hence that no issue ought to be granted on these grounds. To that objection I am decidedly opposed. In the first place, it is to be remembered, that by the interlocutor of 14th February we have already found that the “pursuer has averred on record facts and circumstances relevant to be sent to probation.” I think the issues should be so framed as distinctly to set forth the averments so made, without restricting the case to one ground. The defenders support and adhere to the minute of agreement as duly obtained, and as binding on the pursuer. Now, if the family agent present at this meeting (whether intending to favour the defenders or not) did mistake the question which the pursuer had to consider when he entered into the agreement, or concealed, whether wilfully or by ignorance, facts which it was material for the pursuer to know, and if the pursuer was thereby induced to enter into this agreement to his own prejudice, and if the defenders, getting the benefit of such agreement by means of that misrepresentation and concealment, adhere to the deed, and insist that it is binding on the pursuer, they adopt the act so brought about, and must meet the allegation of such misrepresentation or concealment, although not aware of it at the time. They make themselves parties to it to the extent to which the pursuer avers it, not as their act, but as an act bringing about the agreement, and if they deny that it was so brought about, and adhere to the deed, he is entitled to prove it against them, just as much as if they had been cognisant of it at the time. The man of business referred to was not, I assume, their agent at the time. But he may have intended to favour them. But whether he did or not, when they insist that the agreement is binding on the pursuer, they must meet any relevant ground of reduction;—and that it is a relevant ground for setting aside the agreement, that the pursuer was induced to enter into it by misrepresentation or concealment, cannot, in my opinion, be made matter of controversy.

LORD MURRAY agreed with the Lord Justice-Clerk.

LORD COWAN.—There are no facts averred in the record to permit of an issue

executors, where the pursuer was also present, but that Marshall was much assisted by the defender, who is an accountant in a bank in Glasgow, and to whom the factors appointed by the whole executors communicated their accounts and balances, which were by the defender reported and accounted for to the executors: Finds that the defender was a creditor of the late James Buchanan, and was, in terms of an arrangement by the executors, paid his debt by them, and this was partly done by their applying to that purpose the balances handed to the defender, as aforesaid, by the factors and by him, as aforesaid, accounted for to the executors, and partly by bills granted to him by the executors, including the pursuer, for balances from time to time remaining due, after taking credit for such partial payments: Finds that the defender is not proved to have received any of the rents or funds of the estate from the tenants or debtors, but only from the factors as aforesaid, and then from the executors, in payment of his debt: And, And, Finds, further, in point of fact, that the pursuer accepted and acted as an executor of the late James Buchanan, attended meetings, took part in the business, signed minutes, bills, and other documents, as executor, and concurred with the defender and the other executors in the appointment of factors to uplift the rents, in the taking credit to the executry for the partial payments to the defender's debt made out of the rents, and in granting bills to the defender for the balances so brought out. Appoints the cause to be rolled, that the parties may be heard on such points of law as they are advised to urge in respect of these findings." *

"12th February 1857.—The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for the parties, on the note for the pursuer and proof, and considered the same avizandum, refuses the motion of the pursuer for alteration of the findings in fact, contained in the interlocutor of 20th December 1856, and adheres to the findings in the said interlocutor, and appoints the cause to be again rolled, that parties may be heard on such point of law, as they may be advised to urge, in respect of the said findings in fact." †

The pursuer presented a reclaiming note, praying the Court to recall or alter the interlocutor complained of, in so far as it affirms such findings in fact contained in the former interlocutor of date 20th December 1856, as are ultra vires of, and inconsistent with, the questions directed to be tried before the Lord Ordinary in the interlocutor of date 3d July 1856, and thereafter remit to the Lord Ordinary to prepare findings in terms thereof, &c. It was argued, that the finding in the interlocutor, wherein it was found that Cowan had accounted, was wholly ultra vires of the Lord Ordinary, as it was no part of the question settled for trial. The directions of the Court were that he should "find on each such question separately," and, as he did so, his findings were to be final. Where questions of law and fact

"NOTE.—The above special findings in fact seem to exhaust what is required by the interlocutor of 3d July last. It is understood that vitious or unauthorized intromission is not now alleged, and it is proved that whatever part the defender took as one of the executors, was with the concurrence of the pursuer. What the defender did as a creditor, in receiving from all the executors payment of his debt, it is difficult to perceive how any intromission by him, as is now alleged, can be involved. But on these points the pursuer will be heard, if he has it."

"NOTE.—At the close of the trial of the questions of fact, it was the express wish of both parties, that the Lord Ordinary should pronounce special findings in fact, so as to preserve ample materials for disposing of such questions of law as might be afterwards raised. This he has done, and, on reconsidering the evidence, with the pursuer's argument, he is quite satisfied that the findings, to which he now adheres, are according to the truth of the case, as appearing from the evidence led, and the documents in process."

Lease—Construction of clause of destination—Mora—Abandonment.—The destination of a lease was in favour of the tenant and his heirs, secluding assignees, unless with consent of the proprietor, without prejudice to an assignation in favour of one of the tenant's children; declaring that when the succession fell to heirs-female without any assignment, the eldest should succeed without division, "such assignment or succession not to become effectual without the proprietor's approval." The proprietor declared no option;—Held (aff. judgment of the Lord Ordinary, abs. Lord Wood), (1) that the eldest heir-female was entitled to the farm; (2) that she was not barred by mora from taking it up, although fourteen years had elapsed after her father's death without her claiming it, in respect she had been all the time in America, and the defenders did not aver that she knew the terms of the lease; (3) on the same ground a plea of abandonment was repelled.

Judicial manager—Expenses—Mandatory.—On allegations of the farm being mismanaged and understocked, as the tenant was in America, the Court appointed a person to manage the farm for behoof of all concerned, but found that the pursuers' mandatory could not be held liable for the expense of the management.

THE late Charles Duff in 1839 entered into a lease of the farm of Milltown of Tullybeagles, in the county of Perth, the property of Lady Keith, to endure for nineteen years from the term of Whitsunday 1840, and the separation of the crop of that year. The clause of destination in the lease was as follows:—"To the said Charles Duff and his heirs, but expressly secluding assignees and sub-tenants, legal or voluntary, unless with the special consent and approbation of the proprietrix or those acting for her, but without prejudice to the tenant assigning the lease to any one of his children, and declaring that in all cases where the succession shall devolve on heirs-female, and no special assignment, that the eldest shall always succeed without division; but declaring that no such assignment and succession shall become effectual without being approved of by the proprietrix or those acting for her at the time."

2D DIVISION.
Lord Handyside.

Charles Duff occupied the farm till his death in 1840. He left a widow and three daughters, the oldest, Mrs Crichton, residing in North America; the second, Mrs Gellatly, and her husband, were resident with her father at his death; and the third, Mrs Reid, at her father's death, resided in Caithness-shire. Duff left no son, and did not execute any assignation of the lease of Milltown. The widow resided on the farm till her death in 1846. Mrs Gellatly and her husband afterwards continued to reside there, and managed the farm. On Gellatly's death in 1851, Mrs Gellatly emigrated to America, leaving the farm in the occupation of her son James Gellatly.

This action was raised by Mrs Crichton and Mrs Reid, against Lady Keith, the Count de Flahault, her husband, for his interest, and James Gellatly. The summons concluded for declarator that the lease of the farm of Milltown was, notwithstanding Charles Duff's death, an unexpired and subsisting lease, and that the parties therein specified as his successors were entitled to enter to the occupation of the farm; that the pursuer Mrs Crichton, as his eldest heir-portioner, or, in the option of Lady Keith, she and Duff's two other daughters were his successors in the lease, and that the defenders should be decerned to cease from molesting the pursuer Mrs Crichton, or her and her sisters, in entering upon and continuing to occupy

No. 156. the farm. The pursuers alleged that, being resident, the one in America, and the other in Caithness-shire, at the date of their father's death, they were unaware of their rights under his lease, which they were only informed of in 1854, and shortly afterwards this action was raised.

Mar. 11, 1857.
Duff v.
Lady Keith.

The defenders pleaded;—Heirs-portioners were excluded from the lease, and the succession of an eldest heir-female could only take place with the approbation of the proprietrix;—the claim of the pursuers was barred by mora, no claim to occupy the farm having been made for fifteen years after their father's death;—the pursuer Mrs Crichton, by her continued residence abroad since her father's death, must be held to have abandoned any right she might have under the lease, and she was by such residence abroad disqualified from being a tenant under it.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer, Mrs Janet Duff or Crichton, as eldest heir-female of her father, the late Charles Duff, is, under the lease libelled on, the successor in said lease, and is entitled to enter into the occupation and tenancy of the lands and others let under said lease; and in respect the defender has not declared any option, in terms of the alternative conclusions of the action, of taking the whole heirs-portioners as the successors in the said lease, finds, decerns, and declares in favour of the pursuer, the said Janet Duff or Crichton, in terms of the primary conclusions of the summons: Finds the defender liable in the expenses of process," &c.*

* "NOTE.—There are three points of considerable importance to be separately considered and disposed of. The first is the construction to be put on the clause of destination of the lease. The tenant died, leaving three daughters, and without having executed any special assignment of the lease. The defender pleads that heirs-portioners are excluded, and that the eldest heir-female can only succeed with the approval of the proprietor. The present action is to assert the right of one of the pursuers, the eldest heir-female, but at the same time to give an option to the proprietor to accept, if she chooses, the whole of the heirs-portioners as successors in the lease. The defender declines to recognise the right of succession in the eldest heir-female, and resists the conclusions of the action in toto. Undoubtedly the terms of the above clause are of difficult construction. The difficulty lies in assigning the meaning and import of the words 'and succession' in the last member of the clause, 'no such assignment and succession should become effectual.' Does it qualify the previous declaration, that on the succession devolving on heirs-female, the eldest should always succeed without division? This is contended for by the defender, and if correct, it makes the succession of the eldest heir-female dependent on the approval of the proprietor. And farther, as by the declaration, that when the succession devolves on heirs-female, the eldest should always succeed, heirs-portioners are excluded, the result, this clause being so interpreted, is to exclude female succession altogether, and at the will of the proprietor, forfeit all right in the children of the tenant, being only females. There is certainly room under the words 'and succession,' to hold by that construction, but the Lord Ordinary has been unable to adopt it. He thinks that the words used are not so clear in their meaning as to necessitate a construction so severe in its operation. He thinks there is ambiguity in the meaning of the words 'and succession,' coupled as they are with those preceding—'no such assignation and succession,' and that without some additional words as—'of the eldest' or 'eldest heir-female,' following the words 'and succession,' there is obscurity in the construction contended for. The preceding member of the clause declares positively that the eldest should always succeed without division, in the case of succession devolving on heirs-female and no special assignment, and it is thought that the effect of this declaration is insufficiently qualified as to the eldest by the words of the declaration following. In a case such as the present, the Lord Ordinary apprehends it was the duty of the proprietor to make lucē clarius a stipulation, which was to take away the common law rights of the heirs of the tenant, by leaving them wholly dependent upon her pleasure. In the outset of the lease, the lands are let to the tenant and his heirs generally. It was for the landlord to take off the effect of this destination, by distinct stipulation, to meet apprehended circumstances; and if it was intended that females were to be excluded of all right to succession at common law as heirs-portioners, while the limitation to the eldest was to be defeasible by the landlord, it ought to have been made very plain indeed. The rule of law appears applicable—‘in stipulationibus cum quæritur quid actum sit, verba contra stipulationem interpretanda sunt.’ It is not to be supposed that a tenant, and the circumstances of the present case are adverse to it, would readily take a lease, which made his heirs, as they existed at the time, incapable of succeeding to the benefit of the lease, except at the mere pleasure of the landlord. The Lord Ordinary thinks that, upon a fair and sound construction of the lease, the eldest heir-female is entitled to succeed. Suppose the tenant had left an only daughter, would she have been excluded? Plainly not, when the clause is in the plural—heirs-female. But if the female succession is not wholly excluded, except with consent of the landlord, should not the declaration in favour of the landlord of the succession in case of heirs-female being to the eldest be construed as giving an absolute right of succession to the eldest, and not a defeasible one?

“If the Lord Ordinary should be mistaken on the first point, the other defences of the proprietor are superseded. On the opposite view, the second point of mora is to be considered. The defender raises that plea solely on the facts appearing from the pursuer’s condescendence. There is no statement by the defender, which is a significant circumstance. The plea of mora rests on the time which has elapsed between the date of the father’s death and the bringing of the present action. No doubt the number of years is very great. But the eldest daughter states that she was ignorant of her rights—resident abroad at the time of her father’s death, where she has continued to reside—and that the terms of the lease were unknown to her; and it appears, indeed, not to have been in possession of the family, and a copy of it only obtained some few months before raising this action. These averments of the pursuer are not denied upon record. The answer is merely that they are not admitted. Then as to the possession of the farm, it appears all along to have been in the members of the family. The widow and her second daughter continued to occupy until the widow’s death, after which this daughter and her husband continued in the occupation till June 1854, after which this daughter’s son remained in the occupation, and still continues in it. These facts are admitted by the defender. If the legal right to the lease is in the elder pursuer, it is conceived that the delay in asserting her right will not forfeit it. Had, indeed, the defender been able to aver that, relying on presumed abandonment of the lease, the lands had been let to other parties, and new contracts entered into; or even that there had been an adoption of the second daughter as tenant on presumed dereliction of the lease by the elder, there might have been grounds for holding the pursuer precluded from now claiming possession of the farm. But there is nothing on record alleging that the defender’s interests have suffered by the pursuer’s delay, or will suffer by vindicating her right to the lease. And as to the sister, who has been in possession since the widow’s death, and her son, the present possessor, they are both called as defenders in this action, and do not resist its conclusions. Under these circumstances, the Lord Ordinary considers it unnecessary to examine the application of the plea of mora to discharge the right of an heir to a lease. He thinks the facts upon the record in this case do not admit of the defender pleading mora with effect.

“The third point is raised by the additional plea in law added by the defender after the debate. It is that the defender’s continued residence abroad since her father’s death is to be held as an abandonment of her right under the lease,—that it is a disqualification of her being tenant, and bars her present claim. The validity of the plea of abandonment of her rights must, like the plea of mora, rest on her knowledge of her rights under the lease, and which she forbore to claim. But that knowledge is not averred by the defender, and the pursuer’s allegation of her ignorance of her rights is not even denied by the defender. Mere residence

No. 156. the eldest daughter, or any of them to whom the tenant might assign it, should succeed to the lease only with the approval of the proprietrix, was a reasonable one to protect the proprietor from being obliged to receive a husband of one of the daughters, who might not be a desirable tenant.

Buchanan v.
Cowan.

The Court having intimated an opinion that Mrs Crichton was entitled to succeed, it was stated by the defenders' counsel that the farm had not been properly managed during last crop,—that part of the stocking had been sold,—what remained of it then was entirely insufficient, and had been sequestrated, and moved that in the meantime, and until it was possible for the pursuer Mrs Crichton, who was in America, to state whether she intended to enter to and stock the farm, measures should be taken to have it properly laboured, so as to protect the interests of the proprietrix.

The following interlocutor was pronounced:—"Adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against: Find the defenders liable in additional expenses, and remit, &c.; and in respect of the pursuer Mrs Janet Duff or Crichton being at present in America, and of the statement now made at the bar, by the defenders' counsel, and not denied by the pursuer's counsel, in regard to the present condition of the farm and lands of Milltown of Tullybeagles, described in the summons, on the motion now made for the defenders, Find that a manager ought now to be appointed to take possession of the said farm and lands, and labour and manage the same for behoof of all concerned, and appoint William Menzies, factor to the defenders, to be such manager accordingly, with all the powers usual and necessary, reserving all questions between the said pursuers and the said defenders of liability inter se arising out of the said appointment, but declaring that the pursuer's mandatory is free from all such liability, and decern."

left a trust-disposition and settlement in favour of his two sons, the defender Cowan, and one William Marshall. His widow was to enjoy the liferent of certain subjects, which, after her death, were to go to his son Walter in life-rent, and to his children in fee. Another heritable subject was to go to James in liferent, and his children in fee; and another to the children of the defender Cowan in fee; but this last was under burden of payment of L.50 to a third party, and of payment of feu-duties applicable to the subjects liferented by his widow. His trustees, who were also executors, were farther to pay the widow a sum for mournings, and a sum of L.200, in security of which the rents of the heritable subjects were assigned to her. It was alleged that Buchanan left considerable personal estate, and few debts, with the exception of one to the defender, amounting to L.200. And in the 8th article of his condescendence, it was stated, "the pursuer, although named an executor, never accepted the office, and he had no intromissions, either with the moveable estate of the deceased, or with the rents of the heritable properties disposed by the settlement. The defender, who was a son-in-law of the testator, assumed the entire management of the personal estate of the deceased, and, as the pursuer believes, alone intromitted with the same. The defender never made up any title as executor, and although frequently called upon to produce a state showing his intromissions with the moveable estate of the deceased, and the appropriation thereof, he has hitherto refused to do so. The defender has farther intromitted with the rents of the heritable subjects, other than those liferented by the widow, and, in particular, he has intromitted with the rents of the property disposed to the pursuer in liferent and his children in fee, and also with the rents of the subjects conveyed to the testator's grandsons, John and James Cowan. The rents of the last mentioned subjects, and of the property conveyed to the pursuer in liferent and his children in fee, were assigned to the widow, in security of her provision of L.200. The defender, and the widow of the deceased, have jointly or severally drawn and uplifted the rents of the said heritable properties for payment, as alleged by them, of the said provision of L.200, payable to the widow, and of the said debt of L.200, due to the defender by the testator at the time of his death. The pursuer was aware that the personal estate of the deceased was insufficient to satisfy the claims of the widow and the defender, and that for a short period the rents of the property conveyed to him in liferent would be required in order to their liquidation. But although these claims have been long ago fully satisfied and paid, the pursuer, up to the present moment, has not drawn a single farthing of the rents of the said property, the liferent of which belongs to him in terms of his father's settlement."

On these allegations the pursuer brought the present action, in order to bring the defender to account for his intromissions with the deceased's estate, whether personal or moveable, either separately or jointly and severally with Mrs Margaret M'Kinlay or Buchanan, the widow.

The defences, besides making various explanations as to the state of the deceased's funds and affairs, contained the following statements:—(Stat. 2.) "On the death of Mr Buchanan, which took place upon the 9th August 1839, the four executors nominate appointed by him, including the pursuer, accepted of the office, but made up no title by confirmation, as they were not required to do so by any debtor, to the moveable estate of the deceased, and there was no reason why the expense of obtaining confirmation should be entailed as a burden upon the estate, which was already far exceeded by its liabilities. The executors, as such, held several meetings, at which minutes were drawn out and signed by those present, and on these occasions the pursuer was present, and adhibited his subscription to the minutes, along with his co-executors; and from the time of Mr Buchanan's death, until a very recent period, the pursuer acted and concurred with his co-executors

No. 157. in all their actings connected with the management of the estate under their charge. The actual management of, and intromission with the funds belonging to it, was assumed by William Marshall, one of their number, who resided in Kirkintilloch, the place of residence of the deceased, and the place also where his estate of every description was situate." (Stat. 5.) " In these circumstances it was arranged, for the benefit of all parties concerned, and with the approbation and consent of all the executors, that a factor should be employed to uplift the rents assigned to the widow, under the superintendence of William Marshall, the resident executor, and that, after satisfying the wants and necessities of the widow, the surplus of these rents should be applied in extinction of the testator's debts, which, in strict law, formed a preferable charge upon them. Accordingly, three factors were successively appointed for the widow, who levied the rents of the said heritage over which the executors had no power, and small payments were made, as before stated, from time to time to the defender in extinction of the debt due to him by the testator until fully paid, and also towards other purposes provided in the deed of settlement, the remainder of the rents so drawn being appropriated by the widow in satisfaction of the liferent and other provisions in her favour, all as will appear from the accounts of the factors so appointed and acting."

Buchanan v.
Cowan.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutors:—"3d July 1856.—The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for the parties, and made avizandum, and considered the closed record, debate, productions, and whole process, Finds that it is desirable and expedient that the following questions of fact, raised in the record, be investigated without trial by a jury:—1st, Whether, as alleged by the pursuer in the eighth article of the revised condescendence, the defender John Cowan assumed the management of the personal estate of the late James Buchanan, and did by himself, or any factor or other person appointed by him, and acting for his behoof, intromit with the personal estate of the said late James Buchanan, and with the rents of the heritable property of the said late James Buchanan, and what was the nature and extent of the said intromissions with the personal estate and rents as aforesaid? And 2dly, Whether, as alleged by the defender in the second and fifth articles of the revised statement of facts for him, the pursuer accepted and acted as an executor of the said late James Buchanan, and as such concurred with the co-executors in the management of the executry estate, and in an arrangement for the appointment of a factor to uplift the rents of the heritable estate of the late James Buchanan? And appoints the cause to be enrolled, to fix a day for the trial proceeding before the Lord Ordinary."

"20th December 1856.—The Lord Ordinary having heard the cause without a jury, on the 10th current, on the questions of fact specified in his interlocutor of 3d July last, and having thereafter, on the 18th current, heard counsel for the parties on the proof led at the trial, and made avizandum, and considered the closed record, debate, proof, and productions—1st, Finds in point of fact, that the defender John Cowan did not 'assume the entire management of the personal estate of the late James Buchanan,' and did not by himself, or any factor or other person appointed by him, or for his behoof, intromit with the said personal estate, or with the rents of the heritable property of the late James Buchanan, as alleged by the pursuer in the eighth article of the revised condescendence: Finds that all the persons, including the pursuer himself, who were named executors by James Buchanan, accepted and acted as executors, but no confirmation was expedite: Finds that Mr Marshall, one of these executors, and residing in Kirkintilloch, took much personal charge of the business, and kept the book, No. 139 of process, to show his intromissions, and that any entries by the defender in that book were made in presence and by desire of Marshall, and at meetings of executors, where the pursuer was also present, but that Marshall was much assisted by the defender, who is an accountant in a bank in Glasgow, and to whom the factors appointed by the whole executors communicated their accounts and balances, which were by the defender reported and accounted for to the executors: Finds that the defender was a creditor of the late James Buchanan, and was, in terms of an arrangement by the executors, paid his debt by them, and this was partly done by their applying to that purpose the balances handed to the defender, as aforesaid, by the factors and by him, as aforesaid, accounted for to the executors, and partly by bills granted to him by the executors, including the pursuer, for balances from time to time remaining due, after taking credit for such partial payments: Finds that the defender is not proved to have received any of the rents or funds of the estate from the tenants or debtors, but only from the factors as aforesaid, and then from the executors, in payment of his debt: And, 2d, Finds, further, in point of fact, that the pursuer accepted and acted as an executor of the late James Buchanan, attended meetings, took part in the business, signed minutes, bills, and other documents, as executor, and concurred with the defender and the other executors in the appointment of factors to uplift the rents, in the taking credit to the executry for the partial payments to the defender's debt made out of the rents, and in granting bills to the defender for the balances so brought out. Appoints the cause to be enrolled, that the parties may be heard on such points of law as they are advised to urge in respect of these findings." *

Buchanan v.
Cowan.

"12th February 1857.—The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for the parties, on the note for the pursuer and proof, and considered the same at avizandum, refuses the motion of the pursuer for alteration of the findings in fact, contained in the interlocutor of 20th December 1856, and adheres to the findings in the said interlocutor, and appoints the cause to be again enrolled, that parties may be heard on such point of law, as they may be advised to urge, in respect of the said findings in fact." †

The pursuer presented a reclaiming note, praying the Court to recall or alter the interlocutor complained of, in so far as it affirms such findings in fact contained in the former interlocutor of date 20th December 1856, as are ultra vires of, and inconsistent with, the questions directed to be tried before the Lord Ordinary in the interlocutor of date 3d July 1856, and thereafter to remit to the Lord Ordinary to prepare findings in terms thereof, &c.

It was argued, that the finding in the interlocutor, wherein it was found that Cowan had accounted, was wholly ultra vires of the Lord Ordinary, as that was no part of the question settled for trial. The directions of the statute were that he should "find on each such question separately," and, if he did so, his findings were to be final. Where questions of law and fact

* "NOTE.—The above special findings in fact seem to exhaust what is required under the interlocutor of 3d July last. It is understood that vitious or unauthorised intromission is not now alleged, and it is proved that whatever part the defender took as one of the executors, was with the concurrence of the pursuer. In what the defender did as a creditor, in receiving from all the executors payment of his debt, it is difficult to perceive how any intromission by him, as is here alleged, can be involved. But on these points the pursuer will be heard, if he wishes it."

were mixed up in the findings, the Court could review and correct his findings. The part of the interlocutor to which the pursuer felt entitled to object, was from the words "accounts and balance" down to "payments."

The defender replied — That the question by implication related to a number of facts, from which intromission was to be made out, and the nature and extent of the intromissions was also set down for investigation, so that, if the questions were well framed, the findings were strictly competent under them—the rehearing of the statute had reference simply to whether the facts were well founded, not to the competency of the findings. If the Court found that there had been an entire miscarriage, that might be a ground for ordering a new trial, but none for altering the interlocutor complained of.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I consider any such question of the highest importance in regard to the successful working and operation of the 48th section of the Act. I think the distinction between it and the 46th section shews clearly what was intended—namely, not that a general issue should be tried, but particular questions of fact as to which the parties could not agree—such questions of fact as should be exhaustive of the debateable matter, and so framed that the answer should be just a repetition of the question.

Whatever the views of the Lord Ordinary in point of law in this case may have been, we must look at it as a direction as to the matter of fact. He has, instead of framing a question for a simple answer—yea or nay—framed one that embraces a general enquiry, and that can only be safely conducted according to the words he uses: otherwise a party, by consenting to this mode of trial, might be led into general findings, quite different from what he intended as to the matter embraced in them.

According to the view I take of the question, "nature and extent of intromission," I understand that he should have found whether, with concurrence of his co-executor, he had done what he did, and that he had drawn the whole rents, or some part of them, during so many years, and the amount I expected to have been also stated. But by the answer we have got, we don't know anything, except that he accounted to the other executors, but we get no information, either as to the nature or as to the extent of the intromissions. It is no answer to the question that was put to say that, if you compared one side of the account and the other, it appears he has discharged himself of all the money he received. But though that question has no place here, it will be quite open to the defender to insist afterwards for that result. But the Lord Ordinary has pronounced a finding that he has accounted. Now I cannot by any interpretation of the words "nature and extent," think that he was entitled to exhaust the case. The part of the interlocutor beginning "and this was partly done," &c., seems to me to be beyond any conceivable interpretation of the question.

That the Lord Ordinary had it in view so to exhaust the case is clear, because he has done it, but that only shews what a mistake it was to frame such a general question. The House of Lords will not interpret issues, or allow the views of the Judges who grant them to have any weight whatever.

The Lord Ordinary has interpreted this question by what he intended, — but I think that, in his findings, he has gone far beyond the question, and that from "which were by the defender," down to "such partial payments," they cannot be allowed to stand. This will leave the whole matter open for investigation, and the defender will be entitled to prove that he has discharged himself of that balance in any lawful manner.

LORD MURRAY.—I agree. This question is not a good one—it is much too general. The points put should be definite. There may be any number of points, but they should be clear. I think, too, the Lord Ordinary has committed a mistake in his answer, but we may retain so much of it as promotes the cause, and strike out the remainder.

LORD COWAN.—I look upon this as a most important case in practice, and as regards the effective working of the statute; and the first point is to consider how an interlocutor should be framed, bringing out the questions into which the case resolves. It is most important that it should be known that the interlocutor should be most specific. Parties should be fully satisfied that all the material facts in dispute, and intended to be subject of proof, are within the interlocutor. I remember consulting with Lord Rutherford when in the Outer-House, and we agreed that the way was carefully to eliminate whatever the parties were not in dispute about, and whatever we thought was not material to the case; and then bring out in distinct questions what remained, so that an answer of yes or no should suffice, as your Lordship said.

Thom v.
Bridges.

The importance of this provision is its finality as regards all matters of fact, for it is only as regards questions of law that the Lord Ordinary's judgment is to be subject to review.

Now I come to the second point,—Can we here review the judgment in the case before us? I am of opinion that the prayer of the reclaiming note is competent. I think, if the Lord Ordinary pronounces findings which are not embraced in the order for proof, a party is quite entitled to complain; so if he returns as answers matters which are not within the questions, he has clearly gone beyond his jurisdiction.

Let us look at the first question put in the interlocutor of 3d July, and see what it was that was put in issue. I hold that it excluded anything like a question of accounting; that was matter not for trial before the Lord Ordinary under the interlocutor of July; and if so, does not the interlocutor of December go beyond the question?—"balances which were by the defender reported and accounted for to the executors," &c. These words imply that the defender has accounted for his intrusions. This was clearly ultra vires and beyond the matter sent for trial.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Find that the following parts of the findings of the Lord Ordinary in his interlocutor of 20th December 1856, 'which was by the defender reported and accounted for to the executors: Finds,' &c., down to 'after taking credit for such partial payments,' went beyond the question sent to be tried by the Lord Ordinary, according to the true import and meaning of that question: Therefore find the above findings to be incompetent, and recall the same, quoad ultra: Find the whole other findings in the said interlocutor, being within the terms of the question framed by the Lord Ordinary, are competent and final; but declare that the defence that the defender has fully accounted for the whole funds, which he, as executor, received, remains entire and unaffected by this interlocutor, so that the matter of his accounting and discharge remains to be investigated before the Lord Ordinary in the way he may think fit, and remit to the Lord Ordinary, with power to proceed farther in the cause, consistently with the remaining findings in the said interlocutor of the 20th day of December last; reserving all questions of expenses."

Title to sue—2 & 3 Vict., cap. 41—Bankrupt—Trustee—Reparation—Solatium—Expenses.—A bankrupt discharged on payment of a dividend (not of a composition), while the sequestration still subsisted, brought an action for reparation for injury to credit and solatium for injury to reputation and feelings, arising out of conduct prior to the date of the sequestration. On the action being intimated to the trustee, he exposed to sight himself in room of the pursuer. Held (aff. judgment of Lord Benholme, abs. Lord Wood) that he was entitled to do so, having a right to insist on all the claims made,—even that for solatium. Question, whether the bankrupt had a right to recover from the trustee the expenses of the record? Mar. 11, 1857.

JAMES THOM raised an action against the dissolved firm of Bridges and Macqueen, law agents, Edinburgh, and James Bridges, Writer to the Signet, 2d Division. Ld. Benholme. R.

No. 158. and John Moir Macqueen, Solicitor before the Supreme Courts, sole partners of the said dissolved firm, and against the said James Bridges, as an individual, concluding to have them ordained, “conjunctly and severally, or severally, and according to their respective liabilities in the premises, to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of L.10,000 sterling, in name of damages and solatium.” He alleged that, throughout all the transactions he complained of, Bridges and Macqueen had been his agents, but the action was mainly directed against Bridges, who, it was alleged, had, contrary to his duty, defeated several loans which were on the point of being effected over an estate he possessed, and had further frustrated a proposed sale of the lands, at a price which would have enabled him to meet all his liabilities; and had, further, the more to get him under his control, imprisoned him on a charge to pay a bill, and got his estates sequestrated; in all which he maintained that the defenders had acted in gross violation of their duty, and to the serious injury of the pursuer’s credit, character, reputation, and feelings.

Mar. 11, 1857.
Thom v.
Bridges.

Under the sequestration, Thom had been discharged upon a payment of sixpence per pound before raising the action, but his trustee was not discharged.

Apart from denial of the facts averred, and of their relevancy even if true, the defenders pleaded; — That the pursuer had no title to sue, and, “even supposing that any grounds of action had been set forth sufficient to infer liability for damages, the pursuer had no right to recover these, in respect that any claim of damage competent to him, was transferred to his creditors by the sequestration, and he had not been reinvested in his estate, not having been discharged upon composition.”

Intimation of the action was ordered to be made to Mr Raleigh, the trustee on the pursuer’s sequestrated estate, and he lodged a minute sisting himself “as pursuer of said action in the room and stead of the said James Thom.” This was opposed by Thom, but the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor: — “Having heard parties’ procurators on the proposal of the trustee on the pursuer’s sequestrated estate to sist himself in place of the pursuer, James Thom,—Sists the said trustee, Samuel Raleigh in terms of the minute.” *

Thom reclaimed, praying the Court to refuse the motion of Samuel Raleigh “to be sisted as pursuer of the said action in the room and stead of the reclamer; or at least to find that, in so far as regards the conclusion of the summons for damages in solatium, the reclamer is entitled to insist in the action.”

It was maintained for him;—That, being discharged regularly under the Bankrupt Act, he had a full title to pursue all claims whatever; but, even if this trustee were entitled to insist in the conclusions for direct damages for injury to the estate,—so far as the claim was for solatium for injury to his feelings from imprisonment or otherwise,—it was a claim of so personal a nature that it could not have been vested by the sequestration in the trustee.¹

It was replied;—That, if these claims were good, they should have been given up in the sequestration as part of the bankrupt’s estate; and that, if so given up, they had nevertheless, by force of statute, vested in the trustee, and he was entitled to pursue equally for the damages and solatium; the transmissible nature of which last had been subject of express decision.²

* “NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the summons does not raise any relevant case of damages or solatium, that would not pass by sequestration of the trustee on the bankrupt pursuer’s estate.”

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am afraid the trustee here is entitled to insist in this No 158. action.

I say nothing as to a question of defamation, or a case where character is involved, but speak merely of the case before us of solatium for imprisonment. This may have implied great hardship on the individual, but the sequestration has supervened, and the trustee is entitled now to say, I claim what is due as solatium as a part of the estate. We have no question here such as where a trustee has refused to assist himself; for, on this action being intimated, he takes it up, and is entitled to recover from the defender if he prevail. I think the case of solatium for imprisonment is one which the trustee is entitled to pursue, although the bankrupt might go on if he declined.

Mar. 11, 1857.
Hamilton.

I do not say anything as to a separate case being possible where the trustee might have no title, but I think that, for injury to credit, if that led to the bankruptcy, or to property to the detriment of the estate belonging to the creditors, the trustee is fairly entitled to pursue.

LORD MURRAY.—I entirely agree. I think the Lord Ordinary is quite right. If the trustee did not prosecute, the case would be a quite different one, but he is going to prosecute here.

Milne v. Gauld's Trustees went beyond the circumstances here, and determined the right of the representatives of a husband after his death to prosecute an action for damages for the wrongous imprisonment of the wife. That was a much stronger case than the present, and I consider it settles the law to be applied to it.

LORD WOOD was absent.

LORD COWAN.—Were it necessary that this case should depend upon the decision in Milne v. Gauld's Trustees, I should desiderate more argument, for the views expressed in the other Division in 1850 seem to shake the authority of that case. I do not think, however, that we need found on that case, in order to dispose of the one before us.

If this claim were one in which the trustee could not insist, the party might be entitled to go on. But, under the reclaiming note, no attempt is made to turn the trustee out of the action, and there is no ground of action separate from that made by the trustee. The whole claims made are to be measured by pecuniary damages, and the whole grounds of action had arisen before sequestration. The effect, then, of the sequestration was to vest every right in the trustee, if he chose to take it. It would have been very well for Thom to maintain his right to insist if the trustee had not come forward; but, now that the trustee has insisted himself in this action, I hold him to have the exclusive interest in all the claims concluded for in the summons.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Refuse the said reclaiming note, and adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against; reserving to the reclaimer the expenses of record so far as prepared before the trustee appeared, if not recovered from the defenders, or if the trustee cannot shew cause to the contrary, and to the trustee his claim for the expenses of this discussion, and reserving to the defender his claim for expenses."

Entail—I. What are improvements in the sense of the Entail Amendment Act 18.

The expense of building a wool-carding mill and repairing a corn mill objected as not being improvements under the Entail Amendment Act, and objection overruled.

The expense of building a bridge over a river which intersected an entailed estate, and of approaches to the bridge, sustained as improvement expenditure, for the Entail Amendment Acts.

II. Abolition Act 5 Geo. IV. c. 87.—Held that institute heirs of entail come under

No. 159. the provisions of the Aberdeen Act, authorising heirs of entail to grant provisions to younger children.

III. 11 & 12 Vict. cap. 36, sects. 14, 18, 19, 20, 21, 25.—Question, Whether, under the Entail Amendment Acts, in constituting improvement debts, the sum which may be charged is limited by any reference to the rental, as in the Montgomery Act; but Held (dub. Lord Ivory (1), that if free rental be the measure of the amount of an improvement debt to be constituted under the Entail Amendment Acts, it is the rental, not as at the first term of Whitsunday after the heir's death, but as at the date of the decree constituting the debt; (2), that the interest of the debt so to be constituted does not form a deduction in estimating the free rental; (3), that where a debt has been already constituted against the estate, it is only necessary, in calculating under the 18th section, the four years free rent, to take into account the sum actually charged on the fee.

Question, whether, and to what extent, a contingent jointure and provisions to younger children form deductions in estimating the free rental.

1st Division.
Ld Mackenzie.
C.

THE petitioner was heir of entail in possession of the estate of Pinmore. The present was an application, 1st, to have it found that the fee of the estate was in 1854, and still is, 'validly charged' with L.2684, 18s. 8d. of improvement debt; 2d, That the petitioner had, since the date of the statute of 1848, expended L.7205, 14s. 5d. upon additional permanent improvements, and in respect thereof was entitled to charge the fee with a farther sum of L.4803, 2s. 11d.; 3d, To have it found that he was also entitled to charge the fee with L.4931, 3s. 6d. of children's provisions granted by the last heir of entail; and the ultimate object of the application was, 4th, That the Court, after having ascertained the total amount of debt chargeable against the fee of the entailed estate, might select a fitting portion of the lands, and authorise it to be sold by the petitioner, in order to pay off the debt.

The application was founded mainly upon the 14th, 21st, and 25th sections of the Act 11 & 12 Vict. c. 36.

The sum of L.7205, 14s. 5d. under the second head of the application, consisted of L.6449, 13s. 9d. expended in improvements on the entailed lands, and of L.705, 0s. 8½d., expended in improvements on the mansion-house.

On 21st May 1856, the Lord Ordinary remitted to Mr James Duncan Writer to the Signet, and to Mr John Dickson, farmer, Saughton Mains, to examine and to report.

Various points noticed in the reports of Mr Duncan and Mr Dickson were now brought under the notice of the Court by the Lord Ordinary.

I. Under the head of improvements executed since 1848, it was proposed to disallow L.741, 1s. 10d. for building a wool-carding mill and repairing a corn mill, as not being improvements of the nature contemplated by the Act. The petitioner acquiesced in this proposal.

A sum of L.421, 1s. 10d. expended in building a bridge over a river which intersects part of the entailed lands, and in making approaches to the bridge was reported on specially. Mr Duncan was of opinion that it came within the scope of the 20th section of the Act 11 & 12 Vic. c. 36, as to "private road through any entailed estate, or by way of immediate access thereto." Mr Dickson stated that the bridge, "although not literally a road, is the only way of access to the farm of Laggansarroch, the old road to the farm being by a dangerous ford, in crossing which the former tenant was drowned, and the present tenant agreed to pay an additional rent on having a bridge built."

The Lord Ordinary reported favourably, and the Court allowed the expenditure.

II. The next point was whether the petitioner was entitled to charge the fee of the estate with L.4931, 3s. 6d. of provisions for younger children.

The sum was within the amount authorised by the Aberdeen Act, but the reporter brought under the notice of the Court the fact that Mr Hamilton, the grantor of bonds of provision, was the institute under the deeds of entail, and not strictly and technically the "heir of entail" in possession; whereas the Aberdeen Act does not, in express words at least, authorise an institute of entail to exercise the powers granted by that Act. The reporter's opinion was, that the provisions had been competently granted, and that a sound construction of the Aberdeen Act would include the institute.¹

Hamilton.

The Lord Ordinary concurred in this opinion.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I have no doubt about this point. The meaning of the statute is quite plain. The reporter has arrived at a right conclusion.

LORD DEAS.—We are not to read the statute as if it were a deed of entail. The question is, what is the popular meaning of the phrase "heir of entail?" most certainly that phrase is held to include the institute. In construing the statutes which apply to entails, the proper course is to take the reading which is most favourable to freedom, and that rule cannot possibly prevent us reading a statute like this, according to the plain and ordinary meaning of the words.

LORD IVORY.—To construe the statutes otherwise would be to place a man who should make an entail in his own favour, with power to alter it, in a worse position than the parties in whose favour he has made it. You are not to construe an entail strictly against the fetters, but liberally as to the enabling clauses within it, and much more here in regard to a statute where there is a broad general principle meant to be introduced for the benefit of all parties holding estates under these limitations. It would be straining it very hard to exclude the petitioner in this case from the benefit of the statute.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—This may be illustrated by taking a case under the Lands Clauses Act. Could it be said that the statute authorising an heir of entail to sell his lands to a Railway Company did not include the institute heir?

LORD PRESIDENT.—There is a general rule for construing statutes which are intended to correct an evil and give a remedy, and that rule simply is to extend that remedy as far as we can.

III. The last point was, what was to be taken as the free rental on which to calculate the improvement expenditure?

The rental of the estate produced by the petitioner showed the annual rents to amount to L.3190, 13s. 9d., from which fell to be deducted,—

1, Public burdens, L.345, 14s. 6d;

2, Annuity to the Ayr Academy, L.10;

3, Interest on provisions to the petitioner's sisters, L.200;

4, Interest on bond for improvements at 4 per cent, L.107, 7s. 3d.;

5, Interest on L.4309, 1s. 9d. (being two-thirds of L.6499, 13s. 9d. and of L.705, 0s. 8½d., less L.741, 1s. 10d. disallowed as above mentioned) expended by the petitioner on the entailed lands and mansion-house, and which, under the present application, might be constituted a burden on the fee of the estate, at 4 per cent, L.172, 5s.;

6, Contingent life annuity of L.700 to the petitioner's wife, but to be restricted to L.350 in the event of her entering into a second marriage, L.700.

The first five heads made in all a sum of L.835, 6s. 9d. to be deducted, which left a free rental on which to calculate improvement expenditure (keeping out of view the contingent jointure), L.2355, 7s., which would give for improvements on the lands, L.9421, 8s. (four years' free rents); and for improvements on the mansion-house, &c., L.4710, 14s. (two years' free rents.) The expenditure on the mansion-house was greatly within the statutory limits.

Under this head the reporter suggested two points for consideration,—

(1.) "With regard to the expenditure on the lands, the improvement debt already constituted by decree in 1850 applies wholly to improvements on the lands as distinguished from the mansion-house, and amounts to L.4027, 8s., with two-thirds of which, or L.2684, 18s. 8d., the petitioner has already charged the fee of the estate."

"The important question arises here, whether the improvement debt charged by the petitioner upon the fee of the estate requires to be taken into account in estimating whether the improvement debt with which the petitioner proposes to charge the estate does not exceed the statutory limit. It humbly appears to the reporter that the limit prescribed by the 13th section of the Montgomery Act is still in force to the effect that no one heir is entitled, during his own life, to become a creditor of the next heirs of entail or of the estate for more than four years' free rents; but that the 19th section of the Rutherfurd Act seems to give an heir this advantage, that in estimating the four years' free rents in a case like the present, he does not require to take into account 3-4ths of the whole expenditure, but only the sum actually charged on the fee. In other words, the petitioner here seems only, in calculating the four years' free rents, to require to state the actually existing improvement debt, namely L.2684, 18s. 8d.; whereas before the passing of the Rutherfurd Act he would have required to have stated it at L.4027, 8s., being a difference of L.1342, 9s. 4d."

(2.) "In estimating the four years' free rents at the above sum of L.9421, 8s. no deduction has been made from the yearly rental in respect of the contingent jointure of L.700 to the petitioner's lady. It has not yet, it is believed, been decided whether, in calculating the improvement debt, it is indispensable for the heir to deduct such a provision, which, although already granted, has not yet come into operation." The reporter referred to the case of Lady Keith,¹ as bearing on but not ruling this point; "all that was decided in that case having been that the possible contingency of the rental at the term after the petitioner's death being reduced by provisions to husbands, wives, or children, not granted at the date of the application to charge the estate with improvement debt, but capable of being granted by the heir in possession subsequent to that date, did not require to be taken into account."

The reporter was of opinion "that the equitable mode of dealing with the contingent burden, as regards its effects upon the statutory amount of improvement expenditure, would be to have the present value of the contingent jointure fixed by an actuary, and instead of deducting four years of the full amount of the jointure, which in this case would be L.2800, to deduct four years of the interest on the present value of the annuity."—That present value had been ascertained to be slightly under L.3000, the interest of which, at four per cent, would be about L.120 a-year. If four years' interest, or L.480 were deducted from the above sum of L.9421, 8s., that would still leave a considerable surplus margin within the statutory limit; whereas, if L.2800—four years of the full jointure—were deducted, the expenditure for which decree was sought, added to that for which it had been obtained, would exceed the statutory limit. The reporter held that it was "not necessary to deduct from the rental the full amount of this contingent provision. Under the old law, the Montgomery Act, while it allowed an heir of entail to obtain in his own lifetime a decree of declarator which fixed the amount expended by him, did not until after his death positively determine the amount chargeable against the succeeding heirs of entail: that was made to depend upon the state of the annual charges upon the land, 'as the same shall happen to be at the first term of Whitsunday after the death of the heir who expended the money claimed.' On the other hand, the Entail Amendment Act, instead of leaving the amount of improvement debt undetermined until after the improver's death, permits him to have it determined at present, and charged upon the lands. The reporter humbly thinks that in the matter of improvement debt, as well as in all other respects, the general spirit of the Entail Amendment Act was to enlarge the powers of heirs of entail, and therefore that the Court may be disposed to give a liberal interpretation to the provisions of the Entail Amendment Act, where these, as in the present case, do not seem to adjust themselves well with the unrepealed provisions of prior Acts."

On 27th February 1857, having advised with the Court, the Lord Ordinary again remitted "to Mr Duncan to consider the point, whether, in estimating the free rental, any deduction should be made for the interest of the improvement expenditure now sought to be made a burden on the estate."

"It humbly seems to the reporter that it can scarcely be doubted but that the 10th section of the Montgomery Act and the 16th section of the Rutherford Act do not very well adjust themselves to each other; for while the 10th section of the Montgomery Act postpones the period at which the calculation as to the amount of the debt chargeable is to be made—to the first term after the heir's death—the 16th section of the Rutherford Act, while permitting the debt to be fixed and ascertained at present, in the heir's lifetime, does not make a corresponding alteration, to the effect of declaring that in calculating the four years' free rents there shall only be deducted the liferents, interest of debts, &c., which exist at present, instead of the unknown quantity of interests of debts, liferents, &c., as these shall exist after the heir's death. It may be that the legislature may purposely have refrained from allowing the calculation of the expenditure about to be constituted in the heir's own lifetime to be based upon the liferents, debts, &c., as existing at present, because the practical effect of this would have been to have allowed the heir of entail, in calculating at present the four years' rents, to have got quit of the deduction of the provisions to his own family, including both the jointure to his widow and the provisions to his younger children. Accordingly the Court in construing the power to constitute improvement debt at present, have (notwithstanding the impossibility of complying literally with the direction to deduct burdens, &c., as these shall exist at the heir's death) avoided going to the other extreme of holding that it was the present burdens only which should be deducted. They have therefore (following, as the reporter humbly thinks, the plain spirit in place of the letter of the Act) held, as in the case of Lady Keith and Nairn, that the interest of contingent provisions to children already granted by an heir of entail, although not yet come into operation (and which, being contingent provisions, may never come into operation), require to be deducted. The report of that case bears that, in calculating the statutory limit of the improvement expenditure, the sum of 'L.222,' being the interest of children's provisions granted by the petitioner Lady Keith, and therefore depending on the contingency of her being survived by her children, was deducted in estimating the free rental.

"The petitioner holds that the case of Lady Keith is an authority in his favour, and that on the principle on which that decision rests, it should be held in this case that the interest of the improvement debt should not form a deduction from the rental. It is humbly thought, however, that it is not clear that the decision in that case goes so far as to warrant such an inference. It seems to the reporter that all that was decided in that case was, that the interest of provisions which the heir in possession had it in her power to make, but had not, in point of fact, made, at the date of the petition, did not require to be deducted. And the reason of the decision seems to be plain. Such possible future provisions depended not on such a contingency as survivance (the value of which can be made the subject of arith-

No. 159. metical calculation), but depended on the contingency of whether the heir might or might not choose to exercise her power to enlarge the children's provisions,—the value of which contingency, of course, being incapable of computation.

Hamilton.

“It may be observed, however, that the improvement debt, which is the subject of consideration at present, seems to be in a very different position from that in which the possible future additional provisions to children in Lady Keith's case stood. This improvement debt has not only been constituted by decree against the next heirs,—it is not merely capable of being made a charge upon the fee of the entailed lands,—but the very object of the present application is to make good the improvement debt out of the very solum of the estate, by getting the Court to authorise part of the lands to be sold in order to pay it off. In the sense of the Rutherford and Montgomery Acts, therefore, this improvement debt humbly appears to the Reporter to be in the same position as regards the point in question as if it were already a burden.

“It seems evident that this question could not have arisen before the passing of the Rutherford Act, because the interest of debts which fell to be deducted under the 10th section of the Montgomery Act was that of debts ‘which may affect the estate’ (sect. 10.) But the principle of the Montgomery Act was to make the improvement debt affect the immediately succeeding heir, not the estate, whereas the principle of the Rutherford Act is just to reverse this, and to relieve the heir of the burden, and to charge it on the estate. The question humbly seems to the reporter to resolve itself into this, namely,—Is the improvement debt in question a debt which ‘may affect the estate’ at the term after the heir's death? To which the reporter humbly thinks there can be no other answer than that it not only may, but that it certainly shall. If, in Lady Keith's case, there was deducted the interest of contingent children's provisions already granted, but which, being contingent, might not affect the estate at the heir's death, much more clear is it, in the reporter's humble view, that the interest of this debt, which is not contingent, must be deducted.

“The heir in possession is not obliged to adopt the provisions of the Rutherford Act on this subject; he may if he please abide by the provisions of the Montgomery Act. But if he adopts the former, it is feared he must read the 10th section of the Montgomery Act as imported into the 16th section of the Rutherford Act, as meaning, not merely that interests of debts which under the Montgomery Act alone would have been deducted, but also those of debts affecting the estate under whatever Act imposed.”

On 10th March the case was again called. The petitioner pleaded;—That this point must be solved by the provisions of the new Entail Act,—and not with reference to the Montgomery Act. It would be unreasonable to import by implication into these Acts a provision that you are to do something which it is almost impossible to do; for who can tell what is to be the condition of the estate at the death of the petitioner? You cannot anticipate. You cannot tell what will be the rent, much less the nett rent. The plain answer to the difficulty is, that this new Act of Parliament has introduced a new point of time at which the condition of the estate is to be considered; and that point of time is the time when judgment is pronounced fixing the amount of debt that is to be constituted. Had the Montgomery Act not suggested a time, no other time would have been thought of than this plainly pointed out by the new Act. But, if the time suggested by the old Act be inapplicable, the time pointed out under the new Act must be taken; and, therefore, the question now is, what is the amount, as at this date, of four years free rental? So taking it, the difficulty is solved, for the burden is not yet imposed. What is proposed to be deducted is the interest on the improvement debt ; but what the amount of that debt is you cannot yet tell. No. 159.

At advising on 10th March,—

Mar. 11, 1857.
Hamilton.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The important question here is, Whether the item No. 5 in the list of deductions from the rental ought properly to be a deduction in estimating the rental? For if that item is not deducted, the sum sought to be constituted does not exceed what, in any view of the meaning of the statute, the petitioner is entitled to have charged against the estate. I have carefully considered Mr Duncan's report, and I confess that it does not appear to me to afford satisfactory reasons for that deduction. I see no ground on which it can be made a deduction. It is not a burden on the estate, nor can it under the strict letter of the statute be so construed ; therefore, it cannot be deducted as "a burden on the estate." I do not mean to express any opinion as to the extent to which these provisions of the Montgomery Act are imported into this statute. It is not necessary to do so for this case. There are questions, and important questions, that may be raised as to that point, but I abstain from expressing any opinion in regard to them, for the reason I have just mentioned. The reporter seems to think that this Montgomery Act is imported into the Entail Amendment Act to this effect,—that you must ascertain what will be the rental of the estate as at the death of the party who has made the improvements, and that the burdens then attaching to the estate are to be made a deduction from that rental ; and he says that this sum we are now dealing with not only may affect the estate at the death of the party in the words of the Montgomery Act, but must affect it. It is not very clear how that is to be accomplished ; I do not myself see how you are to take the rental as at the death of the party in reference to transactions which are to be completed now, and more especially considering how such burdens may be exhausted or redeemed before his death. I cannot see how you are to conjecture what the rental is to be at the date of his death ; but at any rate I do not see how this sum is to be deducted, for I hold that the principle is to take the rental as at the date of the transaction which is to constitute the burden on the estate.

But, further, I do not think that under the Montgomery Act this item would form a deduction, and I am not aware that any such deduction was ever attempted to be made under that Act. The principle which operated in constituting a debt under that Act was to attach it to succeeding heirs. It is a different thing altogether that is to be done now, and under the strict letter of the Entail Amendment Act this sum clearly could not be deducted, nor do I see any satisfactory ground on which you can import from the Montgomery Act, or read in this Act a deduction of this sort. I therefore think that this deduction ought not to be made, and if so, the prayer of the petition being in that case within the statutory limit, there is no occasion for deciding more in this case.

LORD IVORY.—I cannot say that I have a clear opinion upon this matter. This is a very important question, and has arisen now for the first time. The case of Lady Keith is not applicable, for the discussion there was as to provisions, which had not been granted even contingently,—although there existed powers of granting which had not been exercised,—and all that the Court did was to hold that burdens which might be made to affect the estate through the exercise of powers existing but which had not been exercised, did not require to be taken into calculation ; but they said nothing as to the provisions which had been granted, and were contingent in their nature, for it was not necessary to do so, as whether they were deducted or not there was a margin of free rent. That case not being authority, there is no other authority of which I am aware.

Then we get at once into an apparent conflict of expression between two statutes, and I do not see my way to the extrication of the difficulty on the footing on which this petition is presented. It assumes that the extreme limit to which an heir can go in his own lifetime in constituting improvement debts is four years free rental. I doubt whether that can be read out of the one statute or the other. I am not able to follow the reporter with reference to the way he deals with the free rents, for he mixes the question up with the debts chargeable on the estate, and with which it has nothing to do. If this point is such a novelty, we ought to hear more argument before we commit ourselves to what will be a precedent. The difficulty arises here, that the Montgomery Act says that the heir shall be entitled to

No. 159. make any expenditure he pleases, provided always that no more than four years free rent shall form a charge against the succeeding heir. The rental comes to be considered only when it is sought to charge the expenditure against the succeeding heirs, and as the margin of relief is four years free rent, it is clear that the statute pointed to an expenditure, not of four years free rent, but a sum of which four years free rent was only three fourths. That Act looks to the expenditure with reference to the liability of the heir, and the deductions spoken of in it have reference to a period which I hold to be absolutely excluded by the Entail Amendment Act. It is very difficult to say that the two systems can be worked together. The limitation of the expenditure is in section 16. The expressions in sections 14 and 16 of the Rutherfurd Act are embarrassing. I doubt whether, under that Act, we have anything to do with burdens; but if we are to take them into account, this much is clear,—we cannot take them as they shall stand at the time of the death. That is excluded by every possible construction of the statute. But I am very much puzzled, and the question altogether is so new that I should like to hear a discussion of the principle on which these two statutes are to be construed together. But if the only question we have to deal with is the one to which your Lordship adverted, I have no difficulty about it.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—When this petition was under consideration some time ago, it was stated to us that if this sum be not deducted from the rental, there is a sufficient margin to give this petitioner all he asks for. I take that statement as it was given. If there is any error in the calculations, that is a different matter altogether. But I have not any hesitation in making up my mind that it is impossible in this inquiry as to the amount of the rental to hold that this sum is a burden now existing, and as to which we have not determined whether it shall be a burden or not. That is the only question I have been considering, and it is the only question upon which I am now to give an opinion. The matter at first appeared to me clear to demonstration; but, as the reporter has presented it in a different view, I have reconsidered it, and having done so, I can now say that the longer I look into the matter the clearer it becomes. I cannot see the vestige of a doubt on the subject; and I am a good deal surprised that any doubt should be thrown on it, for there is not any judgment pronounced by your Lordships under the Aberdeen Act that is correct if these doubts are at all good.

The application now before us is for authority to sell part of this entailed estate for payment of an improvement debt of about L.7000. The improvements have been made since 14th August 1848. As to those improvements made before that date, they have already been dealt with and made a burden on the estate, and accordingly the application is to sell for two-thirds, not of three-fourths, but of the whole subsequent expenditure. Now it has been suggested that this sum is larger than that which the Entail Amendment Act authorises, and the objection is reared up in this way,—it is said (1) that there is a limit put upon the amount for which certain burdens may be created; that the total amount of the expenditure shall not exceed four years free rent of the estate; and (2), that on ascertaining the amount of the free rent, you are to make certain deductions, and that one of those is the interest of the very sum that you are going to rank as a burden on the estate, and for which a portion of the estate is to be sold. Now, as to the first assumption, I will not say anything. I have given it a good deal of consideration, and I may be prepared to give my opinion upon it when it is presented to us for decision. I believe that, generally speaking, there has been an idea that there is such a limitation in the Act, and many applications, if not all of them, have proceeded on that assumption. Whether it is well founded or not, I will not give an opinion, but this petition proceeds on that assumption. So dealing with it as presented to us, I inquire, how is the rental to be ascertained of which it is said that this multiple is to be taken as the limit of the expenditure to be made a burden on the estate? At what point of time is the rental to be fixed? That is the question. Are we, now when we are giving this remedy, to take the rental as it shall be at Whitsunday after the death of the petitioner? If the petitioner had been contented with the remedy given by the 10 Geo. III, that would have been the case. That statute points out distinctly that it is the rental as at Whitsunday after the date of the improver's death that is to be taken. That period of time is the terminus at which the amount of the rental is to be ascertained. Now, the question raised here for consideration is, shall that be taken as the period at which the rental is to be taken, according to which the remedy given by the Disentail Act of 1848 is to be calculated? Now, I would only say, that not only is there a difficulty, but there is an utter impossibility in doing that. You cannot tell what the rental will be at Whitsunday after the death of the petitioner. It may be double, or it may not be half of what it is now. So also all the deductions as at that date are now unknown. Provisions may yet be granted, and it may happen that where an estate belongs to a lady, and the right of courtesy is not excluded, her husband may possess the whole rental of the estate. That happened in the case of Gibson of Clifton Hall. But I merely mention that for the purpose of saying that it is here impossible to make a calculation of the rental under the rule of the Montgomery Act. The amount of the annual rent must be fixed now, for it is to be made a real burden on the estate, and therefore must be certain in amount and not problematical.

But that it is not all; we are asked here to fix the sum for which the petitioner is to be entitled to grant a real security over the estate and sell the estate. We are to fix how much of the estate is to be sold, and to be sold now, so that, while on the one hand it is impossible to tell what the rental may be at the time described by the Montgomery Act, it is indispensable that that rental shall be fixed as at the date of our judgment. Now, is this sum as at this moment a burden on the estate? It is impossible to say that; and it is equally impossible to say that the interest of that sum is an existing burden on the rental of the estate, but that is the only question now before us. I go upon this, that the time at which the calculations are to be made is not at Whitsunday after the death of the improver, but now.

LORD DEAS.—This is a question of general importance—affecting the position of the great majority of entailed proprietors in Scotland. It arises for decision in the unsatisfactory form in which many of these questions occur, upon an ex parte argument for the petitioner, although we have here, no doubt, the advantage, which I do not underrate, of the able and perspicuous observations made by the reporter. But as I cannot concur in the construction put upon the statute, either by the counsel for the petitioner or by the reporter, I am glad to have had opportunity of maturing for myself, so far as I can at present do so, the opinion which I have formed,—subject to reconsideration when a contested case occurs, in which I am very sensible much light may be obtained from farther argument.

The present discussion relates to a sum of L.7205, 14s. 5d., expended by the petitioner in permanent improvements since the passing of the Rutherford Act, with reference to which expenditure no decree has been obtained; and with two-thirds of which he proposes (inter alia) to charge the fee of the estate, and ultimately to sell a portion of the estate for payment thereof. The question occurs, whether, and to what extent, the petitioner is limited in regard to the amount of improvement debt with which he can so charge the estate?

The view of the reporter appears to be, that the proviso in sect. 10 of the Montgomery Act is imported into sect. 16 of the Rutherford Act, and, consequently, that the improvement debt chargeable upon the fee of the estate is limited to four years free rent, “after deduction of all public burdens, liferents, and interests of debts which may affect the estate, as the same shall happen to be at the first term of Whitsunday after the death of the heir who expended the money claimed.”

I have two objections to this view. The one is, that I do not find it expressed in the Rutherford Act. The other is, that, if it had been so expressed, it would have been impracticable to carry it into effect. A present value may, no doubt, be put upon provisions already granted, subject to the contingency of surviving the grantor, as the reporter, properly enough, says might be done with reference to the jointure provided to the petitioner's wife. But no present value could possibly be put upon provisions which an heir in possession has or may come to have power to make, but has not yet made; and the making of which, as well as the power to make them, may depend upon the birth of children not yet born, or the contingency of a marriage not yet contracted. Accordingly the reporter finds it impossible, consistently, to carry out this view, and (subject to the equitable qualification of putting a present value upon the provisions), rather points at the course followed by the applicant in Lady Keith's case, where the interest of contingent provisions already granted, but not yet come into operation, was deducted, although (as the reporter states, quite accurately), the Court decided nothing except that the interest

Hamilton.

No. 159. of provisions, which the heir had the power to make, but had not yet made, did not fall to be deducted. It is obvious, however, that a middle course of this kind would be a total departure from the principle of holding sect. 10 of the Montgomery Act to be imported into sect. 16 of the Rutherford Act. Nor do I find any words in sect. 16 of the Rutherford Act which bear out this construction. The only words suggestive of it (and which create the whole puzzle in the present case), occur in the middle of the section, where it is enacted, that "it shall be lawful for such heir to apply by summary petition to the Court in manner hereinafter provided, setting forth such improvements, and the amount of money, not exceeding the amount authorised by the said Act, expended thereon." These words are somewhat obscure, and, in any view of their meaning, seem to me less happily chosen than the general phraseology of this Act. But, mean what they may, it will be observed that they are descriptive only of something which is to be set forth in the petition. They do not at all apply to the thing to be prayed for, nor to the thing to be found and granted by the Court. This observation is equally applicable to the petitioner's view of the meaning and effect of the above words, as to the view taken of them by the reporter. But the petitioner's view is subject to the farther observation that, if these words—upon which his whole argument must rest—could be held to import into the Rutherford Act any part of the proviso embodied in sect. 10 of the Montgomery Act, they must import the whole of that proviso. The substantive enactment is not that the heir shall be a creditor for three-fourths of the money not exceeding four years rent, subject to the proviso that the rent is to be estimated as at the first Whitsunday after the heir's death. But the substantive enactment is that which is contained in sect. 9 of the statute, that the heir shall be a creditor for three-fourths of the money, and the whole matter of limitation to four years free rent, as the same may be at the first Whitsunday after the heir's death, is made the subject of a distinct and separate section, viz., sect. 10, which forms a single proviso, and is, in fact, a single sentence. I see no way, therefore, of importing part of the proviso without importing the whole of it. To import the whole of it would imply the enactment of an impossibility,—a view not readily to be taken, and I adopt, therefore, what I think the only alternative open,—viz., the alternative of holding no part of it to be imported. The result of this, of course, is that two-thirds of the improvement debt may be charged upon the estate, whatever the free rental of the estate may be either now or at the petitioner's death.

I am much confirmed in this view by attending to the terms of sections 13 and 14. Section 13 provides, that if the heir in possession shall have executed improvements previous to the passing of the Act, and obtained decree for three-fourth parts of the sums expended thereon, it shall be lawful for him to execute a bond of annualrent at a rate not exceeding, for a certain period, "the legal interest of the said three-fourth parts of the sums expended as aforesaid," and at a rate not exceeding, for a certain additional period, L.7, 2s. "for every L.100 of such three-fourth parts as aforesaid."

Then section 14 provides, that, if the heir shall execute improvements subsequent to the passing of the Act, "and obtain decree for three-fourth parts of the sums expended thereon," it shall be lawful for him to execute a bond of annualrent, to endure for a certain period, at a rate not exceeding L.7, 2s. "for every L.100 of the whole sums expended as aforesaid."

Now, I cannot see a shadow of ground for holding that the annualrent for which bond is to be granted under section 13 is to be other than an annualrent corresponding to three-fourths of the sums expended; or for holding that the annualrent for which bond is to be granted under section 14 is to be other than an annualrent corresponding to "the whole sums expended." The words of both sections are express, and no limitation, in respect of rental, is, in any way, alluded to in either of them.

These two sections provide for improvement expenditure, whether made before or after the passing of the Act, for which decree has been obtained. Then section 16 provides for improvement expenditure, whether before or after the Act, for which no decree has been obtained; introducing, in consequence, machinery for ascertaining that the improvements are of the kind for which, had certain precautions been adopted, decree might have been obtained. There is no other difference: and it is not, therefore, surprising that there should be no difference between the mode of ascertaining the amount to be sanctioned under this section and under the others. Accordingly, the prayer of an application under this section is to be "for authority to grant bond of annualrent as is herein before provided in the case of improvements for which decree in terms of the said Act has been obtained." And the Court, if satisfied as to the nature of the expenditure, is to find so, "and shall also grant warrant for execution of a bond of annualrent as herein provided in the cases of improvements for which decree in terms of the said Act has been obtained:" that is, as I read the statute, for a bond of annualrent corresponding to three-fourths of the expenditure, if made prior to the Act, and corresponding to the full amount of expenditure if made subsequent to the Act.

Mar. 11, 1857.
Hamilton.

In further corroboration of this view it will be observed that, under section 13, the representatives of the heir get only L.7, 2s. per cent for twenty-five years upon the same three-fourths of which, if the free rental happened to be large enough, they would get full payment under the Montgomery Act. And under section 14, although they may happen to get L.7, 2s. per cent for a certain period on the whole sum expended, they may, on the other hand, get nothing at all, as the heir may survive during the twenty-five years which constitute the whole currency of the bond. The position of the heir's representatives, therefore, would have been greatly less favourable under the Rutherford Act than under the Montgomery Act had the limitation as respects rental in the one Act, or any analogous limitation, been imported into the other Act.

Nor does this view impose any material hardship upon the subsequent heirs of entail. For the effect of section 18, as to granting bond and disposition in security for two-thirds of the capital on which the annualrent is calculated (which bond may now contain a power of sale), coupled with the effect of section 25, which enables the heir in possession to sell for payment of debt, is to provide an easy method of getting rid of the debt whenever the interest presses heavily upon the rental; while the expenditure upon the lands may fairly be supposed to render the improved portion of them, left unsold, equally valuable, or more valuable, than the whole were before the improvements had been effected.

In this point of view there is no omission whatever in the clauses now under consideration of the Rutherford Act. To have inserted the limitation supposed to be omitted would have been contrary to the policy of the Act, which appears to me to be as large and enlightened as the legal knowledge, displayed throughout its enactments generally, is comprehensive and profound.

An additional appendix was now lodged, containing tabular statements shewing the results on the free rental of the different views as to what burdens ought to be considered deductions, and shewing also the result if in estimating the sum for two-thirds of which bond could now be granted, it was necessary to take into account three-fourths of the whole expenditure before the date of the Entail Amendment Act, or only the sum actually charged on the fee. After considering this appendix,—

LORD IVORY.—If your Lordships are prepared to grant this petition, I should like not to be called on to agree or differ. I am not prepared to agree to any definite judgment now, and would like to have further argument. I still feel difficulty on the assumption that we are to take four years free rental as the measure of the expenditure.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question now is, whether, on the arithmetic as presented to us, the conclusion I arrived at yesterday was good or not? A difficulty suggested is, that, in estimating whether four years rental has been exhausted or not, we must take, not the sum for which bond has been granted, but the sum of which it was two-thirds. I think that the smaller, and not the larger sum, is the true sum to be estimated; and, if that be so, then the four years rent are not exhausted. Upon the other and larger point, as to whether we have anything to do here with the four years rent, I reserve entirely my opinion; and, if we are to go upon that, we would require to give more consideration to the question.

LORD DEAS.—I wish to explain that I was very desirous, as your Lordships know, to avoid forming any opinion on the general and important question relative to the ~~the~~ construction of the Rutherford Act,—and therefore I would have preferred that one of two courses had been followed,—either to have heard an argu-

No. 159. ment on the general question, or to have consulted our brethren upon the subject. But, as two of your Lordships thought the prayer of this petition might be granted without going into that general question, and were therefore opposed to either of the above courses, I considered myself bound, in justice to the petitioner, to form the best opinion I could on that general question, and having taken a view of it which enabled me to concur in granting the petition, I thought myself called upon to do so on my own grounds, in place of dividing the Court upon the subordinate question (on which alone we differed), whether it was necessary to go into the general question or not? For, upon the general question, itself, we have not (as yet at least) differed,—your Lordships having reserved your opinions upon it. And, although the Dean of Faculty has now admitted that the petition is based upon the footing of taking four years free rent as the measure of charge, I do not look upon this as making it incompetent for me to concur, upon my own grounds, in granting the prayer of this petition; although it confirms me in the view I expressed yesterday that it is necessary here to deal with the general question. If, therefore, the petitioner is disposed, as I understand him to be, to take the risk of my vote on the grounds on which I can alone put it, I do not see now, any more than I did yesterday, why I may not concur in granting the prayer of the petition to the extent now insisted in and explained in Mr Duncan's original report.

Houston v.
Magistrates of Glasgow.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor :—“ The Lords, on report of Lord Mackenzie, Ordinary, and having heard counsel for the petitioner, Find, (1), That the fee of the entailed estate mentioned in the proceedings is at present validly charged with the principal sum of L.2684, 18s. 8d. : Find, (2), That the petitioner has expended on improvements on the said estates mentioned in the petition, of the nature contemplated by the Act 10 Geo. III, cap. 51, and 11 and 12 Vict. cap. 36, the sum of L.6463, 12s. 7d., subsequent to the date of said last mentioned Act : Find that the sums were bona fide expended by the petitioner while heir of entail in possession of said estates, and that the same, along with the improvement debt already forming a charge on the fee of the said estate, does not exceed the amount authorised by the statute : Find that the petitioner is entitled to charge the fee of the said entailed estates (other than the mansion-house, offices, and policies thereof) with the farther sum of L.4309, 1s. 9d., exclusive of and over and above the sum of L.2684, 18s. 8d. with which the fee of the said estates is already charged : Find, (3), That the petitioner is entitled to charge the fee of the said estates with the farther sum of L.4931, 3s. 6d. of provisions to younger children mentioned in the petition : Find that the total amount, with which the fee of the said estate is already charged, or may be competently charged, is L.11,925, 3s. 11d. sterling : Find that authority may be granted to the petitioner to sell part of the said entailed estates, other than the mansion-house, offices, and policies, for the purpose of paying off the said debt of L.11,925, 3s. 11d. sterling : interpone their authority, and decern; Farther, they remit to the Lord Ordinary to take such steps as his Lordship may deem proper, with the view of selecting the most suitable portion of the entailed estates (other than as aforesaid), to be sold and disposed of for the purpose of paying off the said debt, and to report.”

THE MAGISTRATES OF GLASGOW, Defenders.—Penney—Macfarlane.

Statute 9 & 10 Vict. c. 289, sect. 14—Construction—Church—Minister's stipend.—

and income of every description," of "the barony of Gorbals," was transferred to No. 160. and vested in the Magistrates and Town-Council of Glasgow;—Held, in an action raised by the minister of the parish of Gorbals (aff. judgment of Lord Mackenzie, Mar. 11, 1857. abs. Lord Wood), that property belonging to the feuars and villagers of Gorbals, Houston v. Magistrates of Glasgow. who were liable for the stipend of the minister of the parish of Gorbals, did not fall under this clause, and that the Magistrates were not bound to take over that property, which was not sufficient to meet the liabilities of the feuars and villagers whom the Court held to be the "community" of Gorbals, and to be quite distinct from the "barony of the same name, though residing within it."

THE barony of Gorbals was acquired from Sir Robert Douglas of Blacker- 2D DIVISION. stone by the Magistrates and Council of Glasgow, partly with the funds and Ld. Mackenzie for behoof of the Corporation of the City of Glasgow, partly those of the Incorporated Trades, and partly those of Hutcheson's Hospital. There existed at the time of this purchase the village of Gorbals, occupying part of the barony, and chiefly inhabited by feuars, who, by themselves or their predecessors, had obtained feus of portions of the barony, and erected houses thereon.

The pursuers alleged, "the barony, prior to the Glasgow Municipal Extension Act (27th July 1846), was administered by bailies appointed by the Magistrates and Council of Glasgow, the superiors of the barony. These bailies were magistrates not of the village only, but of the rest of the barony also. Along with these bailies the affairs of the village had been managed from a remote period by a preses and managers nominated and appointed by the heritors and feuars."

From funds raised partly by the voluntary imposition of two small taxes, and partly by contributions among the feuars, the community was enabled to acquire heritable property. Thus in 1713 they acquired "ane buriall place for the inhabitants of Gorbals," the title to which was said to have been taken "in favours of the community of Gorbals." They afterwards received a gift of a piece of ground, and built on it a chapel. This was in 1727. The disposition to this ground was "in favors of L. L., present preses of Gorbells, T. G., hammerman in Gorbells, G. M., maltman there, and R. W., maltman there, his assessors, and their successors in office, for the use and behove of the haill other feuars and inhabitants of Gorbells and muir thereof." Again, in 1748, they acquired land called the Community land, the titles being conceived in favour of "the preses and assessors of the community of Gorbells, and their successors in office, for behoof of the said community, and the assignees of the said preses," &c.

In 1770 the village of Gorbals having increased in size, a process was raised before the Court of Session, as commissioners for the plantation of kirks, and decree was pronounced disjoining the village of Gorbals from the parish of Govan, and erecting it into a new parish, to be called in time coming the parish of Gorbals, and ordaining "that the bailies of the said village, preses, and manager of the public funds thereof for the time being, shall be bound and obliged . . . to provide the minister who shall serve the cure at the said kirk with a competent and legal stipend, not under the sum of L.67 sterling, with L.23 money foresaid yearly, for manse and glebe, aye and until the same are provided both out of the public funds of the said village," &c.

The pursuer's farther allegations were,—“Sometime after the erection of Gorbals into a parish, the districts known as Hutchesontown, Tradeston, Kingston, and Laurieston, which includes Carlton Place, were annexed thereto in common form. The extended parish constitutes the barony of Gorbals.”

The patronage, which was by the decree given to the University of Glasgow as patrons of the parish of Govan, was soon after sold to the feuars of Gorbals. Within a few months after the induction of the first minister of the new parish, "his stipend and allowance for manse and glebe were aug-

No. 160. mented to L.100 (being an augmentation of L.10), with L.12 for communion elements. This was done at meetings of the managers and feuars, held, the one on the 31st of October and the other on the 16th December 1771." A farther augmentation took place in 1802, and another in 1806, when the stipend and allowance in lieu of manse were fixed at L.200 in all, with L.20 for communion elements. These sums were paid from that time downwards to all the predecessors of the pursuer, who was, "in 1846, inducted as minister under a presentation from the feuars of Gorbals, which purported to secure to him the constant localled and modified stipend, the allowance for manse and glebe, and other profits and emoluments belonging to the church of Gorbals, and that during his serving the cure thereof. During the first four years and a-half of the incumbency of the said Robert Houston, there was paid to him half-yearly by the bailies, preses, and managers of Gorbals, the sum of L.60, to account of stipend and communion elements, instead of L.110 half-yearly. He did not even receive payment of the L.60 at the regular half-yearly terms, but only occasional small sums to account, in terms of a state produced," which shewed as due to Mr Houston at Whitsunday 1853, no less than L.1324, 10s. 5d.

Mar. 11, 1857.
Houston v.
Magistrates of Glasgow.

As to the management of the affairs of Gorbals, the allegations were,—
"The preses and managers named in the decret of disjunction and new erection, in conjunction with the bailies appointed by the city of Glasgow, continued to manage the whole affairs of the community, until 1808, when an Act of Parliament was passed, vesting the management of the police affairs of the whole barony in a board of commissioners; but the bailies, preses, and managers continued to conduct all the business connected with the church and other property. About 1815 the chapel was sold by the bailies, preses, and managers, and the proceeds applied to extinguishing the debt incurred in the erection of another church built in the year 1810, the titles to which were taken in favour of the 'bailies' of the barony of Gorbals, the 'preses,' 'collector,' and 'managers,' and their successors in office, 'for behoof of the community.' No distinction is made in the accounts of the bailies, preses and managers, between the revenues drawn from the community lands, the burying-ground, and the church." "Up to 1848, the affairs of the parish and community of Gorbals were managed, and the payments to account of stipend were made, by the then bailies, preses and managers of Gorbals. These bailies were chosen by the Town-Council of the city of Glasgow, and the preses and managers were chosen by the heritors or feuars of the extended parish of Gorbals, which, as already stated, included the whole barony."

In 1846 there passed the Act 9 & 10 Vict. c. 289, whereby the municipal boundaries of Glasgow were extended so as to include the whole barony of Gorbals, of which the old village and parish still formed a part. By the first section all subordinate jurisdictions were abolished, and the powers transferred to the Magistrates and Council appointed under the Act. By the third section all titles are to remain as if the Act had never been passed, and the rights, privileges, and emoluments of the ministers, kirk-sessions, schoolmasters, and session-clerks of the parishes embraced in the extension are to remain unimpaired.

The 5th section provides, "That in respect of all public or parochial burdens not herein enumerated, other than the assessments to be levied under this Act, or the Acts before recited, for the purposes thereof, as hereinafter provided, which now affect or which may hereafter affect the parishes within the said extended limits, the said lands shall remain a part and portion of the said parishes respectively, and shall, together with the proprietors, tenants possessors, and inhabitants thereof, continue to be liable for a proportion of the said burdens, in the same manner as at present, and as if this Act had not been passed."

By the 13th section it is declared, "that after the election and induction into office of the Councillors, Magistrates, and office-bearers in the said city, under this Act, and not sooner, the Magistrates, Councillors, and office-bearers previously in office in the said city, in the barony of Gorbals, in the burgh of Calton, and in the burgh of Anderston, shall go out of office, and their whole powers, duties, and functions shall cease and determine."

Mar. 11, 1857.
Houston v.
Magistrates of Glasgow.

The 14th section of the Act, upon which the pursuer mainly relies, provides "that the common good and property, heritable and moveable, and means and revenues, and income of every description, leviable within or belonging to the said city of Glasgow, to the barony of Gorbals, to the burgh of Calton, and to the burgh of Anderston, within the limits of this Act, or to which such city, barony, or burghs, are respectively entitled, or which are held or administered by any person for or in behalf of the community of such city, barony, or burghs, for the public ends or purposes thereof (but subject to the liabilities to which the same are legally subject), shall be, and the same are hereby vested in the Council to be elected and chosen for the city under the provisions of this Act, with full power, right, and authority to levy, adjudge, sue for, and recover the same for the benefit of the city, except so far as the same are abolished by this Act."

The pursuer averred, that "immediately after the first election of magistrates and councillors under the Municipal Extension Act of 1846, the bailies of Gorbals ceased to exercise any power within the barony, and the preses and managers, conceiving the property which had been under the management of themselves and the bailies to be common good, also ceased to manage it. Application was made to the Lord Provost, Magistrates and Council of Glasgow, to assume, under the 14th section of the Act, the management thereof, and all the liabilities to which the property, and the bailies, preses and managers had been subject. The Lord Provost, Magistrates and Council did not assume the management of the property at the time when the bailies and managers of Gorbals ceased to exercise any management, and the property has been for some years under the charge of a judicial factor." But he alleged that the Magistrates had entered upon the discharge of a portion of the duties of the Magistrates and managers of Gorbals, in reference to matters in no way connected with police and statute labour purposes, and had ousted them from the management of certain charitable trusts.

In these circumstances, and founding on these averments, the Rev. Robert Houston brought this action (on his death insisted in by his widow) concluding to have it declared that the Lord Provost and Magistrates of Glasgow "are bound to take such steps as may be necessary for vesting in themselves the church, church-yard, community-land, and other heritable and moveable property of every description belonging to the bailies, preses, and managers, and feuars of the barony of Gorbals, with all the burdens and liabilities thereto attached: And they ought and should be decerned and ordained to make up titles thereto according to the state and position of the title: And it being so found and declared, or whether so declared or not, they ought and should be decerned and ordained to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of L.1324, 10s. 5d., being the arrears of stipend and allowance for communion elements due to him as minister of the said parish of Gorbals at the term of Whitsunday 1853, with the legal interest."

The pleas stated in support of these conclusions were:—The bailies, preses, and managers of the community of Gorbals, were bound to make payment to the pursuer of the stipend due to her late husband as augmented, and the common good of the said burgh, including the church and church-yard, could be attached for payment thereof.—The whole community property of Gorbals having now, by force of the Municipal Extension Act, fallen to the defenders, under the same burdens as it stood vested in the

No. 160. representatives of the Gorbals community, they are bound to pay the stipend due to the pursuer's husband.—The separate magistracy and jurisdiction of the bailies having been abolished and transferred to the defenders, they are not entitled to refuse to take up, with its corresponding liabilities, the property which belonged to the said community.—The common good and property of the barony of Gorbals having become vested in the defenders, for the benefit of the city of Glasgow, the defenders and the common good of the city are liable to the pursuer in the stipend, and arrears of stipend, sued for.

Mar. 11, 1857.
Houston v.
Magistrates of Glasgow.

The main difference in point of statement between the pursuer and defenders was, that the latter averred that Gorbals was never erected into a burgh of barony; that the bailies of Gorbals, whether principal or resident bailies, were neither more nor less than baron bailies, appointed by the corporation of the city of Glasgow, as superior of the barony, whose ancient baronial powers remained entire. The resident bailies were also generally feuars, and often managers in the village. They maintained that the village of Gorbals and the barony always remained entirely distinct, and they founded upon a series of local acts, as shewing this. Thus in 1808, the Act 48 Geo. III., c. 42 was passed, entitled, "An Act for regulating the Police of the Barony of Gorbals, in the County of Lanark," &c., in the first section of which it was enacted, that the regulations therein made "with respect to the establishment of a general system of police, and for accomplishing the purposes of this present Act, shall extend over the old village of Gorbals, Hutchesontown, Laurieston, Tradeston and Kingston, being parts of the barony aforesaid," &c. Other Acts, all having relation to the entire barony, were passed in 1823, 1831, and 1837, by section 210 of which it was declared, "That there shall be, as at present, one principal and four resident bailies in the said barony of Gorbals, who shall be appointed annually, in the month of October, by the Lord Provost, Magistrates and Town Council of Glasgow, as baron and superior thereof, provided always that the principal and two of the said resident bailies only shall have the right of voting in the parochial matters of the old village of Gorbals." The parochial matters so referred to, according to the defenders, were those under the charge of the feuars, and related to the church and burying-ground, all other public affairs being managed under the statutes above-mentioned. Thus the old baronial hall was sold, and the purchaser taken bound to hold of the city of Glasgow, and new police buildings were erected for the purposes of the entire barony, upon ground purchased for the purpose, the titles being taken to the magistrates and commissioners of police, and their successors in office. These police buildings, they said, were of the nature of common property or common good, pertaining, not to the village of Gorbals, but to the whole barony; and they were administered quite separately and distinctly from the property or subjects administered by the preses and managers of the heritors of the village; nor had these latter parties any power to interfere with the court-house and prison buildings.

To this statement the pursuer replied,—If the corporation of Glasgow sold the buildings and got the price, they did so under the condition that they held them in trust for the feuars and heritors, and were bound to appropriate the money in rebuilding the premises, and, according to the shewing of the defenders, they did apply the money for that purpose; and the new buildings were, and continued to be, part of the common good of Gorbals. As to the subjects which the defenders were called upon to take up, with the liabilities attaching to them, they (the defenders) alleged that they believed the liabilities amounted to upwards of L.7000, while the "community land" had been sold already by one of the creditors, under an heritable bond, and the church—said to have cost L.12,000—had been sold for L.2800, under an adjudication led by parties who had right to a feu duty of L.100 a year, which No. 160. had been allowed to fall into arrear.

Apart altogether from the question of their obligations under the various Acts, the defenders alleged that, during the whole period for which arrears were claimed, Mr Houston had been unfit properly to discharge the duties of the office, and had, in point of fact, not discharged them. Mar. 11, 1857.
Houston v.
Magistrates of Glasgow.

They pleaded;—According to the sound construction and intendment of the Act 9 & 10 Vict., cap. 289, the defenders are neither entitled nor bound to take the subjects in question, or to subject themselves in the liabilities contended for. More particularly, (1.) as the subjects and liabilities in question pertain to the village of Gorbals, and not to the barony, and have been acquired by and for behoof, and are under the management and control, and in the enjoyment of parties different from the barony and community of Gorbals, the action is untenable; (2) and, at any rate, all parochial burdens and affairs, such as that in question, are expressly excluded from the operation of the said act.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustains the defences for the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Town Council of Glasgow, and assoilzies them from the whole conclusions of the action: Finds the pursuer, Mrs Jane Marshall or Houston, liable in expenses to the defenders," &c. *

* "NOTE.—This action was raised by the late Robert Houston, sometime minister of Gorbals, against the Magistrates and Town Council of Glasgow, for payment of L.1324, 10s. 5d. of arrears of stipend, said to be due to him at Whitsunday 1853. The original pursuer was deposed from the office of a minister of the Church of Scotland in May 1853, and having died during the dependence of the action, it is now insisted in by Mrs Houston, his widow and executrix.

"The question raised, which is of considerable difficulty and importance, is, Whether the Magistrates of Glasgow are liable, under the Act 9 and 10 Victoria, cap. 289, to pay the stipend due to the minister of the parish of Gorbals? This question depends upon the construction to be put on certain clauses of what is called the Municipal Extension Act of 1846, and particularly the 14th section.

"It is contended by the pursuer, that under that Act the Magistrates are bound to take over certain public property which is said to have belonged to the community of Gorbals, subject to its debts and liabilities, and are liable for the stipend of the ministers of Gorbals, as a burden affecting that property. On the other hand, the defenders deny that they have incurred any such liability, and maintain that the subjects in question are not carried by the 14th section of the Act, because they belong to the feuars of the village or parish of Gorbals, and form no part of the common good or public property belonging to the barony of Gorbals.

"The barony of Gorbals, which is situated on the south side of the Clyde, was acquired from Sir Robert Douglas, about the middle of the 17th century, by the Magistrates and Council of Glasgow, partly for behoof of the corporation, and partly for behoof of Hutcheson's Hospital and the Trades House. There existed, at the time of this purchase, a village of Gorbals, usually called 'Bridgend,' from its being situated at the south end of the old Bridge of Glasgow, and occupying a part of the barony adjacent to that bridge.

"It is admitted that the Gorbals territory was never erected into a burgh of barony, and in this respect it differs from Calton and Anderston. The Magistrates of Glasgow, however, as superiors, appointed baron-bailies, whose jurisdiction extended not only over the whole village, but over the whole bounds of the barony, which was much more extensive.

"After the village of Gorbals or Bridgend increased in population, the feuars or heritors made rules and regulations for the common benefit, and appointed a preses and managers for the conduct of their affairs. It is admitted, that in 1727 and 1734 the feuars of the village of Gorbals acquired ground for building a church or chapel-of-ease, and for a burying-place; and in 1748 they acquired certain tenants or subjects in the village. The titles to those subjects appear to have been

Besides the parochial matters referred to, the feuars of the village of Gorbals, by their preses and managers, raised, by assessment or otherwise, a small public fund, which they applied to purposes of common concern, such as sinking wells, providing lamps, repairing causeways, and the like.
- “By the decree of 1771, the heritors of Govan were declared not to be liable in payment of stipend to the minister of the new parish of Gorbals, or for the expense of building or repairing the kirk or burying-ground, or for any other parochial burden. All those burdens were laid on ‘the bailies of the said village, preses, and managers of the public funds thereof.’ The patronage of the newly erected parish, which was reserved by decree to the College of Glasgow, as patrons of Govan, was purchased by the feuars in 1771, under a disposition which was granted ‘to the heritors or feuars of the said village and parish of Gorbals, and their heirs and successors, and to the elders of the said new erected parish, and their successors in office, in all time coming.’
- “After the village was erected into a separate parish, according to well defined boundaries specified in the decree, Hutcheson’s Hospital and the Trades House feued out extensive tracts of building ground according to regular plans, with spacious streets, and in progress of time the old village or parish of Gorbals was surrounded by buildings in the districts called Hutchesontown, Lauriston, Tradeston, and Kingston, which are all in the barony of Gorbals, but form no part of the village of Gorbals, or the parish of Gorbals, as fixed by the decree of the Court of Teinds in 1771.
- “To meet the exigencies of an increased population, additional resident baron bailies were appointed by the Magistrates of Glasgow, as superiors, and a general system of police was introduced applicable to the whole barony of Gorbals, including the old village. The first Police Act, which was passed in 1808 (48, Geo. III, c. 42) is entitled ‘An Act for regulating the police of the barony of Gorbals, in the county of Lanark, paving, lighting, and cleansing the passages thereof, erecting a bridewell or workhouse therein, and for other purposes relating thereto.’ The first section declares, that the Act ‘shall extend over the old village of Gorbals, Hutchesontown, Lauriston, Tradeston, and Kingston, being parts of the barony aforesaid, and in general over the whole and every part of the said barony, and also to the bridge leading from the said city of Glasgow to the said barony.’ Another statute for regulating the police of the barony of Gorbals was passed in 1823, and in 1825 a separate Act was passed for regulating the conversion of the statute labour within the barony. Various other local Acts were obtained applicable to the police, and paving, and cleansing of the barony of Gorbals. These statutes did not interfere with the church and burying-ground, and other subjects which had been acquired by the feuars in the old village, and which remained under the administration of the preses and managers appointed to act for them; but, as disputes had arisen whether the bailies appointed by the Magistrates were entitled to vote in the parochial affairs of the old village, it was provided by the 210th section of the last Local Act passed in 1843, (6 & 7 Vict. c. 43), ‘that there shall be as at present one principal and four resident bailies in the said barony of Gorbals, who shall be appointed annually in the month of October, by the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Town Council of Glasgow, as baron and superior thereof, provided always, that the principal and two of the said resident bailies only shall have the right of voting in the parochial matters of the old village of Gorbals.’
- “In the early titles the subjects acquired by the feuars appear to have been conveyed to the preses and his assessors nominatim, and their successors in office, ‘for the use and behoof of the haill other feuars and inhabitants of Gorbals,’ without mentioning the bailies. (See sasine, 15th April 1734, No. 73 of process. It was contended by the pursuer that the general term ‘community’ which occurs in some of the titles, must be held to apply not to the old village, but to the whole barony.)

date of the passing of the Act, the liabilities attaching to the heritors of the parish considerably exceeded their assets, and that the deficiency had ever since continued to increase.

but this interpretation is inconsistent with the pursuer's statements and admissions on the record (pursuer's condescendence, articles 1 and 2), and particularly the answer made to article 4 of the defenders' statement. Where the terms 'community' or 'community of Gorbals' are used, they seem to refer to the feuars and inhabitants of the old village, afterwards erected into a separate parish by the Teind Court in 1771, and not to the heritors or inhabitants of the whole barony, and this is confirmed by the terms of the disposition by William Dixon in 1815, which is taken expressly in favour of the preses and managers and their successors in office, for 'behoof of the community of the said village.'

"It is proper, however, to mention, that the 'bailies in the village of Gorbals' are mentioned in the decree of the Teind Court of 1771. The bailies are also made parties to the contract of ground-annual under which ground was acquired from James Laurie, for building a new church in June 1810, the destination being taken to certain parties nominatim as the bailies, and to the preses, collector, and 'managers for the heritors of the parish of Gorbals, and to their successors in office, for the community thereof.' As the proper parish of Gorbals is co-extensive with the old village, this conveyance is necessarily limited to the feuars and heritors or inhabitants of the old village.

"For many years a court-house and prison existed in the barony, which were used for judicial and police purposes. About 1827, when the Barony Police Acts were in force, the old buildings were sold, and new buildings were erected for a court-house and police purposes, to the expense of which the Corporation of Glasgow appears to have contributed. The title to this property was taken to the bailies and 'commissioners of police of the said barony of Gorbals, and their successors in office, for the purpose of erecting a police office, and other buildings connected therewith;' and it was expressly declared in the conveyance 'that the said bailies of the said barony, and their successors in office, should have and exercise the uncontrolled use for judicial purposes of that part of the intended buildings destined for the court-hall and prison.'

"The subjects which the pursuer contends the defenders are now bound to take over under the burden of the minister's stipend, are, first, a tenement of land in Main Street of Gorbals, called the community land; second, the burying-ground; and, third, the parish church. All these subjects appear from the titles to have been acquired by the heritors or feuars of the old village of Gorbals, which was afterwards erected into a parish.

"It is said by the defenders that this property is now much dilapidated, and that the debts and liabilities affecting it greatly exceed its value. They allege that the community land, after becoming ruinous, was sold by an heritable creditor; that the parish church having been burdened with a ground-annual, has been adjudged for the arrears due; and that the adjudger has sold his right under the adjudication to parties who have entered into possession; and that the only other property is the burying-ground, which is said to be of little value.

"By the Act 9 & 10 Vict. c. 289, passed in 1846, the municipal boundaries of Glasgow were extended, and made the same as the parliamentary boundaries of the city. The Police and Statute Labour Act for the city of Glasgow was extended over the same limits; and the several Police and Statute Labour Acts then existing for the barony of Gorbals and the burghs of Calton and Anderston, were repealed.

"The 3d section provides that the tithes payable out of the lands within the said extended limits shall be reserved to the owners.

"The 4th section declares that the Act shall not affect the poor's-rates, or the settlement of the poor."

His Lordship here quoted sects. 5, 13, and 14 given above, pp. 736-7.

"The 17th section relates to mortifications and trusts held or administered by the Magistrates of the separate jurisdictions by themselves, or in conjunction with others, and declares that the same shall be administered by the Magistrates under the Extension Act, or so many of their number to be chosen for the purpose as are appointed by the deeds of trust, together with the other trustees therein nominated, and that with the powers and subject to the conditions specified in such deeds of trust or endowments.

“ And, finally, by the 26th section, property connected with the police and statute labour of the united districts is vested in a committee appointed for police and statute labour purposes for the whole of the extended city.

“ Such are the leading provisions of the Municipal Extension Act, under which the pursuer maintains that the defenders are bound to take over the tenement in Main Street, the burying-ground and parish church, under the burden of payment of stipend to the minister of Gorbals.

“ It is not disputed by the defenders, that any public property belonging to the barony of Gorbals is now vested in the Magistrates of Glasgow by the 14th section of the Act ; and they acknowledge, that under this clause they have acquired the police building which belonged to the barony : but they contend that the subjects in question do not belong to the barony, but are held in trust for the feuars of the old village of Gorbals, and consequently do not fall within the operation of the 14th section. They farther contend that the stipend payable to the minister of Gorbals is a parochial burden which falls to be borne in the same way as it was prior to the passing of the Act, as expressly provided for by the 5th section.

“ Though the 14th section of the Act is not very happily expressed, the Lord Ordinary thinks it does not apply to the subjects in question, which were not the property of the barony of Gorbals, but were held in trust for the feuars of the old village. All magistrates, bailies, or other municipal officers, who had previously exercised separate jurisdiction in the annexed districts, were abolished by the 13th section of the Act ; but it is thought the preses, collectors, and managers, who took charge of the property, and managed the affairs of the old village of Gorbals, were not thereby extinguished, but were entitled to act after the statute was passed in the same way as before. It has been shewn, that by a special enactment inserted in the last local Police Act for the barony of Gorbals, a certain number of the bailies was allowed to vote in the parochial affairs of the old village or parish of Gorbals ; but with this exception, the right to vote seems to have been confined to the feuars or heritors within the old village to whom the property belonged. It is not pretended that the feuars of Hutchesontown, Laurieston, Tradeston, or Kingston, which formed important parts of the barony of Gorbals, had any right to interfere with the property in question. Supposing the property, in place of being burdened with debt beyond its value, had turned out a lucrative speculation, the feuars of the old village would have been entitled to the exclusive benefit of it, and they could not have been deprived of this against their will, either by the feuars of the adjoining districts within the barony, or by the Magistrates of Glasgow, under any of the clauses of the Municipal Extension Act. But if this be so it is clear the Magistrates cannot be compelled to take over the property against their will when the liabilities attached to it greatly exceed its value.

“ It was argued by the pursuer, that if the subjects in question are not carried by the 14th section of the Act, there is no common good or public property belonging to the barony of Gorbals to which that clause can apply. To this it was answered by the defenders, 1st, that the police buildings, which stood vested in the bailies and commissioners of police of the barony of Gorbals, are the public property of the barony, and as such are vested in the Magistrates of Glasgow by the 14th section of the Act ; and 2d, that even supposing there had been no public property belonging to the barony to satisfy the words of the 14th section, this would not render the clause applicable to property of a different description from that specified in it, so as to comprehend subjects belonging to or held in trust for the feuars of the old village of Gorbals.

“ Another point maintained by the pursuer was, that the 14th section was unnecessary, so far as regards the police buildings of the barony of Gorbals, because the 26th section provides that all property relating to the police or statute labour of the barony of Gorbals and the other annexed districts ‘ shall, from and after the appointment of the said police and statute labour committee under this Act

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In the view I take of this case, it would be very unprofitable to go over it in detail. I apprehend it to be quite clear that the Magistrates of Glasgow, under the 14th section of the Glasgow Municipal Act, take up what was the common good of their barony of Gorbals, and the question comes to be, whether the property held by the preses, assessors, and bailies (or others who administered on account of the Magistrates of Glasgow) for the community of Gorbals falls to be considered as property of the barony?

Houston v.
Magistrates of Glasgow.

The use of the word community seems to have misled the pursuer, but I hold it to be just the same as parish or burgh. The word may be used for the inhabitants generally, or for any number of persons associated together for their common interest, and I do not think that any clauses of the Act give us any aid in fixing its meaning.

As the Magistrates are entitled to claim all that belonged to the barony of Gorbals, so they cannot be subject to any obligations not truly laid on the barony, nor can they be compelled to take up any property not truly belonging to the barony, in respect of which the Magistrates are to become liable for this debt?

I have looked into the titles, and am of opinion, 1st, That the pursuer cannot make her case without an admission that there was a village of Gorbals different from the barony, and not coextensive with it. In most baronies there is a village of the same name with the barony, as Hawick, Pollockshaws, &c., but the two are nevertheless quite distinct. As the village increases in size, it becomes the more important, and often absorbs the name so completely, that few people probably understand that there is a barony in such cases.

Well, as this village of Gorbals increases in size, so it does in wants. It requires a chapel; then a church; then a minister; then it is made into a parish, and gradually comes to acquire property for the common good; although they do not seem to have been very successful in their speculations, for their debts are said to exceed their assets; but, such as their property was, the whole of it was acquired for the "community" of the feuars of the village, who chose managers just because the property did not belong to the barony.

About 1780 there arose a question with the proprietors of the barony, which resulted in an arrangement that some of the baron-bailies should be introduced into management. It was a very natural object for the superior to get one or two bailies associated with the managers, but the mere introduction of that set of bailies into the management did not constitute "barony" property of the "community" property. The two remained perfectly distinct. Naturally enough the names of some vested in and shall belong to the said police and statute labour committee, hereby constituted for the purposes of this Act, as fully and effectually, to all intents and purposes, as if the same had been formally and particularly conveyed and vested in the said committee,' &c. Upon this, the defenders observed that the object of the 14th section was generally to transfer all the common good and heritable property of the barony of Gorbals and the other annexed districts to the Magistrates and Councillors to be elected under the new Act; and that the subsequent clause, providing for the appointment by the Town-Council of a police and statute labour committee out of their own number, and declaring that property relating to the police and statute labour should become vested in the said committee from and after their appointment, was a mere subordinate arrangement for administration of such property, which was in nowise inconsistent with the general vesting clause in the previous part of the Act.

As to the 17th section of the Act, which relates to mortifications and trusts held administered by the Magistrates of the annexed districts, either by themselves or in conjunction with others, it was plainly intended to regulate trusts or endowments similar to Macfarlane's school, mentioned in the record, so as to put it in the power of the Magistrates and Councillors under the new statute to act as trustees, or appoint some of their number to do so, and thereby carry into effect the purposes specified in the deeds of trust. The pursuer, accordingly, did not make her argument upon that clause of the Act.

On the whole, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the pursuer's construction of the Municipal Extension Act cannot be adopted, and that judgment of absolution must pass in favour of the defenders."

No. 160. bailies associated with the elected managers suggested the idea that the property did not remain distinct ; but still what was acquired by the villagers must have belonged somehow to the feuars, and never did belong to the " barony " of Gorbals, or to the Magistrates or superiors thereof.

Mar. 11, 1857. Houston v. Magistrates of Glasgow.

Thus the ground of action has failed, and the Magistrates, coming merely in the place of the superiors of the barony, have taken up no property to which any obligation for the stipend attached ; therefore there is no ground for suing them for arrears of stipend.

Very likely it was intended that it should have been otherwise when the Act was framed, although we had an argument to the contrary on the part of the Magistrates ; but, at any rate, we must construe the Act as we find it.

LORD MURRAY.—This case has been often before the Court, and each time my attention has been called to it I have come to the same view,—that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is right. The pursuer must make out that the defenders have actually got, or are bound to take up, property which is liable for these payments ; but, notwithstanding all the productions made, I think she has failed to prove that case. I am very sorry to have to pronounce this judgment, but a court of law cannot decide on considerations of generosity, or feelings of compassion for a widow, though these may be very properly taken into view by such a corporation as the Magistrates of Glasgow.

LORD COWAN.—I agree. The whole question turns on the effect of the 14th section of the Glasgow Municipal Act. Is there any property belonging to the " barony " which the Magistrates are bound to take up, and because of their taking up which, liability for this stipend would attach to them ? It seems to me that your Lordship's view is conclusive that the acquired property was vested, not in the " barony," but in the feuars and villagers of Gorbals.

There are two words from the use of which the difficulties seem to have sprung. The first of these is the word ' bailies,' but the bailies were merely associated with the managers, and allowed to aid them in the managing the property for the benefit of the villagers, and not of the " barony." The other word is " community ;" that means the community of the village,—the feuars. I concur generally in the Lord Ordinary's note, which demonstrates that, though the Gorbals was erected into a parish, nothing can be more clear than the distinction between the feuars of Gorbals and the " barony." There were many other important districts in the barony,—Hutchesontown, Lauriston, and others. How could these have right to the property of the feuars of Gorbals ? Yet they would, according to the pursuer's view. I think there was no property belonging properly to the barony, to which the obligation here sought to be enforced can attach. Therefore I hold that the entire ground of action has failed.

THE COURT adhered, and found additional expenses due.

 Hamilton v.
 Bruce's
 Trustees.

Diligence—Inhibition and arrestment—Recall.—One purpose of a trust was payment to the truster's widow of an annuity, to which she was entitled by her marriage-contract. A landed estate, by this contract destined to his daughter, was in her marriage-contract conveyed to her husband under burden of this annuity. The trustees, who had for some years paid the annuity, raised an action against the son-in-law for relief of the whole or a proportion both of the past and future payment, and on the dependence used inhibition and arrestment. The son-in-law maintained that the trust was primarily liable, and, at all events, that he was not personally bound ;—Held, there being no allegation that the estate was insufficient as a security, or was about to be sold, that the diligence was nimious and oppressive, and therefore recalled.

THE petitioner, Mr Hamilton, acquired right to the lands of Broomhill by antenuptial contract of marriage entered into in 1846 betwixt himself and his late wife, Mrs Jessie Bruce or Hamilton, to whom the same belonged. He now presented this application for recall of an inhibition and arrestments used by the trustees of the late Mr Bruce of Broomhill, on the dependence of an action lately raised at their instance against the petitioner, which action concluded for payment of the bygone annuities, or for such proportion as might be fixed according to the rental and value of the estate of Broomhill to be payable by the petitioner, and also to relieve them of the whole or a proportional part of all future payments from and after the term of Martinmas 1855.

 L.

In the petitioner's marriage-contract, these lands were conveyed under the burden of a yearly annuity to Mrs Bruce, now Henderson (the mother of the petitioner's late wife), payable under her marriage-contract with Mr Bruce, which burden was engrossed in the instrument of sasine in the petitioner's favour.

Mr Bruce died in 1835: By trust-disposition and settlement he had conveyed his whole estates to trustees, for the purpose, inter alia, of paying the annuity and other provisions settled upon Mrs Bruce by their contract of marriage. The petitioner afterwards reduced this deed of settlement, so far as it affected the estate of Broomhill; but in order to remove any doubt how far the intention to create a real security had been carried out, he granted a disposition in his own favour of the lands, under burden of Mrs Bruce's annuity, declaring that he incurred no personal liability, and reserving such relief as might be competent to him against the representatives of his late wife. The security thus granted to Mrs Henderson was assigned by her to the trustees.

Mr Bruce had left property other than Broomhill, yielding a return of from L.900 to L.1000 a-year. Mr Hamilton contended that the trustees held this property under the special direction that it should be applied in payment of the annuity. He admitted that in the event of any deficiency of trust-funds to meet the annuity, it might be made up from his lands of Broomhill; but until such deficiency arose, he submitted that no claim could be made against Broomhill, or against him as intromitter with its rents; and he alleged that,

No. 161. so far from there being any such deficiency, there was a large sum lying in bank.
 May 20, 1857.
 Hamilton v.
 Bruce's
 Trustees.

He maintained that the inhibitors were themselves primarily responsible for the annuity, and, in making payment of it under the terms of the trust-deed, they were expending funds destined by the truster to be so applied. He produced a letter from Mrs Henderson, and other documents, by which she restricted her claim of annuity as against Broomhill.

He contended, that even although the property of Broomhill should be found to have been conveyed, under burden of the said annuity, without any right of relief, and that it forms a real burden over it in so far as it subsists and is effectual, he had come under no personal obligation or liability to pay the same. But, in any view, if the annuity was made contingently a real burden on the lands, and was so secured to the full amount to which it could be claimed against the petitioner, there was no room for the use of the diligence of inhibition. He could not sell or burden Broomhill without a full reservation of the burden, and in so far as related to alienation of his other property, there was no obligation against him to be enforced by diligence. The utmost that he could be asked to do was to account for any free surplus he might receive (and that only to the extent of the restricted annuity, and not to the extent of the whole annuity as is sued for), but he had received none, so had none to account for.

The diligence was thus nimious and vexatious, uncalled for, even although it had been meant solely to apply to Broomhill, but doubly so as affecting the petitioner personally, and his other lands and estate. Hamilton farther stated, he believed the raising of the action and use of this diligence to be merely a vindictive attempt to hurt his feelings, and to injure him in his credit."

The trustees lodged answers, in which they stated that in 1847 they raised a multiplepoinding for the distribution of the estate and effects of the late Mr Bruce, falling under his trust-settlement, to which all the beneficiaries were called, and which was still in dependence; that since 1846 Hamilton had collected the whole rents of Broomhill, and refused to pay any portion of the annuities due to Mrs Bruce or Henderson, amounting as at Martinmas 1855, to L.4000; that they had paid or allowed the whole annuity for that period, but that any further payment was objected to by the beneficiaries under the trust-deed, who maintained that they, the trustees, were bound to make their right of relief against the petitioner effectual: they had therefore been obliged, for their own safety, to raise this action.

The value of the estate of Broomhill was stated by the trustees to be worth, at a moderate estimate, L.15,000.

LORD PRESIDENT.—If we find that a party, pursuer in an action upon which diligence may be used for security, has already obtained that security, the question arises, whether the use of diligence in such circumstances is not such a hardship that the Court will not allow it? The value of the estate of Broomhill, according to the statement of the respondents themselves, is amply sufficient as a security for the annuity which is created a burden upon it. I perfectly understand that they are not bound by any separate transaction which the widow may have made with the petitioner, for they have to protect the interest of the beneficiaries under the trust, but it appears to me that in the present position of matters the security of the estate held by the petitioner, under that real burden, is a sufficient security for their claims, and that it is an oppressive proceeding to use diligence against the petitioner. If it should appear that the estate was being disposed of, or that there was not sufficient security, there might be a good reason for coming here again, but in present circumstances, looking to the value of the estate and the sum concluded for, the security is ample, and the diligence ought to be recalled.

LORD IVORY.—I am impressed with the same view. The question is, whether this

Mrs Henderson has not already got what the law considers a good security for her claim? If she had got caution for L.12,000 upon the dependence of an action for her annuity, it would have been difficult to say that that was not ample security. Are the trustees not in the same situation in regard to this property? There is a real burden constituted—I do not say whether there is a personal obligation constituted or not—but there is a real burden constituted against the lands in favour of the widow, and she has assigned it to the trustees who are asking the security. It seems to me that they are running no danger, and that when this depending action comes to an end, there will be ample means to pay the trustees, and leave a reversion. What more can they want? The diligence seems oppressive.

No. 161.

May 20, 1857.
Jack v. Jack.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I am of the same opinion. For a comparatively small claim the trustees have got a security that will be preferable, even although the petitioner should become bankrupt; and in such circumstances, I think it is a gross abuse of diligence to use it as has been done here.

There are conclusions in the action for future accounting; a person is not entitled to use such diligence without an express averment that the debtor is vergens ad insopiam. In every view it ought to be recalled.

LORD DEAS.—I agree. The case stands thus: The late James Bruce dies, leaving a widow and daughter. By his antenuptial contract his widow was entitled to an annuity of L.300 a-year (afterwards enlarged to L.500), and his lands of Broomhill stood destined to the issue of the marriage. It has been found that the obligation to pay the annuity was a personal obligation upon Mr Bruce, and that he had no power by his subsequent deed to make it affect (as he attempted to do) the lands of Broomhill. Then the daughter, by her antenuptial contract of marriage, conveyed Broomhill to the issue of the marriage, whom failing, to her husband, under the burden of the annuity. The husband has succeeded under this destination, and the main question between the parties, in the depending action, is whether the clause in his contract constitutes a personal obligation on him for the annuity, or merely creates it a real burden on the estate of Broomhill? The trustees of Mr James Bruce, who have got all his other property except Broomhill, have paid the widow's annuity, and claim relief against Mr Hamilton, alternatively for the whole annuity, assuming him to have become personally bound for it, or, otherwise, for a proportion of it, supposing it to be merely a real burden on the lands. Now, even supposing Mr Hamilton to be personally bound for the annuity, the real burden created in favour of the widow, by the disposition latterly granted by him and infestment thereon, stands assigned, by her, to the trustees in security and relief of the sums paid by them to her. This security is very considerable. For the trustees themselves say the lands are worth L.15,000 exclusive of the minerals. Holding such a security, I think the trustees would require to shew very clear grounds to justify them in resorting to the diligence of inhibition and arrestment. In place of this it appears to me that the question of personal liability (although I do not at present enter upon it) is, to say the least of it, attended with very considerable difficulty. And, upon the whole, I have no doubt that the diligence ought to be recalled without caution or consignation.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the inhibition referred to in the petition, and loose the arrestments used against the petitioner, and referred to in the petition, and grant warrant for marking the said inhibition in the record of inhibitions as discharged: Find the respondents liable in expenses," &c.

No. 162.

~~Deathbed~~.—Question, whether, in a reduction ex facie gratuitous, on the ground of ~~deathbed~~, it is competent to have effect given to claims of the disponent against the grantor of the deed.

No. 162. Mrs JACK brought this action of reduction ex capiti lecti of a disposition granted by her late brother, Peter Jack, in favour of the defender, his half brother, of certain property in which the defender was now infeft. The pursuer proposed the usual issue:—

May 21, 1857.
Jack v. Jack.

1st Division.
Ld Mackenzie.
L.

It being admitted that she was nearest and lawful heir, and that Peter Jack died on the 18th of July 1849; whether the disposition sought to be reduced, “was executed by the said Peter Jack on deathbed?”

The defender stated that although the disposition bore to be granted for love, favour, and affection, he had made advances to his father and half brother for their support, and also for the repairs of house property, and that the pursuer had homologated the disposition; he therefore pleaded that the deed was truly onerous, and not reducible; in any event, that he was entitled to repayment of these advances before decree of reduction was pronounced.

He proposed the following issues:—“1. Whether the defender, for and on account of the deceased Peter Jack, made the disbursements contained in schedule I, hereunto annexed, or any part thereof, and what part? 2. Whether the defender, for and on account of the deceased William Jack, and of the said Peter Jack, or either of them, made the disbursements contained in schedule II, hereunto annexed, or any part thereof, and what part? 3. Whether the defender did work or make advances for additions to and repairs on the property contained in the disposition under reduction, to the amount of L.88, 4s., or to any part of said amount, and to what part? 4. Whether the disposition under reduction was granted for onerous causes? 5. Whether, after the death of the said Peter Jack, the pursuer homologated the said disposition.”

The Lord Ordinary reported the cause.*

The case was called on 11th March.

Logan, for the pursuer, pleaded;—That the only question that could be competently raised was, whether this deed was invalid by reason of being executed on deathbed? This was ex facie a gratuitous deed, and the question is, whether the defender could convert this action into an action for constituting some illiquid debt which he says he has against the estate? There was no authority for doing so. The proposal now is really to try a question of accounting before a jury.

Scott, for the defender, pleaded;—That the claim against the estate was an equitable claim, which must be met before the pursuer could set aside this disposition.

LORD DEAS.—If this person takes the property, must she not pay the debts? and if so, is not this the proper time for ascertaining what these debts are? But are they relevantly averred? I doubt whether this action ought not to be sisted until the defender bring an action of count and reckoning.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think that the defender should bring a counter action for constituting his debt. We shall meanwhile delay the consideration of the case.

* “NOTE.—The issue proposed by the pursuer is that usually taken where a deed is challenged on the head of deathbed, and no objections were stated to it by the defender.

“Various counter issues were proposed by the defender. The whole of them except the last were intended to allow the defender an opportunity of proving that the deed challenged was granted for onerous causes. But the deed itself bears to be granted for love, favour, and affection, and the Lord Ordinary does not see how the defender can be permitted in this action to contradict this by a proof that the deed was granted for onerous causes, whatever remedy he may be entitled to for his alleged advances in another form, if the deed shall be reduced on the head of deathbed. It is also objected by the pursuer that the defender’s averments are not sufficient to entitle him to an issue of homologation.”

The case was again called of this date. No counter action had been raised, but the defender craved leave to amend his defences, and make such specific statement of his advances as he thought would make them relevant to be tried in this action.

No. 162.
May 21, 1857.
Laing v.
Adamson.

The pursuer objected to the course now proposed, and contended that he was now entitled to have an issue of deathbed, and to have the counter issues refused.

LORD DEAS.—I wish to explain that I neither give nor indicate any opinion to the effect that the disponent under a disposition granted on deathbed may not hold the property till relieved of any debt relevantly averred to be due to him. I do not enter into that question at all. I go entirely on the ground that no debt is here relevantly averred to be due to the defender; and this, according to the note I made on my papers at the time, was the impression of all your Lordships at the last advising, although we were disposed to allow the defender an opportunity of bringing a counter action if so advised. But the defender not having brought his counter action, it is out of the question to allow him to cure the defects in his averments in the way he now proposes, by amending his record. I am therefore for refusing the counter issues in respect of the want of relevancy in the averments.

The rest of the Court concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Approve of the issue for the pursuer as now adjusted and settled, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed farther as shall be just."

No. 163.

Poor—Proof.—The case of Mackay v. Baillie, 20th July 1853, did not establish any abstract or absolute rule that the onus of proving that a woman applying for parochial relief for her child is an able-bodied person, capable of supporting herself and child, is laid upon the parochial board.

In an application for parochial relief by Christian Adamson or Fisher, residing in Tillicoultry, the declaration of the applicant was to the effect that her husband had deserted her, that she was unable to work, that she had a sickly child, four years of age, and that her own age was forty-five.

May 22, 1857.
1st Division.
C.

Relief was refused, and in defence to an action before the Sheriff of Stirlingshire, the inspector of the poor stated that she was an able-bodied woman in the prime of life, and with only one child, nearly four years of age, to support, and that she had an older son, a collier, who earned large wages, and for whom she kept house.

A proof was allowed and taken.

The pursuer pleaded;—That the onus of proving that the applicant was able to support herself and child lay on the inspector, and that he had failed to establish that.¹

The Sheriff-substitute (Hay) held that the defender had failed to prove that the applicant was an able-bodied woman, and therefore decerned against the defender.

On appeal the Sheriff-depute (Baillie) adhered, stating in a note, "that on his mind the judgment of the Court in the case of Mackay was not entirely satisfactory, or consistent with the judgment of the Court of Session and of the House of Lords in the case of an able-bodied male parent. But after considering the report of the case, he had come to the conclusion that the rule there established warranted the judgment under appeal."

No. 163. In an advocacy,—

May 27, 1857. Kerr v. James. LORD PRESIDENT.—We are all of opinion that the proof in this case is quite unsatisfactory ; and, therefore, that a remit should be made to the Sheriff to allow a proof of new to both parties.

We do not consider that the case of Mackay fixed any abstract or absolute rule that, in such an application as the present, by a woman with one child, the burden of proving that she is able to support that child is necessarily thrown upon the parochial board. That depends on the circumstances of each case. The circumstances for consideration may vary much, and little may turn the onus one way or another.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor :—“ In respect the questions involved in the cause cannot be satisfactorily disposed of on the proof as it presently stands, remit the process to the Sheriff, with instructions to him to allow a proof to both parties of their averments on the record, and thereafter to proceed with the cause as shall be just ; also to find the party applicant in the inferior Court entitled to the expenses incurred by her in leading the proof heretofore adduced, and to have the amount thereof ascertained, and to decern for payment of the same : Further, they find the said applicant in the inferior Court entitled to the expenses incurred by her in this Court, subject to modification : Modify the same to L.7, 7s., and decern for payment thereof, and generally in terms of this interlocutor.”

BECKIE AND MARGARET COLVILLE AND OTHERS, Claimants.—Young—Scott.

Process—Multiplepinding—How far a claimant is entitled to insist on consignation of a fund in medio.—The surviving trustee under a trust-settlement raised a multiplepinding and exoneration, under which the Lord Ordinary found a certain claimant entitled to the whole fund in medio, but that it was the duty of the trustee, before paying over the fund, to provide for certain liferent annuities. The claimant—on the ground that he was entitled at once to payment of the whole fund, under burden of the annuities—reclaimed ; and, while the reclaiming note was undisposed of, moved for consignation of a large portion of the fund, which was in bank in name of the trustee. Held (aff. judgment of Lord Ardmillan, diss. Lord Deas), as the trust was still subsisting, and there was no allegation of maladministration, or of danger to the fund, and the annuitants and trustee objecting that the claimant was not entitled to get consignation.

May 27, 1857. CHRISTOPHER KERR, writer in Dundee, as surviving trustee of the late Mr Colville, raised an action of multiplepinding, with a view to the distribution of the trust-funds, and his own exoneration.
1st DIVISION.
Ld. Ardmillan C.

The fund in medio consisted of a sum of L.10,000.

Mr and Mrs James claimed to be preferred to the whole fund, “ subject to the burden of paying the annuities provided by the will of the said William Colville.”

The only other claimants were certain parties entitled to annuities under the deeds constituting the trust, who “ claimed to have a sum set apart under the trust of Mr Kerr, or otherwise, to secure the regular payment of their annuities, or to have annuities purchased for them ; or, at least, to have such security as will ensure the regular payment of their annuities.”

On 19th February 1856, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following

No. 164.

Kerr v. James.

interlocutor: — “1st, Finds that in terms of the deeds produced, viz., the deed of William Colville in 1842; the deed of Helen Colville in 1847; and the last will and testament of William Colville in 1848; the claimants Mr and Mrs James are entitled to the fund in medio, they taking all usual and necessary steps to discharge the trustee of the same. But, 2dly, Finds that the trustee of William Colville is bound by his trust-deed in 1842 to fulfil the directions of Helen Colville in regard to this fund; that Helen Colville did by her deed in 1847 direct the trustees to pay over this fund ‘in such way as her father William Colville might direct by a mortis causa deed;’ that William Colville did by his will in 1848 effectually exercise this power of direction, and that the trustee is bound to pay the said fund ‘in such way’ as therein directed. 3dly, Finds that on a fair construction of the will of William Colville, read as an exercise of the reserved power of direction, the annuities therein set forth are so charged upon the fund, which the trustees are directed to pay; that it is the duty of the surviving trustee now holding that fund to see that the interest of the annuitants is reasonably secured before paying over the whole of the fund to Mr and Mrs James. With these findings, Appoints the cause to be enrolled with a view to farther procedure in distribution, and reserves all questions of expenses.” *

Mr and Mrs James reclaimed; and, while that reclaiming note was undisposed of,—

Clark, for the claimants Mr and Mrs James, craved the Lord Ordinary “to ordain the raiser to make consignation in this process of the sum of L.7500, being that part of the fund in medio which, as appears from the condescendence thereof, is at present in bank; and he further stated that he made this motion on the footing that the pleas of parties should not in any way be affected or prejudiced by consignation being ordered and made as craved.”

On 27th January 1857, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following inter-

* “NOTE.—The fund in medio is brought into Court by the trustee, who craves to be exonerated. It is in his hands as trustee; he is called on for payment as trustee; for the act of payment he claims and is entitled to judicial exoneration. It is admitted to be his duty to pay ‘in such way as William Colville might direct,’ and Mr and Mrs James claim under the will of William Colville as a direction. It is as much a direction to the trustees as if it had been within the deed of Helen Colville. The bequest of the annuities is part of the will, and the annuities are, as part of the direction, made a burden on the fund bequeathed and directed to be paid. If there was insolvency, or the prospect of insolvency, on the part of Mr James, it is not disputed that the trustee could refuse to pay, and ought to refuse to pay, the whole fund to him and his wife. If so, then the interest of the annuitants is in the charge of the trustee, and cannot be disregarded by him, nor by the Court, from whom he craves exoneration. These annuitants are here enforcing their claim to obtain secure annuities out of this fund. The payment of the annuities is a burden and condition of Mrs James’ right to the provision, and it is only as so burdened, and under that condition, that the trustee can make payment to Mr and Mrs James, or the Court can direct it.

“It may be observed that, on 20th December 1855, Mr James obtained warrant for payment to him of L.200, to meet annuities due to Beckie Colville and Margaret Colville or Blechynden, and this not in respect of his own or Mrs James’ right to the whole fund, but in virtue of a power of attorney which he held from these ladies, who truly received their annuities from the trustee, under warrant of the Court, just in the same manner as the claimants Margaret and Christian Colville did on 10th December 1855.

“Some arrangements for purchasing or securing these annuities should be made. The fact that Mr James does not reside within the jurisdiction of the Scottish Courts is not to be altogether overlooked. But the Lord Ordinary thinks that, looking to the terms of the deeds, there are materials for disposing of this question apart from the circumstance of English domicile.”

No. 164. locutor :—"Having heard parties on the claimants', Mr and Mrs James', motion for consignation of the fund in medio : In respect that the other claimants, having a judgment in their favour now under review, insist on holding the trustees bound to retain the fund until they are secured in their annuities, and in respect that, in the present state of the process, Mr Kerr, the real raiser, objects to consignation, and that the fund is in bank, and deposit receipts therefor are in process, and insecurity thereof is not alleged. Refuses in hoc statu the motion for consignation, and reserves the question of expenses."

May 27, 1857.
Kerr v. James.

Mr and Mrs James reclaimed. They pleaded ;—That the only part of the fund in medio which they wanted consigned, was that part of it which stood in bank in Kerr's name, he having power to draw it out whenever he pleased. That was a state of things which the Court would not sanction ; and, considering the responsibility which attached to the trustee, it was not a little strange that he should oppose the motion. When the holder of a fund comes into Court as the raiser of a multiplepoinding, it followed, as a matter of course, that that fund should be consigned whenever any claimant so demanded. That was Kerr's position. He had no legitimate interest to retain the fund. It was not intended to deprive him of the trust-estate to such an extent as would deprive him of an ample margin to meet all necessary claims against him. Nor would the effect of the motion be to disturb the security of the annuitants. If it were so, that would be a good answer to the demand. But, on the contrary, their security would be strengthened. No relevant ground had been stated against this consignation by the trustee, who, in opposing it, only wished to retain unlimited control over so large a sum. It might be true that the annuitants would be obliged to come termly to this Court for an order on the consigned fund ; but that they must do at any rate, as the trustee was not now safe to pay any part of the fund away of his own authority ; for when a fund is put in manibus curiæ by the institution of a multiplepoinding, the holder of the fund pays only at his peril.

Pleaded for the trustee ;—Although this process was brought for the purpose, inter alia, of getting exoneration for the trustee, it was not clear that he would get exoneration ; and if Mr and Mrs James should be found to have no right to the fund, he might be answerable to other parties for the fund, which would no longer be in his possession. This consignation would be irregular, and would be throwing a practical slur against the trustee which the Court would be unwilling to sanction.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—I cannot say that the reasons urged for altering this interlocutor are sufficient to my mind. Kerr is trustee in possession of the fund, and bound to execute the trust. There is no ground stated for putting an end to the trust, or for depriving Kerr of the management which belongs to a trustee. It is usual in an ordinary process of multiplepoinding, or of multiplepoinding and exoneration, that the fund in medio shall be consigned. But that is not an absolute rule and its application depends on the nature of the questions raised in the action. In this particular case the multiplepoinding has been brought, mainly with reference to the determination of a question which might have been tried in another form,—for example, by declarator—the question being, whether Mr and Mrs James are entitled to have this fund paid over to them de plano under burden of paying these annuities, or whether the annuities must be first provided for ? A multiplepoinding seemed the better form for trying that question, for all parties might be brought into the field ; and in the course of the process an arrangement might be made whereby the interest of the annuitants might be satisfied, the trust wound up, and exoneration granted to the trustee. But until that question is determined, and a ong as Mr and Mrs James insist on that claim, and the annuitants and trustee dispute that construction of the trust-deed, the trust itself must be held to be a subsisting trust, and Kerr to be under the obligation of a trustee to execute it. No. 164.

May 27, 1857.
Kerr v. James.

Farther, the Lord Ordinary by his judgment has construed the trust-deeds to mean, that Mr and Mrs James are not entitled to have the fund paid to them under the burden of paying the annuities; but, on the contrary, that it is the duty of the trustee to see to the interest of the annuitants, and to execute the trust by fulfilling the obligations due to these annuitants. Mr and Mrs James have reclaimed against that judgment. On the other hand, Kerr has also reclaimed; and he contends that Mr and Mrs James are not in a position in any view to obtain judgment, to the effect that the fund shall be paid over to them. That question remains to be determined. In the meantime the claim is made for consignation—that is, for taking the fund out of the hands of the trustee. I do not enter into any consideration of the particular terms of the deposit receipts which are in Kerr's name; for to resume that no form of deposit receipt by Kerr would satisfy Mr and Mrs James. The only question is, whether we are to order consignation.

Now, it appears to me, that while there is a going trust, and the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary stands unrecalled, it is incumbent on Kerr under this trust to attend to the interest of these annuitants, and, of course, to pay to them their annuities. There is no tangible ground for taking the fund out of his hand. We are told that the annuitants will have a better security by consignation. But those are the annuitants who have appeared in this case are of a different opinion; and the Lord Ordinary has held the duty of the trustee to be such as I have stated it, we cannot, until we dispose of that interlocutor, decide otherwise. We have not yet heard parties upon the question, whether the Lord Ordinary has put the right construction upon the trust-deeds or not; and in that state of matters there is a presumption in favour of and not against his Lordship's interlocutor. If we order the fund to be taken out of the hands of the trustee—which I think would be a very unusual proceeding, where no complaint has been made of his management—I see certain inconveniences which might attend such a proceeding, although mainly on the ground that a foundation has not been laid for depriving him of custody of the trust-fund. But, in the first place, consignation imposes a limit on the revenue to be derived from the fund, for the trustee might find a safe investment to yield better interest than bank interest. In the second place, it would here impose certain difficulties and obstacles, for the annuitants could not demand without applying to the Court for authority. The expense attending that might perhaps be borne by the parties who now demand the consignation; but again, the annuitants are entitled to quarterly payment, and quarterly applications of that sort to the Court are not very usual, nor always possible when the Court is not sitting. Therefore there are practical inconveniences attending consignation; and why should they be imposed when no proper ground is stated for removing the management by the trustee, except that the party who prima facie has the greatest ultimate interest in the fund so demands it? But the annuitants have the first interest, and the trustee requires to have funds in his hands to meet the annuities. I do not go into the matter of accounting, which is not now before the Court. The question is, whether this sum of L.7500 is to be taken out of the control and management of the trustee altogether, and put into the hands of the Court? The Court might afterwards find, that if the trust is to continue, the trustee might get it.

But why do that? I see no ground for disturbing the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

MR IVORY.—I am clearly of the same opinion, and your Lordship has rested your judgment on a sound principle. The question is simply—Is this a subsisting trust? and if so, shall the Court force the trustee to give up the administration of the fund and take it on themselves? That is a course which the Court will not take, if it can by possibility avoid it. They may be obliged to do so, if there be mismanagement on the part of the trustee, or suspicions of the safety of the funds, or other cause to render it expedient for the Court to interfere. But when a party has funds in the hands of a trustee, he intends that they shall remain there, and that the trustee shall not be interfered with by others while discharging his duty. Mr and Mrs James now claim, in point of fact, to be trustees for the annuitants, and have

- No. 164. the fund paid into their hands without any conditions whatever, and that the annuitants shall be mere creditors of Mr and Mrs James.
- May 27, 1857. Kerr v. James. Now, besides the fact that Mr and Mrs James are resident beyond the jurisdiction of this Court, this is a proposal which the Lord Ordinary, by interlocutor now in dependence, has negatived. If Mr and Mrs James had acquiesced in the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, which finds that they are entitled to the fund, but that the interest of the annuitants must first be secured, there might have been more room for moving for consignation; for they might have said, that all that remained now to be done was only executorial. But the interlocutor is reclaimed against by Mr and Mrs James, who still maintain that the fund is properly their own, and that the annuitants are to look to them and not to the trustee for protection. While that interlocutor remains, I must hold that the Lord Ordinary has rightly settled that hoc statu the Court is not to interfere. We must also keep in mind that there are annuitants who have been called in the multiplepoinding, but who are in India, and it may be doubted whether we should give judgment in their absence. It may increase the difficulty if they are to be obliged to come here every quarter for payment of their annuities. But why should all this be done? The trustee has properly exercised his functions, and are we now summarily to oust him—for that is the proposal? This fund is in bank on deposit receipts, in such terms as save the estate from all peril. It is perfectly clear, therefore, that—unless the Court is prepared to decide in the abstract, that wherever there is a going trust, any one interested who chooses to bring a multiplepoinding may stop the trust, and supersede the trust management—there are no grounds for interfering in this case.
- LORD CURRIEHILL.—From the mode in which this case has been argued, it makes it one of considerable importance as a precedent. The trust-deeds vest that fund of L.10,000 in the trustees, of whom Kerr is the sole survivor. The duty imposed on the trustees is to pay this fund to Mr and Mrs James, when they have provided for certain annuities. The annuitants are, as I understand, lifereit annuitants; so that the instalments of their annuities will be payable to them as long as they live, unless, by some arrangement into which they cannot be compelled to enter, they convert these annuities into a capital sum. But, as matters stand, an obligation is imposed on Kerr to pay these annuities so long as the annuitants live. A different construction may afterwards be put on these deeds when we come to consider them; but, hoc statu, we are bound to assume that such is the condition of this trust. Such being the state of matters, this trust, technically speaking, is a continuing trust, and I do not think a process of multiplepoinding raised for the purpose of determining which of several parties are entitled to a fund placed a trust of that kind under the administration of this Court. The trustee continues to manage the fund. He uplifts its annual revenue, and pays the annual burden for which it is liable. The mere institution of a process of multiplepoinding does not ipso facto deprive the trustee of his powers, nor relieve him from his responsibilities. They both continue as before. It is quite true that when the Court has such an action before them, if it be satisfactorily made out that the fund is in jeopardy, they will listen to an application for the purpose of taking means for securing it. But they will not do so as a matter of course, and without a special case being made out for their interference; and therefore, unless we are now to depart from the practice of the Court in this respect, there is no ground for disturbing this interlocutor by interfering with the present management of the trust in hoc statu.
- LORD DEAS.—There is a fund here of from L.10,000 to L.12,000, in regard to which, so far as we see, the reclaimers Mr and Mrs James are the sole beneficiaries. There is nobody called in the action, and nobody has appeared who pretends right to compete with them as claimants to the whole trust-estate, subject to the annuities amounting in whole to L.250 a-year. There is thus an ample fund belonging to the reclaimers to meet all the expenses attending consignation, and the expenses of any warrants for payment of the annuities, or otherwise, which may be required. In this state of matters, I see no interest either the trustee or the annuitants have to object to consignation. The money will not be less secure than it now is, and as the expense will all fall on a fund belonging exclusively to the beneficiaries asking consignation, I do not see why they should not be indulged with it. At the sametime it is a mere question of discretion, and I see no present reason apprehend risk from the one course being followed more than the other. The only thing I regret is, that there should have been expense and time bestowed on a question, the issue of which seems to me so immaterial to all or any of the parties, and which, according to the view I take of it, is quite special, as indeed almost every case of the kind must be. From the general principle that a going trust ought not to be interfered with on slight grounds, I do not differ.

Process—Landlord and tenant—Summary removing—1 & 2 Vict. cap. 119, sect. 1.
—Held (aff. judgment of Lord Mackenzie), that a summary complaint for removing is competent if it describe the nature of the tenancy with accuracy, although not in the precise terms of the schedule annexed to the statute.

THE Shotts Iron Company presented an application to the Sheriff of May 28, 1857. markshire for warrant of removing against John Paton, a collier, formerly in their employment. The application was in the following terms:—"That the complainers let to the said defender a dwelling-house and pertinents, situated at No. 53 High Street, Shotts Iron Works aforesaid, in the county of Glasgow, for a fortnight, for which period he was hired to work in the complainers' service as workman, and fortnightly during such time as the said defender should continue to work in the said complainers' service—his hiring being from fortnight to fortnight, and no longer, and terminable on a fortnight's notice by either party to the other; and the let of the said dwelling-house and pertinents, which was a mere accessory to the said hiring, being, in like manner, terminable at the end of each fortnight. That the rent of said dwelling-house and pertinents, for each fortnight, was at a rate not more than L.30 sterling per annum; and the said defender having, on about the 13th day of March 1856 years, on expiry of a fortnight's warning, ceased to be a workman in the complainer's service, the said let terminated on the same day in like manner; and the said defender was then bound to remove from the said dwelling-house and pertinents: That the said defender nevertheless refuses, or at least delays to do so, though the period of his lease has expired. Therefore, decret ought to be granted," &c.

The respondent lodged answers, in which he objected that the complaint was not in the form prescribed by the schedule annexed to the statute 1 & 2 Vict. cap. 119, under which it was presented, in respect the statute provides that the beginning and ending of the let shall be set forth thus, "for a period from to," whereas the complaint nowhere set forth when the subjects were let, and consequently was informal and defective.

The Sheriff-substitute (Tennent) pronounced the following interlocutor: "Finds that the complaint is not framed in accordance with or to the effect of the form in schedule A of the Act 1st and 2d Victoria, cap. 119,

No. 165. and that it is incompetent as brought; and therefore dismisses the same:

 Co. v. Paton.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor on 26th February 1857:—"Finds that the summary complaint for removing was competently brought before the Sheriff under the 8th section of the Act 1st and 2d Victoria, chapter 119, and is framed substantially to the effect of schedule A, annexed to that Act: Finds that written answers to the complaint were ordered by the Sheriff, and that, by the 13th section of the said Act, it is provided that 'in all cases where written answers shall be ordered, such cases shall thereafter be conducted as nearly as may be according to the forms in use in ordinary processess of removing, and the judgment of the Sheriff therein shall be subject to review in common form;' Therefore, remits to the Sheriff with instructions to recall the interlocutors complained of; to repel the objections to the competency of the complaint; to allow the parties a proof of their averments in point of fact; and thereafter to proceed as may be just, and decerns: Finds the advocates entitled to the expenses incurred by them in this Court," &c.†

* "NOTE.—The Sheriff-substitute has felt a good deal of difficulty with regard to the point raised in this case, but has at last come to the opinion that the complaint does not comply with the statutory requisites in the schedule, and cannot be sustained. The statute renders it competent to pursue summary removings in the given form where the rent is under L.30 per annum, and the house is let for a shorter period than a year. The length of the let is therefore inter essentialia in determining the competency of a complaint in this form.

"Accordingly, the schedule referred to in the empowering section requires the period of the let to be stated, the words used being 'for the period from to ;' the complainer being empowered only to present a summary complaint in the form 'or to the effect' of the schedule.

"The present complaint is not in the form of the schedule, and bears little resemblance to it. The question is, is it to the same effect?

"The Sheriff-substitute thinks it is not—the period of the let is nowhere expressly stated in the complaint, and is only to be gathered from the statement that is given of the contract of hiring between the pursuer and the defender, to which it is said to be accessory. There could have been no difficulty in stating the period of the let as required by the schedule, and it would appear that the omission to do so deprives the pursuers of the benefit of the summary remedy of the statute."

† "NOTE.—This is a summary complaint for removing from houses or heritable subjects, said to be let for a shorter period than a year, at a rent of which the rate does not exceed L.30 per annum, under the 1st and 2d Victoria, chapter 119, section 8. It was objected to the competency, that the complaint was not framed in the form, or to the effect of schedule A, annexed to the Act, and that objection was sustained by the Sheriff.

"According to the form of complaint given in the schedule, it is stated that the subjects are let 'for the period from to ; that the said defender is bound to remove from the said subjects at the date last mentioned,' &c. Here the complaint bears—1st, That the subjects were let to the defender for a fortnight, the hiring of the premises, and of his services as a workman, being from fortnight to fortnight, and terminating at any time on a fortnight's warning. 2d. That the said let terminated on or about the 13th March 1856, on the expiry of a fortnight's warning, and that the defender was then bound to remove;—and. 3d. that the rent was at a less rate than L.30 per annum. These particulars are set forth with accuracy and precision; and the Lord Ordinary thinks the complaint, though not in the same words, is substantially to the same effect as the schedule A annexed to

Paton reclaimed, and pleaded;—That this was not a case of tenancy but of service, in regard to which the complaint was vague and ambiguous. Besides, being presented under the statute 1 & 2 Vict., cap. 119, the complaint must comply in all respects with the statutory forms.¹

Counsel for the advocates were not called on.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I hold that the statute applies to a case of this kind—as to which, indeed, we have no question at present, for there is no plea to that effect. Therefore, holding the statute to apply, the petition ought to contain the res gestae giving rise to the action; and this being a case in which a party occupies a house in his character of a servant—as an accessory to his hiring—at an estimated value, I do not see how there was any other way of stating that, except the way which has been adopted. The complaint states the nature of the tenancy,—which is no doubt peculiar,—and then it states that “the defender having on or about the 13th day of March 1856 years, on expiry of a fortnight's warning, ceased to be a workman in the complainers' service, the said let terminated on the same day in like manner, and the said defender was then bound to remove from the said dwelling-house and pertinents.” The complainers sufficiently set forth all that the statute requires, and in a way that meets the peculiarity of the case.

The case of Hill v. Dymock has no bearing on the present case. That was a case of criminal procedure, the question being, whether a party was convicted properly under a particular statute? That procedure requires very exact conformity to the statutory form, and the decision there does not here apply. I have no serious difficulty in this case. The judgment of the Lord Ordinary is quite right.

LORD IVORY.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I am also of the same opinion. The statute is not to be construed in that strict manner contended for in argument, because it says that the petition is to be in terms, or to the effect of the schedule.

LORD DEAS.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The words of sect. 8 of the statute are, that the complaint is to be “in the form, or to the effect of schedule A.” Now, the effect of schedule A is, that the complaint shall state the nature and terms of the lease so far as necessary to shew that the removing is properly brought under the Act. That is done here, and done in the only way it well could be. The more strictly the enactment is construed, the more clear it is that it has been complied with to the letter.

the Act, and that there is no such variance in the form as can render the application incompetent.

“At the debate, the respondent attempted to raise a new plea, that the advocacy was incompetent, under the 22d section of the Act 16 and 17 Victoria, chapter 80, on the ground that the cause did not exceed the value of L.25. No such plea is stated upon the record, which was closed after the parties had availed themselves of their privilege of lodging additional pleas in this Court. When the respondent asked leave to have the record opened up to have the new plea added, the Lord Ordinary intimated that this could only be allowed on payment of a certain sum of expenses, whereupon the respondent abandoned his motion, and consented to the debate proceeding on the record as it stood; and in the discussion which followed, he strenuously contended that, though the plea was not upon the record, it was per judicis to give effect to it. Now, it is thought that course is not imperative in a case like the present, where the conclusions are not of a pecuniary nature. This is a removing where the right to possess the subjects is involved, and the matter in dispute on the face of the proceedings is uncertain. Whether advocacy is excluded in this and similar cases under the recent Sheriff Court Act, may be a very important question; but as there is no plea on the record to raise it, the Lord Ordinary does not consider himself called upon to give any opinion on the point.”

DAVID M'CUBBIN AND OTHERS, Respondents.—*Macfarlane—Scott.*Ure v.
M'Cubbin.

Bankruptcy—Recall of Sequestration—19 and 20 Vict., cap. 79, sect. 31—Acquiescence.—A creditor who lodged a claim in a sequestration became a candidate for the office of trustee, and urged certain objections to the vote of the concurring creditor in the application for sequestration who voted for the other candidate. His objections were not sustained, and he was not appointed trustee. He now on the same grounds presented a petition for recall of the sequestration;—Held, (aff judgment of Lord Mackenzie) that he was barred by acquiescence from insisting in his objections, as no radical defect in the sequestration, nor any injury to the general body of creditors was alleged.

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Mackenzie
I.

THIS was a petition presented by Ure under 19 & 20 Vict., cap. 79, sect. 31, for recall of the sequestration of Alexander Ramsay, which had issued originally with concurrence of Dugald Ramsay, and the grounds of recall stated in the petition were;—"The bankrupt, the said Alexander Ramsay, is the brother of the said Dugald Carmichael Ramsay, and is a conjunct and confident person with him, and the application for sequestration was made collusively, in order to defeat the legal rights of bona fide creditors.

"No proof was produced with the documents upon which sequestration was awarded, to establish that the debt was really due to his brother, and the affidavit contains no statement of the circumstances under which the said document was granted, and does not even state that the document was granted of the date it bears."¹

Ure had lodged a claim in the sequestration, been a candidate for the office of trustee, and in an appeal to the Sheriff had urged these very grounds,—as well as that Dugald Ramsay's claim was "wholly fictitious,"—as objections to his vote, which had been given in favour of M'Cubbin, whom the Sheriff declared to have been duly elected.

At a meeting of creditors M'Cubbin was instructed to oppose the recall of the sequestration. Accordingly, he and Dugald Ramsay both gave in answers, and pleaded;—1. The petitioner having acquiesced in and homologated the deliverance awarding sequestration, he is barred from insisting in the present application. 2. The sequestration having been validly awarded on the application of the bankrupt, with a concurrence to the requisite amount, there is no ground for the application for recall.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"16th March 1857.—Finds no sufficient grounds stated or substantiated by the petitioner to warrant the recall of the sequestration: Therefore refuses the prayer of the petition for recall, and decerns: Finds the petitioner liable in expenses."

The particular circumstances connected with the claim of Dugald Ramsay will be found stated in the Lord Ordinary's note.*

¹Anderson v. Guild, 13th June 1852, ante, vol. xiv. p. 866.

* "NOTE.—The petitioner, who is an accountant in Glasgow, and a creditor of the bankrupt for a debt of L.26, 13s., lodged a claim in the sequestration, and attended the meeting held on the 17th December last for the election of trustee. He appeared both for himself and as mandatory for several other creditors, and no objection was then stated by him or any one else to the sequestration. On the contrary, the petitioner moved that he should be appointed trustee on the sequestrated estate; but a majority of the creditors present voted for the respondent, Mr M'Cubbin, and, after a discussion before the Sheriff, his election was confirmed and the petitioner was found liable in costs.

"After being defeated in the competition for the office of trustee in the sequestration, the petitioner has presented this application to have it recalled. The grounds of this application are not very distinctly stated, but the chief objection seems to be that the concurring creditor in the petition for sequestration was

 would be to set up a preference, which one creditor had all but secured before the sequestration was issued. This would be most injurious to the general body of creditors, who were therefore most anxious that the sequestration should be proceeded with; and it was farther contended, that the petitioner having continued a party to the sequestration so long as he had a chance of being made trustee, must now be held to have adopted and acquiesced in it, and was barred personali exceptione from applying for its recall: acquiescence might not operate as a bar when the objections were stated recently after coming to the knowledge of the objector, but the case was different where they had been known throughout the time when the acts were done, which were founded on as showing acquiescence.¹

For the reclaimer it was argued;—That whether or not acquiescence could be pleaded against him, depended altogether on the nature of the objection stated, and if it were one which struck at the claim of the con-curring creditor in the application for sequestration, that, if made good, implied a radical defect, and the sequestration must fall. The affidavit on which the sequestration was issued was unexceptionable, therefore Mr Ure had thought all was right, but since then he had discovered, and now alleged, that the bills founded on by the concurring creditor were fictitious, in other words, that the concurring creditor was not a bona fide creditor to the statutory amount, and, at all events, that his claim was a contingent one, which disqualified him as a concurring creditor under section 14 of the recent Act.²

Dugald Carmichael Ramsay, the bankrupt's brother, and that the grounds of debt produced were not sufficient to support the application for sequestration.

"The sequestration was awarded by the Sheriff on 5th December 1856, and it is stated that it was resorted to for the express purpose of preventing a creditor from acquiring a preference under his diligence. The claim of Dugald C. Ramsay, the concurring creditor, is founded on two promissory-notes by the bankrupt for L.100 each, bearing to be for value received in cash, dated respectively the 8th and 11th August 1856. These promissory-notes were produced, along with an affidavit to the verity of the debt, with the petition for sequestration; and though the affidavit did not set forth specially the circumstances under which the notes were granted, this is now fully explained by the respondent Dugald C. Ramsay, in his answers. The import of his statement is, that he obtained a loan of L.200 from the English and Scottish Law Life Assurance Company in August 1856, and about the same time advanced various sums in cash to, or on account of his brother, to the full amount specified in the promissory-notes. In confirmation of his statement, the bankrupt's cash-book has been produced, containing entries from the 9th to the 20th August 1856, of various sums received from Dugald C.
 Ramsay, to the extent of L.192.

"The petitioner admits that the loan of L.200 was received by Dugald C.
 Ramsay from the Assurance Company, and nothing has been stated to show that the money was not de facto paid over and advanced to the bankrupt by his brother.
 It is not averred by the petitioner that the promissory-notes were granted without due, and, in so far as they were produced to support a petition for sequestration, there is no reason for presuming mala fides.

"On the whole, the Lord Ordinary thinks no sufficient grounds have been stated to warrant a recall of the sequestration."

 M'Cubbin.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I confess I attach the greatest importance to that first plea of personal bar against the petitioner. What is the application? It is a petition presented within forty days of the awarding of sequestration under section 31 of the last Bankrupt Act. It is not provided in that section—and, in fact, could not be—on what ground the Court are bound to recall a sequestration; the matter is left entirely to the discretion of the Court. Now, the petitioner has stated no ground of recall on the score of irregularity or informality in the granting of the sequestration, which he admits to have issued validly. That being so, it becomes very important to consider whether grounds are alleged for the advantage of the estate? What injury does the petitioner allege to the estate? We must recollect that the application is at the instance of one creditor alone, while the others instruct the trustee to proceed.

It is of great importance that individual creditors be not allowed to play fast and loose in these proceedings. Now, here we have a creditor going on for a certain time, and wanting to be elected trustee, but having failed in that, he tries to get the sequestration recalled. I think it would be an abuse, at his instance, to recall the sequestration on grounds which are all competent to be stated and discussed at a future stage in the sequestration itself. The principal objection is to the claim of Dugald Ramsay, the petitioning creditor, but if that be a good objection, we must presume effect will be given to it in the ranking. Then it is said the object of the sequestration was to cut down a preference which one creditor was securing, but that would be no ground of recall. No prejudice to the petitioner himself is stated as likely to follow from this sequestration, and the general body of creditors don't think it prejudicial to them, for they oppose its recall, and the recall is not pressed upon any ground of invalidity of the original awarding it, therefore I am not for granting it. But I can conceive many cases where sequestration is unnecessary, as where the estate is small, and one creditor has an overwhelming claim. That, however, does not seem to be the case here. What would be the result of granting this petition? A creditor can come forward and concur in a sequestration so long as he has hopes of being appointed trustee, and then turn round and obtain a recall. I see no ground, as the matter is left to our discretion, for complying with the prayer of this petition.

LORD MURRAY.—The power of recalling a sequestration is entirely a discretionary one, and as I see no injury likely to arise from the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, I do not think we should exercise it.

LORD WOOD.—This is not a case where any statutory objection to the awarding sequestration is stated, or any radical defect on which the Court might be compelled to recall it. It is a case where the recalling, or not, is matter for the exercise of the discretion of the Court.

Now, in the circumstances, no injustice will be done to any party, and, in particular, no prejudice can be suffered by the petitioner by refusing his application for recall. All objections he may have to any claims upon the bankrupt estate, and, among others, to the claim of the concurring creditor, whose debt is objected to, will, it is to be presumed, be given due effect to in the course of the sequestration; and, on the other hand, it appears from the statement on the record, that the rights of the creditors generally might be injured by a recall, as thereby the preference—which it is said a person of the name of Drummond was in the course of attempting to carry out, and which the sequestration was applied for, in order to cut down—might be made good.

Accordingly, all the other creditors, except the petitioner, are desirous to maintain the sequestration, and instructed the respondent (the trustee) at the meeting of 27th January 1857, to appear and oppose its being recalled.

In these, and the other circumstances of the case, I am of opinion that the petitioner is to be held as having by his conduct precluded himself from insisting in his application for recall, he having thereby acquiesced in the sequestration being carried through, and having waived his right to challenge it.

It appears that, in the competition for the office of trustee, the petitioner was one of the candidates, the respondent being the other. The majority of votes was adverse to the pretensions of the petitioner, and the proceedings which thereafter took place before the Sheriff in the competition show that the petitioner was then perfectly aware of all the objections to the debt of the concurring creditor, in the application for sequestration, which are now relied on as the ground on which it is pleaded that the obligation for recall ought to be sustained. These objections will be found set forth under four heads at page 4 of the appendix, along with the objections the petitioner had to the votes of the rest of the creditors who had supported the election of the respondent. But this notwithstanding, the petitioner went on before the Sheriff in the discussion as to whether he or the respondent was the party duly elected to be trustee, on the footing of the validity of the sequestration, and of he himself adopting and acquiescing in it as open to no objection. His object was not to interfere with it, but to obtain the office of trustee under it, and secure the benefits that might be derived from that office. Accordingly, not a word was heard of any objection to the sequestration itself, till after proceedings before the Sheriff had issued in finding that the respondent had been duly elected trustee, and the consequent defeat of the petitioner's claim to the office. The interlocutor of the Sheriff is dated 2d January 1857, and it was not till the 14th of that month that the petition for recall was presented; and it appears to me to be abundantly manifest, that nothing of the kind would have taken place, had the competition for the trusteeship ended differently from what it did. But I apprehend that the petitioner cannot be permitted thus to play fast and loose with the sequestration—to acquiesce in it, while he supposed it might be for his interest to do so, and when he fails in making it the means of promoting his personal views, to object to it on such grounds as he has pleaded, and this in opposition to the concurrence in the sequestration by all the other creditors, who were entitled to rely that, at least, as respected the petitioner, it would not be attempted to be interfered with, but would be allowed to proceed, for the just and legal settlement of the interests of all parties in the bankrupt estate.

LORD COWAN.—I have no objections to our resting the judgment on the ground stated in the first plea in law for the respondent, viz., that the petitioner, having acquiesced in, and homologated, the deliverance awarding sequestration, is barred from insisting in this application.

I am not satisfied that there might not have been a good ground of recall, in respect of an ex facie omission of a statutory requisite, or of there being a radical defect in the sequestration,—a defect to which acquiescence on the part of the creditor applying for the recall would not necessarily have prevented our giving effect. But in a case like this, where a creditor has identified himself with the sequestration proceedings to the extent which the reclamer here admittedly did, I think the plea of personal bar is invincible. Mr Penney, indeed, said, that a plea of personal bar will fail to meet a challenge of a sequestration on the ground of its being improperly granted. I cannot admit that doctrine, stated thus broadly. Suppose a party misleads creditors, and comes forward, appearing and taking part in the sequestration, and afterwards applies for a recall, the effect of granting which would be to set up a preference in favour of himself as a creditor, surely it is impossible that he should be entitled to take such a course to the detriment of the general body of creditors. Unless there were inherent nullity rendering the sequestration funditus void, he must be personally barred from seeking a recall of it.

The observations on this subject contained in the second volume of Bell's Commentaries, p. 332, sect. 1, apply to the course which the Court should adopt in such cases under the new Act. I think it would never do for us to recall this sequestration. This petitioner had a material interest in supporting the sequestration, so long as there was a possibility of his being appointed trustee, for he looked to getting the commission; and having supported it with that view, he cannot now, having failed to attain his object, be allowed to turn round, and say, that the sequestration had been improperly granted.

THE COURT adhered, and found additional expenses due.

Succession—Heirs-portioners—Præcipuum—Brieve of Division.—The disponee of an eldest heir-portioner sued a brieve of division, and under it claimed as præcipuum, the only house on a farm which had once formed part of a larger estate. It had always been let as a farm-house by the ancestor of the heirs-portioners, although it was alleged that it had been used as a mansion-house by one proprietor of the larger estate before it was split up and sold;—Held, that such a house could not be claimed as præcipuum;—Opinion, that in a question between heirs-portioners no house could be claimed as the mansion-house which had not been treated as such by the person to whom the heirs-portioners succeeded.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Dumfries-shire.
R.

THIS was an advocacy of a judgment by the Sheriff of Dumfriesshire, pronounced under a brieve of division purchased from Chancery by John Potts Halbert, the widower and disponee of the eldest of two heirs-portioners of the lands of Rosehall, under which brieve he claimed one-half of the lands, and also “the mansion-house of Rosehall, with the offices, garden, orchard, and ornamental ground thereto belonging, as a præcipuum.”

The history of the house in question seems to have been as follows:—It was built about the year 1771 by one George Mackenzie when joint tenant, along with a person of the name of M'Vitie, of a farm on the estate of Netherwood, which had long been the property of a family of the name of Johnston, and on which there was a mansion-house. This property was in 1777 purchased by Mackenzie, who, after the purchase, continued to reside at Rosehall, where he died in 1781. In 1782 the lands seem to have been acquired by a Mr Lowthian, who granted a lease to Mackenzie's widow of “all and hail the farm of Rosehall, with the mansion-house, offices, orchard, and pertinents,” &c., from which time downwards the house seems to have been in the occupation of the tenant for the time of the farm.

In 1803 the estate of Netherwood was again sold by Lowthian's heirs, but this time it was sold in lots, of which the 14th, comprising the farm in question, was purchased by Tristram Lowther. He seems to have been engaged in business in Liverpool, and when in Scotland never resided at Rosehall, but on another property called Dornock, in the neighbourhood of Annan. There he died in 1835 without issue. He had in 1830 executed a mortis causa disposition in favour of a nephew, John Dickson, conveying to him the lands he had so purchased, now commonly called Rosehall. The nephew, Mr Dickson, who thereupon took the name of Lowther, lived at Dornock, which his uncle had also conveyed to him, and he let the property to a tenant, who under it occupied the house,—“All and whole the lands and farm of Rosehall.” There was in fact no other house upon the lands.

Mr Dickson Lowther died in 1842; he left no settlement, and was succeeded by his two sisters, whereof the eldest (now deceased) had married Halbert, the pursuer—the younger, during the dependence of this process, married Dr Bogie.

Mrs Halbert, who died in 1844, had, under a mutual disposition and settlement, conveyed all her rights to her husband, in the event of her predecease, which took place; and at his request Mrs Bogie, then Miss Dickson, made up a title as her sister's heir, and then conveyed to him “all and whole the pro indiviso half that belonged to the said Mrs Elizabeth Johnston Dickson or Halbert, his spouse,” of the said lands. On this conveyance he was infeft in 1846. He and Mrs Bogie, in 1853, concurred in letting to an agricultural tenant “all and whole the farm of Rosehall, as lately possessed by Robert M'Harg (the tenant under the lease by Dickson Lowther), with the garden and orchard, and whole buildings, farm-offices, and pertinents thereof,” &c. No. 167.

 May 28, 1857.
 Halbert v. Bogie.

In answer to the claim for the house at Rosehall as præcipuum, besides objecting “that there neither is nor has been a mansion-house on the lands in question, or any subjects to which a claim of præcipuum could competently attach,” it was pleaded that the pursuer, as singular successor to his wife, was not entitled to any præcipuum or preference over Mrs Bogie, such claim being personal to the eldest heir-portioner.

This plea was repelled by the Sheriff, and although stated in the Court of Session, it was not persisted in. In the Sheriff-court a proof was allowed, on advising which the Sheriff-substitute (Trotter) sustained the pursuer's claim for the house at Rosehall as præcipuum, but on appeal the Sheriff-depute (M. Napier) pronounced the following interlocutor:—“17th June 1856.—Recalls the interlocutor appealed against: Finds that the dwelling-house in question upon the farm of Rosehall, which is the subject of the present brief of division, never having been used or inhabited as the family mansion-house of an estate, but having been always set under lease as the accommodation for the agricultural tenant of the said farm of Rosehall, and there being no other dwelling on the said farm to serve the purposes of agricultural tenancy, the same is not to be considered as a messuagium or mansion-house of the said divisible lands, or to be allotted as such to the elder sister (or those in her right), as a præcipuum appertaining by right of primogeniture to her, without division or equivalent compensation.

“With this finding, the Sheriff remits the case to the Sheriff-substitute to proceed under the brief of division as may seem just.” *

* “NOTE.—. . . The relevant consideration of the case is, when lot fourteen of the divided estate of Netherwood came to be sold in 1803 to Mr Lowther—the principal part of which was this same farm of Rosehall—did these lands and that small estate then acquire a messuagium or mansion-house indivisible; and is that messuagium the said house of Rosehall, now claimed as such? The Sheriff thinks not. He lays no stress upon the fact of the limited extent of the property. That is not relevant. But Mr Lowther, the disposition to whom expressly regards Rosehall as a farm, makes no mention of any mansion-house; and, what is more to the purpose, Mr Lowther let the farm, and the dwelling-house thereon in question, as an agricultural farm, with its corresponding farm accommodation. It is not alleged that there is any other accommodation for the agricultural tenant of the farm of Rosehall than this house of Rosehall; and the proof shews that there is not. Mr Lowther, again, disposes ‘the farm of Rosehall’ to his nephew, Mr Dickson Lowther; which last, in like manner, just continues the lands under lease, the agricultural tenant having the house of Rosehall for his agricultural accommodation, and there being none other on the lands for that purpose. Meanwhile, these successive proprietors of the small heritable property of Rosehall occupy as their mansion a house in another small property of their own.

“Under these circumstances, the Sheriff cannot regard the tenant's dwelling on the farm of Rosehall as other than the farm-house appertaining thereto; nor could attach the feudal notion of messuagium or mansion-house, or the important feudal consequences of such a dwelling, which cannot be traced in all its history, into any other position than as occupied by an agricultural tenant of the ‘farm of Rosehall.’ It was not a mansion-house as part of the large estate of Netherwood; and, what is more relevant, it has never been made so since the farm of Rosehall became a separate property.

“Now, the law of præcipuum as regards a house on the divisible estate, is not that the eldest co-heiress takes, without division or compensation, the best house on the estate. It is, that she takes as her præcipuum the family mansion-house on the lands, if any such there happen to be. It does not now require to be of the nature

Bogie.

A note of advocacy by Halbert was brought direct before the Second Division. The argument was mainly directed to the import of the proof, the advocator maintaining, that it showed that while Mackenzie was proprietor of Netherwood, the house at Rosehall acquired the character of a

of a fortalice, to have that consequence attached to it; but, whatever its value or condition, whether inhabitable at the time of division of the lands or not, it will be the præcipuum of the eldest co-heiress, and the only præcipuum of that kind allowed her, if it can be shewn to have been once established as the mansion-house of those lands, in contradistinction to the agricultural accommodations and dwellings of the tenants.

“ Lord Stair distinctly points to this. He says, (3, 5, 11,) ‘ Rights indivisible fall to the eldest alone, without anything in lieu thereof to the rest; as 1. The dignity of Lord, Earl, &c. 2. The principal mansion, being tower, fortalice, &c., which doth not extend to houses in burghs; nor to ordinary country-houses.’ By this last, Lord Stair means to indicate the ordinary agricultural dwellings, or farm-houses, as we now term them, as distinguished from a family mansion set apart for the heritor. The term ‘ ordinary ’ country-house used by Lord Stair, does not refer to the style, the state of repair, or the extent of the accommodation of the said country-house, but to the nature and purposes of its occupation. That is an ordinary country-house, (as distinguished from the mansion-house of the estate), which has always been occupied for agricultural purposes by the tenant of the farm on which it stands; more especially when there is no other accommodation than itself for that purpose upon the farm; and the commodious or ornate style of the dwelling with its appliances, will not, under such circumstances, take it out of that category.

“ The leading case on the subject, being that which ruled most of the subsequent cases, is Cowie v. Cowie, March 5, 1707, M. 2453. There it was decided that the right of such præcipuum did not depend upon the value of the estate, or the dwelling-house. The Sheriff-substitute is quite right in saying, ‘ In the case quoted, no distinction seems to be taken either with reference to the size of the estate, or extent of the mansion; in all cases the right of the eldest heir-portioner to the mansion-house seems to have been recognised.’ But then it must be shewn to have once at least acquired, by the nature of its use and occupation, the quality or character of a mansion-house, or messuagium; and this principle, accordingly, was pointedly recognised and saved as regarded the small possession in the case of Cowie. There ‘ the Lords found, this being the principal messuage on the ground, and there being other houses for the tenants, therefore this ought to belong to the eldest daughter and heir-portioner.’

“ In the subsequent case of Ireland v. Govan, Nov. 14, 1765, M. 5373, the chief stress was laid, by the party pleading against the præcipuum, upon the fact of the extreme poverty of the dwelling claimed as such, and which was alleged to be ‘ bare walls without a roof.’ But the answer was, that the poverty and ruinous condition was owing to the antiquity, and that it had always been the ‘ ordinary residence of the family.’ It appears (from the session papers in that case, which the Sheriff examined), that the fact of its having been the family mansion, such as it was, was fully admitted by the party pleading against the præcipuum. Accordingly ‘ The Lords found the eldest sister entitled to the principal messuage as a præcipuum without any recompense.’

“ But none of these cases are authorities in favour of the present claim; and the Sheriff has been unable to find any case in which a dwelling that has never been used or occupied, except by the agricultural tenant for his agricultural purposes upon the farm, having thereon no other dwelling for that purpose, has been recognised in law as a mansion-house or principal messuage, such as becomes the præcipuum of the eldest of co-heiresses.

“ What the Sheriff goes by, is not the length of time during which the dwelling in question has been used as a farm-house, but the fact that it cannot be shewn to have ever, at any time, acquired, by the proprietor’s use or occupation, the character of a mansion-house or messuagium at all.”

mansion-house, and that it never lost it, having been a much larger house than that at Dornock. No. 167.

The respondents contended, that having been built under a lease, and Mackenzie having only for four years been proprietor of Netherwood, it could not be held to have ever possessed the character of a mansion-house; and if it did, having been sold as the house attached to a farm, and ever since let and tenanted as such, it had lost that character. May 28, 1857.
Halbert v.
Bogie.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case lies in a narrow compass. The law is clear, as Erskine says, iii. 8, 13, because the mansion-house is indivisible, the eldest gets it as a præcipuum for her residence. But then it is, he says, the principal mansion-house of the lands. The other heirs-portioners did originally receive, however, in lieu, a recompense to secure equality. But in later times no such recompense was given, and that fact is a consideration why we should not lightly admit any house to the character of præcipuum, which practically is a farm-house. It is obvious that this principle is quite inapplicable to the case of a farm on which the tenant must reside, if there is only one residence on that farm.

I do not enter into the question, whether, if George Mackenzie had died in possession of the whole estate of Netherwood, leaving heirs-portioners, the eldest would have been entitled to the newer house of Rosehall, instead of the old mansion-house of Netherwood. That is not the point before us. The question might, as a precedent, be of importance, but on that very account, as it forms no part of the question to be decided, I do not even speculate upon it. It would be requisite to know many more facts before it would be safe to hazard even a conjecture upon that point. The question here is simply, whether, after this property or farm of Rosehall was sold fifty years ago, and held ever since as a separate possession, the house thereon became the mansion-house of the family of the purchaser, so as to form, in the event of the succession of heirs-portioners, a præcipuum for the eldest.

The matter of fact excludes any such view. This is an agricultural farm. The house in question is the only one fit for the occupation of the tenant. It has been sold and occupied for fifty years and more, and so let for that purpose by this family of Lowther. I cannot now invest it with any higher character, or attach to it the importance which the advocator desires. It may be a little larger than, or rather, I should say, of a different form from, a farm-house now to be built on the lands. But farm-house it has been, farm-house it must be, and so as a farm-house it must be treated for every purpose. This is all I have to say on the subject.

The reasons of advocacy should be repelled, with expenses, and the case remitted simpliciter to the Sheriff.

LORD MURRAY.—I concur. We have no evidence whatever that this ever was a mansion-house, or anything but a farm-house. That the word mansion-house occurs in a single case, is a circumstance to which I can attach no weight. There may have been a better garden than usual attached to the house, but it cannot be shewn to have ever been properly and peculiarly a mansion-house.

LORD WOOD.—I am of the same opinion. In arguing the case for the pursuer, the Dean's position was, that while as yet the entire estate of Netherwood, including Rosehall, belonged to one proprietor, the house of Rosehall was erected and made the mansion-house of the estate, thereby displacing the old mansion-house at Netherwood. I should be inclined to hold that the house on Rosehall was built by George Mackenzie when he was joint tenant with Mr M'Vitie of the estate of Netherwood, and prior to his purchase of the estate in 1777. Certainly, till then it was not occupied by the proprietor of Netherwood as the mansion-house. But, no doubt, from that date Mackenzie, who had become the proprietor, did reside at it. But at that time the mansion-house of Netherwood was under a current lease, and the residence of Mackenzie, as proprietor, in the house on Rosehall, could only be for the short period from 1777 till his death in 1781. I lay no stress on its being, in the lease in 1782 to his widow, called a mansion-house. Netherwood was at the same period called a mansion-house. Certainly, from 1782 downwards, the

No. 167. house on Rosehall was substantially let with the farm, and occupied as the farm-house.

May 28, 1857.
Halbert v.
Bogie.

Now, had a question arisen upon the succession opening to heirs-portioners of the proprietor of the undivided estate of Netherwood, it would have required, in my opinion, more satisfactory evidence of the substitution of the house on Rosehall for that on Netherwood as the mansion-house of the estate, to have warranted its being held that it had obtained that character. But that is a point on which it is not necessary to give any opinion, for the question here does not arise in the succession to the proprietor of Netherwood, but in the succession to the successors of the purchase of the comparatively small part of it called Rosehall, acquired at the sale of the estate when broken down into various parcels in 1803.

Rosehall was then bought by Tristram Lowther, and, as far as appears, purchased by him as a mere investment. Neither by him nor his nephew, his successor, was Rosehall and the house upon it treated as anything but a farm and farm-house. It was the only house upon the property for the accommodation of a tenant, and the offices attached to it were the only ones to be applied to the necessary uses of the farm. Accordingly, the fact is (and here it is material, although in other cases mere non-residence might not be of weight in determining whether the house retained the character of a mansion-house or not), that the proprietors never resided at it, and that, whether the house and offices were better or worse than common at the period on a farm of the same extent, they were let with the farm as a part of it, just in the ordinary way, from 1803 downwards, to the death of John Dickson Lowther in 1842; and then, on the succession opening to his two sisters, the lands and houses still continued to be similarly occupied. Thus, from the date of Rosehall passing into the family of the Lowthers, the fact is, that the house was in the agricultural occupancy of the tenants of the farm. And that being the case, I have no idea, that in the succession of heirs-portioners in this new family, in the portion of the estate of Netherwood acquired by Tristram Lowther, the house on it can be looked upon as being a proper mansion-house of the estate, to which the eldest heir-portioner is entitled as a præcipuum. I think the whole conduct of the proprietors is opposed to such a result. It shows, that from the date of the acquisition in 1803, whatever the house may previously have been, it was never treated as, or considered to be, a family mansion, but was dedicated to the agricultural uses of Rosehall as a farm, and as being nothing more than a farm-house. And while I have no idea that the Lowthers ever imagined or intended that their succession falling to heirs-portioners was to be regulated on the footing of the house being the proper mansion-house of the estate, I am clear that, in point of law, there is no ground for maintaining that it ought to be so regulated.

LORD COWAN.—The eldest heir-portioner is entitled, as præcipuum, to the principal mansion-house, and the question is, what constitutes such a house in succession? Generally, indeed, in all the cases where there have been decisions on the point, the house has been the residence of the family, either of the immediate ancestor, or one a little more remote; but that cannot be said to be an indispensable condition. It would never do to say, that, where there was a proper mansion-house on an estate, there was to be no præcipuum, because it so happened that the proprietor had never occupied it personally. Still, to found a claim for præcipuum, the house must obviously have been intended to be used as a mansion-house, and must have been treated as such,—and not as a mere farm-house,—and that by the predecessor of the heirs-portioners. When it appears, that so far from having been so dealt with, it has been acquired and treated as a mere country-house, or as an ordinary farm-house for the lands on which it stands, there are no termini labii for the claim of præcipuum.

On the question of fact as to this being a mansion-house, it is contended that it was the proper residence of the family who held the estate of Netherwood. But (1), It is by no means clear on the evidence that it ever was so, for there was a house on Netherwood, as well as the house at Rosehall, and, for twenty years at least prior to 1803, it had been let to the tenant of the lands; and, (2), even if it had been, we are not in a question between heirs-portioners succeeding to Mackenzie of Netherwood, but heirs-portioners succeeding to Lowther, who acquired a fee ment of the Netherwood estate after it was split up, since which time it has con- No. 167.

itself alter the condition of the question. Suppose the house sold without any land, as a mere villa, would the claim of præcipuum not entirely fail?—and so, if sold with a single farm, on which there was no other accommodation for agricultural purposes, I should hold the character of the building to be changed, if it ever was a mansion-house proper.

We have truly no occasion to look beyond the condition and character of this house, as it has existed since it came into the family of the Lowthers; and having been let continuously from 1803 downwards to farmers for agricultural purposes, I cannot hold the disponee of the eldest heir-portioner entitled to claim it as a præ- cipuum in a division of the estate.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Refuse the prayer of the said note, and remit simpliciter to the Sheriff: Find the advocator liable in expenses, allow an account to be lodged, and remit to the Auditor, to tax the same, and to report."

Before the Auditor a difference of opinion arose as to the import of this interlocutor, which was thus stated in a note by him.

"The respondent maintains, on the authority of the case of Sinclair, 30th May 1855, 17 D. 784, that this finding carries the whole expenses incurred by him in the inferior Court, in so far at least as these relate to the questions which have been disposed of under the advocacy; the advocator contending, on the other hand, that it merely disposes of the costs of the advocacy itself, leaving it to the Sheriff to deal with the expenses quoad ultra, under the remit to him, as the case differs from an ordinary advocacy of a final judgment, inasmuch as the decision of the Sheriff brought under review disposed of one branch only of the litigation raised under the brief of division."

THE COURT afterwards pronounced the following interlocutor, disposing of this question:—"The Lords having considered the note by the Auditor of Court on the account of expenses in this cause, and heard counsel for the parties, declare that the expenses for which the advocator was found liable by the interlocutor of the 28th day of May last are the expenses in the inferior Court, from 13th February 1855, and the expenses of the advocacy in this Court: Allow an account of these expenses to be given in, and remit to the Auditor, to tax the same, and to report; and remit all other questions of expenses sim- pliciter to the Sheriff."

 Gibb. to uplift the whole balance of the consigned money, with the exception of the L.450 allowed for the erection of fences. The petition stated that the petitioners had long since, at their own expense, erected them.

A remit was made to a man of skill, who reported,—“On examining the fences erected on the estate, along the line of the post road, I find that they have been properly and sufficiently executed; that the hedges are in a thriving state, and the walls are in good order; that the fences erected extend to 1072 roods, or thereby; that no vouchers have been produced for outlay in erecting these fences; but it has been explained to me that these fences were erected several years ago, and that the vouchers for these payments have unfortunately gone amissing and cannot be found; but I am satisfied from the inspection I have made that these fences could not have been erected at a less expense than from 7s. 6d. to 8s. 6d. a rood, and assuming the lower rate, the amount expended would be L.402, and therefore that the claim for repayment of the L.450 stated to have been expended upon them is reasonable and just.”

Mr Simon Campbell, S.S.C., to whom a remit had also been made, reported that although vouchers were not forthcoming, there had been produced solemn declarations emitted before a justice of the peace by three parties residing in the neighbourhood, in which they declare that they were well acquainted with the estate, and that the fences in question “were erected between the years 1827 and 1830, under the orders and at the expense of Sir Samuel Stirling, or his trustees, the proprietors.”

The Lord Ordinary reported favourably for the petitioners.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—“The Lords, on report of Lord Mackenzie, Ordinary, Find that the petitioner, Sir Samuel Stirling, and Donald Lindsay and George Auldjo Esson, his trustees, are entitled to receive the sum of L.450 sterling, being the balance of the consigned fund in bank, in repayment of the sums expended by them on the fences along the line of post road, with the interest due thereon, all as set forth in the minute No. 91 of process: Grant warrant,” &c.

Entail—Disentail—Heirs-portioners—Intimation.—In an application for disentail, intimation was ordered to be made to daughters, to whom the estate would go, as heirs-portioners, under the title of “heirs whomsoever,” on failure of two heirs of entail under the destination, although Held, that such heirs-portioners are not heirs of entail.

Judicial factor—Curator ad litem.—Where proceedings under the Entail Amendment Act were ordered to be intimated to minor heir-portioners who might possibly succeed to the estate, a curator ad litem was appointed to each.

May 29, 1857. THE petitioner, institute of entail in possession of the estate of Oldfield, 1st Division. L. presented this application for authority to disentail. The first substitute called to the succession after him was the petitioner’s brother, George Gibb. Mr George Gibb had an only son, a pupil, and these two were the nearest and only heirs entitled to succeed to the estate under the destination in the entail; failing them, it went to “heirs whomsoever.” Mr George Gibb had also several daughters; but the petitioner stated, that "although called to the succession on the failure of his heirs-male under the title of his heirs whomsoever, as heirs-portioners are not excluded, they are not heirs of entail in any proper sense of the expression, and do not require to be called as parties to this petition." The petition accordingly only prayed for intimation to the petitioner's brother and nephew. When the case was called,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—I presume that the petitioner is afraid to give intimation to the heirs-portioners, lest it be held that he recognises them also as heirs of entail. I do not think it can have that effect.

Intimation was accordingly made; and it appearing that the heirs-portioners were minors, the Court appointed curators to each of them.

The Lord Ordinary now reported the case, and stated, that as the daughters only came to have an interest in the entail under the last branch of the destination to "heirs whomsoever," it appeared to him that, under the decisions in Gordon v. Mosse,¹ and Primrose v. Primrose,² their consents as heirs of entail were not necessary. The other consents required by the statute had been given.

Clark, for the curators;—In the case of Gordon the succession had opened to a person whose "heirs and assignees were called, which distinguished that case from the present, in which the daughters were called under the title of "heirs whomsoever."

LORD PRESIDENT.—The case of Primrose conclusively settled that point.

COLONEL M'DOWALL presented petitions in the Sheriff-court of Renfrewshire against five farmers; in each he alleged that he was "proprietor of the 1st Division. lands of Ladymuir, &c., and, as such, a pro indiviso proprietor of the muir
 Ld. Handyside called Duchall Muir, or at least has a right of servitude of pasturage therein, L. in so far as he has a right and privilege by himself and his tenants of grazing sheep, cattle, and horses, on the said muir. That the respondent had no right of grazing on the muir, but of late had put thereon to graze, without any authority from the complainer, or any other person, sheep and cattle, to the annoyance and injury of the complainer and his tenants; and has further disturbed the sheep and cattle of the complainer's tenants." And in each case he prayed the Sheriff "to ordain the respondent to remove all cattle, sheep, or other bestial belonging to him, and presently grazing on the said muir; and, in the meantime, to interdict, prohibit, and discharge him, and all others acting for him, from grazing cattle, sheep, horses, or other bestial, in the muir, or any way disturbing the sheep and cattle of the petitioner and his tenants grazing thereon; and thereafter, upon advising this petition with or without answers, to continue the said interdict permanently," &c.

The actions were conjoined, and Mr Porterfield, the landlord of the respondents—being himself a pro indiviso proprietor of the muir—was cited.
 He lodged a minute, sisting himself as a party, "and in so far as the tenant defenders claim a right of grazing upon the muir of Duchall, consents that they shall have such right during their existing leases, conform to use and wont, or until the commonity is divided."

A proof was then allowed, and taken at great length. One of the parties complained of, George Scott, produced a holograph letter from Mr Porterfield, of the same date with his lease, by which Mr Porterfield allowed him to graze ten queys and four score sheep on the muir so long as the same should be undivided.

The import of the proof was thus stated by the Sheriff-substitute in his interlocutor, dated 7th May 1852:—"1st, That the missives on which the defenders possess their respective farms on Duchall estate give them no right to pasture on the muir. 2d, That the defender George Scott alone founds on a holograph letter of his landlord allowing him to pasture ten queys and four score sheep on the muir. 3d, That it is proved that said defender has far exceeded these limits, and he has produced no title assignee of the pasturage effeiring to the lands of Newton. 4th, That it proved that upon the whole the Muir of Duchall is overstocked, but to what extent does not appear to be distinctly ascertained. In the circumstances finds that the defenders Robert Scott, John Laird, James Laird, and William Laird, have instructed no title on which to found a possessory judicial sentence, and against them grants interdict as craved; and against George Scott, so far as exceeding the limits above-mentioned: Further finds the pursuer entitled to expenses," &c.

The respondents advocated; and, on 22d May 1855, the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor, in which, though he advocated the cause, substantially adhered. The findings by the Lord Ordinary, so far as they differed materially from those afterwards pronounced in the Inner-House, were as follows:—" . . . Finds that the Sheriff sustained the respondent's title to insist in the process as in the right of certain lands and also the right of Mr Porterfield to appear in support of his tenants' ten-possessions in the muir in question, and further allowed a proof to the respondent in support of his condescendence, and also a proof of how many sheep and cattle in all the Muir of Duchall is capable of pasturing, and the extent to which that servitude had been enjoyed by the tenants of the respondent's lands, and allowed the advocates a proof of the extent to which they had been accustomed in time past as tenants of Porterfield to use the muir in the pasture of sheep and cattle: Finds that the advocates acquiesced in that interlocutor which sustained the title of the respondent. . . . Finds, on a consideration of the proof led, that the respondent's accustomed use and enjoyment through the tenants of his lands of the servitude of pasturage over the muir has been interfered with and limited by the acts of the advocates in driving to and pasturing upon the muir cattle, sheep, and other bestial, whereby the muir has been overstocked, and the servitude of pasturage of the respondent rendered less valuable: Finds that the advocator George Scott has pastured sheep and cattle on the muir exceeding the limits allowed to him by Mr Porterfield in said holograph letter granted in reference to his lease: Finds that the other advocates have severally driven their sheep, cattle, or other bestial to the muir, and pastured them thereon to the disturbance of the stock of the respondent's tenants, and to the diminution of the use and enjoyment of the right of pasturage effecting to the respondent's lands: And on these facts, Finds, as matter of law, that the advocates, other than George Scott, being excluded by their leases from any right or privilege of pasturage on the Muir of Duchall, had no title to plead a possessory right to continue to pasture in the muir, in respect of their having de facto pastured sheep and cattle thereon according to alleged use and wont, and that such pasturage by them was usurped, and without any legal title: Finds that the averments and pleas of these advocates on the record as closed, affords no sufficient legal grounds to support their possession, and to resist the interdict sought to be obtained against them: Finds at the minute of compearance by Mr Porterfield, having regard to its merits, and that Mr Porterfield took no farther steps in the process, and is not a complainer in this Court by having presented any note of advocacy, does not raise up or constitute a title in these advocates, as in a question between the respondent under the process brought, and in which the record was previously closed, to resist the interdict applied for: Finds, as regards the advocator George Scott, that he is not entitled to pasture on the Muir of Duchall, in respect of the lands of which he is tenant, more than ten queys and four score sheep, as limited by the holograph letter produced and founded by him, but that to that extent he is entitled to possessory rights: Therefore repels the additional pleas in law for the advocates; of new grants interdict as craved against the advocates, Robert Scott, John Laird, James Laird, and William Laird, and against George Scott, against pasturing the Muir of Duchall more than ten queys and four score sheep, and expenses; of new finds the respondent entitled to expenses of process in the inferior court: Finds him also entitled to the expenses incurred by him in Court," &c.*

"NOTE.—Though the proceedings in this case are voluminous, and an extensive proof was led by the parties, the matters for determination have appeared to the Lord Ordinary, after full consideration, to be brought, as he views the case, within narrow limits. The preceding interlocutor embraces so much explanatory of the nature and progress of the cause, as to dispense, it is thought, with any further reasoned note. The really important questions for decision are: What is the character of Mr Porterfield's compearance, and what effect, if any, shall be attributed to it? The respondent resisted Mr Porterfield and Sir Michael Stewart, who were cited for their respective interests, but unsuccessfully. The act was that of the Sheriff ex proprio motu after the record was closed. The advocates had not asked that Mr Porterfield made a party, nor had they objected that he was not called. They went to judgment contesting the respondent's title to bring the case, as well as his conclusions, against them, and though their leases had been previously made productions in process, they pleaded notwithstanding a right to graze on the muir under a use and wont exercise of it as tenants of Mr Porterfield. The respondent accordingly pressed very strongly that if the advocates had no title when they were brought into Court, and went to issue under a closed record and productions which established that their landlord had withheld it, it became incompetent in a question of interdict to procure a new title and plead upon that which was previously non-existent. The respondent contended that the advocates in relying now on the minute of Mr Porterfield, as giving them a title, admitted that they had previously none under the closed record, and he maintained in point of law that a title made up pendente processu, and in contradiction to the true position of the party under his previous right, ought to be disregarded in a possessory question. Reference was made to the case of Ross v. Fisher, February 28, 1833. The Lord Ordinary thinks that the objection so taken by the respondent is one not merely of a formal kind applicable to the stage which the process had reached, but has also substantial grounds to support it. The process being one of interdict, raises the possessory question alone. The advocates resisted interdict on alleged possession entitling them to a possessory judgment. But to plead on possession in a matter of heritable right, a title is required which must not only be shown, but connected with the possession as the warrant upon which it has been enjoyed. Possession without any title whatever is mere usurpation. The respondent might well therefore contest the right of the advocates, who had not even averred on record that Mr Porterfield had withdrawn the prohibition in their leases, and given them by verbal grant any privilege of pasturage, to plead upon the waiver in his minute of compearance as becoming a title to support their possession. At the same time where interdict is sought against tenants, the interests of the landlord may be seriously affected in certain cases which may seem to involve the extent of his rights, so as to make it quite proper, even at a late stage of the process, that he should be cited for his interest. Such considerations probably suggested the order to cite the proprietors of the muir in this case. And this raises the question of how the minute of compearance by Mr Porterfield should be viewed as bearing on the claim of the respondent to obtain the interdict he prayed for. Now, it will be observed, that the terms of the minute of compearance are most qualified. He merely consents, in so far as the defenders claim a right of grazing, that they shall have it during their existing leases, conform to use and wont, or until the commonty is divided. He does not appear to protect them in their claim, and as their landlord to insist with them on their right. He makes himself no party to their allegations and pleas by adopting the record. He puts in no separate pleading for himself stating an interest and maintaining pleas to resist the respondent's petition for interdict. He does not say that he has discharged the prohibition in his tenant leases and granted them an express right of pasturage, although only till the commonty is divided. All that he does appears to amount to this, that he opposes an obstacle to the advocates maintaining their claim in the process, but will not commit himself by any act of his to incur responsibility, whether as a party to the process or otherwise, either as regards his own tenants or the respondent. Now the Lord Ordinary thinks that this intervention of Mr Porterfield has not supplied the previous defect in the advocate's case. That gentleman by taking up the case as identifying his tenants with himself, might possibly have raised questions with the respondent which could not be solved in this process. But Mr Porterfield has adopted a different course, no doubt for sufficient reasons. He is the proprietor of the muir, but that is the servient tenement over which the respondent has a servitude of pasturage. The right of servitude belonging to the dominant tenement must be respected by the owner of the servient. The servitude is not to be so stretched, says Mr Erskine, as to exclude the owner of the servient tenement from pasturing his own cattle, if there be grass enough for both. The complaint of the respondent is, that the tenants of Mr Porterfield are interfering with the rightful exercise of the pasturage belonging to the dominant tenement. He complains against them and not against the owner of the servient tenement, because Mr Porterfield had given no right to pasture on the muir; on the contrary, he entail, had died since the date of the interlocutor reclaimed against. He therefore now tendered a minute of compearance for Colonel Gordon and others, Mr Porterfield's trustees, and moved to have them sisted. No. 171.

 Scott v.
 M'Dowall.

LORD DEAS.—Your proposition is, that the trustees are entitled to come here without reclaiming. I do not think that is competent.

LORD IVORY.—Mr Porterfield appeared, in his character of landlord, in order to strengthen the hands of his tenants. But he is now dead: and, if any one is now entitled to come forward as his representative, it must be the heir of entail.

The Court, on 20th May 1857, refused “to sustain the compearance of the said trustees.”

The case was then argued on the merits.

The following findings in fact, contained in the interlocutor ultimately pronounced, embrace the whole circumstances of the case:—“Find, in point of fact,—1st, That the Muir of Duchall is a commonity of which the late James Corbett Porterfield, of Duchall, and Sir Michael Robert Shaw Stewart were the pro indiviso proprietors, subject to certain rights of servitude, and that the respondent, Colonel M'Dowall, was not a proprietor thereof, but had right, as owner of certain other lands, to a servitude of pasturage on the said muir; 2d, That the tenants of the estate of Duchall, which belonged to the said James Corbett Porterfield, and of which his pro indiviso share of the said muir formed a part, were in use to pasture on the said muir the sheep and cattle of the portions of the said estate held by them on lease from the said James Corbett Porterfield and his predecessors; 3d, That five farms of the estate of Duchall (named Barnshake, Montreal or Gighburnbrae, Greenside, Midgibblestone, and South Gibblestone) were let to the proprietor of the said estate to the advocates by leases, in which it was stipulated that these tenants should have right to cut peats on the said muir, without any other privilege thereon; but the proprietor did not enforce this restriction, and, with his consent, the advocates, for a number of years prior to the year 1847, enjoyed the privilege of pasturing on the said muir sheep and cattle of their farms, and they were in the full enjoyment of this privilege when, in that year, the summary actions now under advocacy were instituted against them by the respondent, Colonel M'Dowall; 4th, That in these actions, which were conjoined, the said respondent prayed that the advocates should be ordained to remove all their cattle, sheep, and other bestial from the said muir, and that they should be interdicted perpetually from pasturing their said stock thereon; and, in support of these demands, the said respondent alleged that he was a pro indiviso proprietor of the muir, or, at least, had a servitude of pasturage thereon, and that the advocates had put a great quantity of sheep and cattle thereon, to the annoyance and injury of him and his tenants; 5th, That the Sheriff having appointed the said James Corbett Porterfield to be called as a party to the said actions, he appeared therein, and lodged a minute, stating that, in so far as the tenant defenders claimed a right of grazing on the said muir, he consented that they should have such right during their existing leases, concluded it. Had he given such a right, and the tenants had rested their title on grant from him, the respondent Colonel M'Dowall must have contested the matter with the owner of the servient tenement as well as his tenants. But as the matter stood when the petition for interdict was presented, and as it now stands, owing to the Lord Ordinary's apprehension, notwithstanding Mr Porterfield's consent, it is conceived the respondent has got the proper parties with whom he has to deal, and that against them he is entitled to prevail.

The proof, as already noticed, was allowed before answer. It is unnecessary for the Lord Ordinary to enter into any examination of it. The greater part of it is course superseded if the view the Lord Ordinary has taken on the points just stated is correct. So far as the findings in the interlocutors rest upon consideration of the proof, he has merely to say that he thinks it supports them.”

form to use and wont, or until the commony should be divided; 6th, That when the said respondent instituted these actions the extent of the foresaid servitude of pasturage on the said muir, to which he had right, had never been ascertained, and remained indefinite and uncertain; that, although an action of division of the said commony had long been and still was in dependence, and the said respondent's authors had entered appearance therein, no decree of division had then been or has yet been pronounced therein; and, also, that under the proof which was taken in the said conjoined actions the respondent has failed to prove the extent of his said servitude of pasturage, and the same still remains indefinite and uncertain, and no facts have been proved which afford data for ascertaining the extent of the said servitude; and, 7th, That the said respondent has failed to prove that his said right of servitude has been infringed or encroached upon by the advocates, or any of them."

The advocates pleaded;—That, the respondent's servitude being a limited right of pasturage, he had mistaken his remedy in applying for absolute interdict against the tenants of a proprietor who had right to pasture on the muir, and with whose consent his tenants had been in use to do so; a practice acquiesced in by the respondent up to the date of his complaint. Its prayer was absolute for interdict against the advocates as intruders on the muir, but the respondent had himself not averred the extent of his possession, nor stated any limits to his right. He was not entitled to exclude Mr Porterfield's cattle until he could shew that the number of cattle he was himself entitled to pasture were sufficient to eat up all the pasture. This he had failed to do. Therefore, due regard being had to Mr Porterfield's compearance, the Sheriff ought not to have interdicted the advocates as not having authority to graze. Farther, the advocates were not bound to instruct a title in order to found a possessory judgment, the application for interdict being simply founded on the assumption of the non-existence of authority.

LORD PRESIDENT.—To my mind this has been a very unsatisfactory case, both in regard to the statement, and more especially in regard to the proceedings in which it originated. The complaint is made by Colonel M'Dowall, who asserts, apparently with reason, that he has a servitude of pasturage over this muir of Duchall. In the Inferior Court, he puts his statements alternatively, that he has either a right of property or a right of servitude: he does not appear to be clear which, nor does he say to what extent he claims right of pasturage. He complains that the advocates, having no right to graze on the muir, nevertheless do so to a great extent, that the muir is thereby over-stocked, and that his cattle and sheep are in consequence made to suffer. The view which is taken by the Sheriff, and also by the Lord Ordinary, is that these parties who are complained of have not only no title to graze animals on the muir, but that their grazing is in the face of their title as tenants of an admitted proprietor of the muir—that they are in effect usurpers, and so that the complainer is entitled to absolute interdict against them. Both parties refer to a process, the precise position of which is not clear, but which was instituted for ascertaining the rights of parties about fifty years ago, and is still in dependence.

The advocates contend that they have been in use to graze, and that they were entitled to a possessory judgment in their favour, of right to graze, according to use and wont. That view has been rejected, on the ground that the mere act of possession without a title is not enough; that the respondents had shewn no title, and therefore were not in a position to demand such a judgment, and, therefore that they ought to be interdicted altogether from grazing any bestial on this muir.

Now the view taken by the Sheriff is not satisfactory to me. The condition of things for a period farther back than the possessory period of seven years, seems to have been that of every party grazing as many cattle upon the muir as he could put upon it. All of these parties complained of had cattle to a large extent upon it, and the pursuer of this action had cattle there also. But I do not see anything to satisfy me in the first place as to what was the precise extent of the right of Colonel M'Dowall himself. We have no elements for deciding that. Then, again, it appears that one of Mr Porterfield's tenants had permission from him to graze to a certain extent—not by his lease, but by a separate writing, and his right has been sustained to the extent so given. The other tenants complained of have no title by lease or otherwise.

 M'Dowall.

I am not prepared to hold that, in this process of interdict, the tenants of one of the proprietors of the muir are to be precluded from grazing, because they have not a written title from their landlord so to do. That is a proposition which I am not prepared to support. I think that verbal permission from the landlord to graze—supposing the landlord has himself the right—would be sufficient if instructed,—that possession, following upon such permission, would entitle the tenant to a possessory judgment, and a process of interdict would not be the proper mode of determining the rights of parties in such a state of matters. Now I see in the proof before us evidence of the landlord having given such a verbal consent, so far back as twelve years before the date of this process. Then, again, there is here a compearance by the landlord, who consents to the tenants having such right during their existing leases, conform to use and wont, or until the commonity is divided.

I consider that to be, from the date of that document, in one construction, a consent to grazing on the muir. If it be so, I do not understand how it can be maintained that interdict against grazing hereafter is to be granted—which is what the Sheriff has done. This is a process of interdict. It is a prospective interdict which is craved, for interpellating parties from doing in future what it is alleged they have no permission from their landlord to do. Before that interdict was laid on, the landlord gave his permission.

It might be, if there had been nothing else in the case at that stage of it, that the pursuer might still have insisted for expenses. But the Sheriff would not have been warranted in granting interdict. Suppose the landlord had given all of his tenants a written consent as at that date, could the Sheriff then have granted interdict against their future grazing? I think not. These documents would have given them right as from that date. But I farther think that the tenants had a parole permission before that date: and that was quite enough from their own landlord. It may be that, under that permission, they were not entitled to graze to excess. That I can perfectly understand. But the interdict is not against the tenants grazing to excess. It is against their grazing at all. It is not at all clear that the complainer was entitled to that at any stage of the proceedings.

Parties have gone wrong here altogether. It is the overstocking of the muir that is the real grievance, and the attempt is made to correct that grievance by this arbitrary proceeding, on the ground that the tenants are mere intruders. The proof removes from them that character, and therefore I think the remedy of interdict is not applicable. The landlord who gave the consent was an heir of entail. He is dead, and the next heir of entail may not be bound to recognise what he did. The next heir is not here, and has not renewed the consent, and there is no evidence that he does consent; and it is argued, if that consent was good during the lifetime of the heir who granted it, it is good no longer, and now that it is off, the respondent is entitled to interdict. I do not think that argument is sound.

That is a change of matters, which the parties complained of would be allowed to remedy. They would be allowed an opportunity of shewing whether they had the consent of the present landlord or not. But it is not worth while raising a question of that sort, seeing that the trustees came forward to say that they wanted to give such consent, but they were not allowed to do so. The judgment pronounced was a wrong judgment. It ought to be recalled, and the application for interdict dismissed. As to the matter of expenses, this is not the remedy the complainer ought to have had recourse to, and, therefore, I think the advocates are entitled to their expenses.

LORD CURRIE.—The position of the respondent, Colonel M'Dowall, is that of being not the sole nor even a pro indiviso proprietor of the Muir of Duchall, but merely the owner of certain other lands having a servitude of pasturage over this muir. The muir belonged in property, when these proceedings commenced, to Mr

No. 171. Corbett Porterfield of Duchall, and Sir M. S. Stewart, and the respondent's right is merely that of an incumbrancer, as is found by the interlocutor under review, which, as to that matter, is now final. The extent of this right of servitude has never been fixed or ascertained, and was quite indefinite and uncertain when these proceedings commenced, as the title which the respondent produced and founded upon is silent as to that matter; and the proper procedure which the law of Scotland provides for ascertaining the extent of such indefinite rights of servitude in commonities had never been made available. This might have been done either by an action of souming and rouming, or by an action of division under the statute 1695, c. 38. But the former of these remedies had not been resorted to; and although a statutory process of division had long been in dependence, and the respondent's authors had been made parties thereto, it had not been brought to a conclusion. Nor has the extent of this right of servitude been fixed or ascertained by the proof in the five conjoined summary actions which the respondent instituted in the Sheriff-court, and which are now under advocacy. It appears from that proof not only that the extent to which that servitude has been exercised was very fluctuating; but that even that fluctuating possession, instead of having been limited to the stock of the alleged dominant tenement, included the stock of other farms, and even stock taken in by the tenants to pasture for hire, so that still the extent of the servitude remains quite indefinite and uncertain.

May 29, 1857.
Scott v.
M'Dowall.

On the other hand, the position of the advocates was this: They were tenants on the estate of Duchall, which belonged to Mr Porterfield, and of which his pro indiviso right in this common muir was a pertinent, and consequently a right of pasturing the stock of these farms on this muir would have belonged to them ipso jure as a pertinent of their farms, if it had not been expressly withheld from them by their landlord. And although the leases which he granted to them contained a declaration that they should have no other privilege in the muir besides that of casting peats, yet the party in whose favour that restriction on their right was thus stipulated by the landlord, was not the respondent Colonel M'Dowall, nor any third party, but only their landlord himself; and it was entirely optional to him to enforce that restriction or not, as he might think proper. And he did not enforce it. Instead of sending his own bestial to pasture on the share of the common which belonged to himself—and the use of which, beyond the right of casting peats, he reserved to himself—he allowed his tenants possessing his lands under these leases to enjoy the benefit of that pasture. No doubt he could at any time have insisted on their removal; but so long as he acquiesced in the continuance of that possession, it was lawful possession, and no third party could deprive them of it.

But the respondent Colonel M'Dowall, by the five actions under advocacy, is insisting upon excluding them entirely and permanently from continuing that possession. What he prays for is, that they should be ordained to remove all their cattle, sheep, or other bestial grazing on the muir, and that they should be interdicted permanently from grazing bestial thereon. The landlord did not concur in these applications. On the contrary, when he was called as a party under an order by the Sheriff to that effect, he appeared, and expressly consented that the tenants should have such a right of grazing as they claimed upon the muir during their existing leases, conform to use and wont, or until the commonity is divided. These are the circumstances in which the respondent persists in his summary actions of removal and for interdict. I am of opinion that he is not entitled to succeed in these applications.

As he is not an owner of the muir, and has merely a right of servitude entitling him to pasture thereon the stock of the dominant tenement belonging to him, he may have a title to adopt the appropriate remedy against any acts by which the proper exercise of that privilege may be detrimentally affected, if he can shew that such has been the case. He might even be entitled to exclude the proprietor himself, or those acting under his authority, from participating in the pasturage of the common, if he could shew that the whole of that pasturage was necessary for the use of the stock of the dominant tenement, and to give due effect to the right of servitude. But he has not proved any such thing—the evidence shewing that the stock pastured by his tenants have always used but a small proportion of the pasturage of the common. He has not even made any allegation to this effect. And this being the case, he, as a mere servitude man, has no title or right to insist upon removing entirely and permanently from the common the stock of the owner's tenants, whose bestial are, with their landlord's permission, pasturing thereon. No. 171.

The proof and pleadings in this case appear to have been intended to shew that the stock which the advocates had been pasturing upon the common, even supposing their right to pasture was unchallengeable, had been excessive. But, in the first place, even supposing the proof had established this to be the case, such evidence would not have supported the conclusions of the present actions for a total and permanent exclusion from the common of the stocks of the advocates; and as these actions contain no conclusions for regulating the possession of the muir among the different parties interested, as if there were an action of souming and rouming, no such proceeding is competent in this case. And, in the next place, as the respondent is not entitled to complain of what is done by any of the other parties interested, unless he can shew that his own servitude of pasturage is thereby detrimentally affected; and as he has failed to prove this, inasmuch as his proof leaves the extent of his servitude altogether indefinite and uncertain, as has already been stated, he could not have obtained even a partial interdict in the present case, even if the actions had been adapted for obtaining such a remedy.

May 29, 1857.
Scott v.
M'Dowall.

LORD DEAS.—I concur in the result arrived at by the Sheriff-substitute, the Sheriff, and the Lord Ordinary.

The respondent Colonel M'Dowall, as proprietor of the lands of Ladymuir, Bridgeflat, and Netherton, has a right of servitude of pasturage over the Muir of Duchall, the pro indiviso property of Mr Corbet Porterfield and Sir Michael Shaw Stewart. The respondent's right of servitude was expressly admitted at the bar, and is sufficiently proved by the titles, taken in connection with the proof, although the precise extent of his right of pasturage is not defined, and may, very possibly, have reference to the valued rent of the lands, or the quantity of bestial the dominant subjects can maintain in winter. The complaint of Colonel M'Dowall is, that the advocates, Robert Scott, John Laird, James Laird, and William Laird, who are tenants of certain other subjects belonging to Mr Porterfield, are pasturing large numbers of bestial on the muir, not only without authority, but in the face of an express prohibition in their leases, and that the other advocator, George Scott, is pasturing on the muir a much larger number of bestial than he is authorised to do by his lease, which restricts him to ten queys and four score of sheep; by all which, it is further said, the respondent Colonel M'Dowall's stock are disturbed, and his means of pasturage injured and limited. Against these intruders, therefore, he asks interdict, which has been granted in the Sheriff Court, and by the Lord Ordinary, against George Scott, quoad the excess over ten queys and four score of sheep, and against the other advocates in toto.

Now, I lay aside, in the first instance, the minute of consent by Mr Corbett Porterfield; and, doing so, I take it to be clear that, as against those of the advocates who not only have no title but are possessing in the face of their title, the respondent is entitled to interdict. He is lawfully in possession of the pasturage of the muir; and these parties are in no better, if indeed they be not in a worse, position than intruders from a distance who hold no lease from the servient proprietor at all. The very facts that the extent of the respondent's right is not defined,—that it requires ascertainment, which must involve delay, investigation, litigation, and expense, before it can be known whether the whole or what part of the pasturage is required by and belongs to the dominant tenement; and that, in order to maintain their own possession, the advocates find it necessary to impugn, and do impugn, the respondent's rights, and the extent of his occupancy, are conclusive, to my mind, against the supposition that, in order to obtain interdict, the respondent must try these questions with these intruders, against whom a judgment would avail him nothing, either against new sets of intruders coming forward ad infinitum, or against the servient proprietor Mr Porterfield.

This leaves only the consideration,—as in a question with these four advocates, —whether, and to what extent, their position is made better by the minute of compliance lodged, after the record had been closed, for Mr Corbett Porterfield, by which he sisted himself as a party for his interest, “and, in so far as the tenant defenders claim a right of grazing upon the Muir of Duchall, consents that they shall have such right during their existing leases, conform to use and wont, or until the community is divided.”

 Scott v.
 M'Dowall.

Now, I cannot look upon this minute as bettering the position of the advocates at all. I think the question must be decided upon the state of matters as they stood at the date of the application for interdict, and that the minute can be of no avail, except in so far as it may be said to prove some averment in the closed record. But it proves no averment whatever in the record. The record does not aver, and the minute does not bear (whatever the proof may do), that Mr Porterfield had ever at any time authorised these four advocates to pasture. The record merely avers that he acquiesced in their pasturing, but the minute does not affirm even this averment—far less does it adopt what these advocates have done, and the views they now contend for, so as to enable the questions at issue to be tried as between Colonel M'Dowall and Mr Porterfield. It merely consents, de futuro, that the advocates shall have the right which they claim,—a consent which, whether it may or may not avail them in some future proceeding, notwithstanding the death of the heir of entail who granted it, cannot affect the result of this case, in which the interdict, like all other interdicts which proceed on want of title, will not prejudice the advocates in any action raised, either by them or against them, after they are in a position to produce a title. No doubt, if the title conferred by the minute were clear and conclusive, we might take another course, and, in respect of the title now produced, recall the interdict,—dealing with the matter of expenses as in a case of innovation of title pendente processu. But the title is not clear and conclusive;—for, even if it enabled the respondent to try the question with proper parties, which I think it does not, it would require a new record to be made up, embracing the extent of the relative rights of Mr Porterfield and the respondent, and a new proof to ascertain these rights,—in place of which, I think, the proper course is to dispose of the present case upon the record as it stands, and leave the parties to found upon any new title, and to vindicate their rights under that title otherwise as they best may. Mr Porterfield's representatives may be made parties to any new proceedings, if thought necessary, but they are no parties here,—your Lordships having refused to allow them to be sisted, as Mr Porterfield himself, who has since died, had not reclaimed against the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and his representatives are now, therefore, out of the field. The next heir of entail who has succeeded to the estates has never been in the field at all, and does not propose to come into it. If the question is proposed to be tried with these four advocates, in their own right, apart from Mr Porterfield's minute, the answer is, that they have no right at all, and stand debarred from claiming any right. If, again, the question is proposed to be tried with them, as in right of Mr Porterfield under the minute, the answer is, that he neither authorises this, by adopting what they have done, nor have they a record calculated to try such a question as the minute (if its terms had been different) might have authorised to be tried.

I have taken the case, hitherto, as in a question with the four advocates, exclusive of George Scott. But I have now to add that I do not think there is, in his case, any sufficient specialty to make a difference quoad him, in the result. He does not allege, so far as I have seen or heard, that Colonel M'Dowall has done anything which prevents him having sufficient pasturage for his ten queys and four score sheep. He cannot, and does not complain that he is allowed to continue pasturing these ten queys and four score sheep. And as regards the excess, his lease seems to me to place him in the same position with the other advocates,—the restriction, to the effect that he was to have no right of pasturage on the muir, being removed only to the extent mentioned in the relative letter.

If it were necessary to authorise interdict, either against him or the other advocates, that there should be prima facie proof that their pasturage on the muir disturbs and interferes with the respondent's right of pasturage, I think we have such prima facie proof here. It has not been shewn, or even attempted to be shewn, that Colonel M'Dowall has been pasturing more bestial than the dominant tenement will maintain in winter, or than the state of possession betwixt him and the proprietor of the dominant tenement will sanction, and I cannot presume that such has been the character of his possession upon a lawful title, in a question with parties who have no title whatever. The presumption, I think, is quite the other way,—that, if there be overstocking, it is occasioned by the intruders, and not by the lawful possessor. But, even if this matter be debateable, we have no parties here with whom the respondent can be called upon to debate and try the question. No. 171.

Domicile—Legacy duty.—A Scotchman born of Scotch parents domiciled in Scotland, went to Trinidad in 1802, and remained there without interruption till 1838. He acquired estates, had establishments, carried on business, and ultimately died there. Between the years 1838 and 1850, he made very frequent visits to Scotland. He rented premises in Glasgow, where he carried on business through an agent, and he purchased an estate in Argyleshire, on which he built a mansion-house. This investment he spoke of as made to give employment to a nephew whom he made his heir. He had expressed an intention of "dying in harness," and none of returning permanently to Scotland, and died at Trinidad in 1850;—Held (aff. judgment of Lord Ardmillan) that he had acquired a domicile in Trinidad, and had never reacquired a Scotch one, therefore that his domicile as regarded all questions of legacy duty was in Trinidad.

THE Crown brought this action against the accepting trustees and executors of the late Mr Lamont, who died at Trinidad in 1850, for payment of legacy duty to the amount of about L.9000 upon Mr Lamont's estate. The defence, admitted to be good if well-founded in fact, was that Mr Lamont's domicile was in the Island of Trinidad at the time of his decease.

The facts of Lamont's life bearing upon this question, as to which there was no difference of opinion on the bench, will be found fully stated in the opinion of the Lord President on advising a reclaiming note presented for the Lord Advocate against the following interlocutor, pronounced by the Lord Ordinary :—" Having heard the counsel for the parties and made avizandum, and considered the debate, with the closed record and productions, and the joint minute for the parties renouncing further probation on the question of domicile: Finds that the deceased John Lamont was, at the date of his death, domiciled in Trinidad, and not domiciled in Scotland, within the meaning of the statutes libelled on: Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses, allows an account thereof to be given in, and, when lodged, remits the same to the Auditor to tax and report."*

No. 172. The following statutes were founded on by the Crown:—55 Geo. III. cap. 184; 8 & 9 Vict. cap. 76, sect. 4; 36 Geo. III. cap. 52, sect. 6; 45 Geo. III. cap. 28, sect. 5.

vember 1850, in his 69th year, and unmarried. His death took place in his own house, on one of his own estates, in that island. He left personal property in Scotland to a large amount, besides the landed property of Benmore, in Argyleshire, and several estates in Trinidad.

“ The present action has been brought by the Lord Advocate, on the part of the Crown, for recovery of legacy or residue duty from the executors of Mr Lamont, on the footing of his having been, at the date of his death, a domiciled Scotsman; and the point for present decision is, whether his domicile at that date was in Scotland or in Trinidad. Without too curiously considering the question of onus probandi, which may shift more than once in the course of such an enquiry, the first and leading fact is, that Mr Lamont died in Trinidad, in his own residence, and this fact, according to the dictum of Lord Thurlow, ‘affords prima facie evidence of his domicile at that place, and it lies on those who say otherwise to rebut that evidence.’ The origin, previous history, and ascertained feelings and intentions of the deceased, are explained in an adjusted record, and are referred to on both sides as affording the materials on which the question must be disposed of. Parties have renounced farther probation, and the facts must be taken as appearing on this record.

“ Mr Lamont was born, in 1782, in Scotland, and although in his case, as an illegitimate son, the domicile of origin was not marked by those family ties and associations which tend to give it so much weight and importance in the case of legitimate children, still his original domicil was Scottish. He did not, however, retain his Scottish domicile. He left Scotland in 1801 or 1802, and for twenty-six years he voluntarily remained in Trinidad, without once returning to this country,—he purchased several estates in Trinidad,—he had more than one residence there,—he had a comfortable establishment; he was actively engaged in the cultivation of his estates; and he held an important public office in the island, said to be similar to that of a Lord-Lieutenant of a Scottish county. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that, in 1828, when he for the first time visited his friends in this country, he was no longer possessed of his original Scottish domicile, but was domiciled in Trinidad. There is no authority to support the proposition that his original Scottish domicile was retained by him during his long absence from Scotland, and residence in Trinidad, under such circumstances. The fact of a person leaving Scotland in youth, and residing many years in India, engaged in commercial business, though intending some day to return home, but dying in India, is put by the Lord Chancellor, in the case of Bruce, as working a change of domicile; and his Lordship treats it as clear that the domicile of such a person would be Indian. The same species facti is put in the opinion of all the Judges in the case of Munro—not only of the majority, but of Lord Moncreiff and the other Judges in the minority, and with whom the House of Lords concurred, and is referred to as illustrating a change from the original domicil, notwithstanding a hope or intention of one day returning to Scotland. The Lord Justice-Clerk (Boyle) and the majority of this Court, say, ‘Men settling themselves of their own accord, or in the Company’s service in India, are held, beyond all doubt, to lose their native, and to acquire an Indian, domicile, and the cases are innumerable in which their intestate succession has been distributed upon this assumption accordingly. Yet there probably is not one of those persons, especially of Scottish origin, who has not meditated an ultimate return to his native land, and, in the great majority of instances, made great preparations and outlays with a view to it. All this, however, only indicates a purpose to change their actual Indian for a future Scottish domicile, and till this purpose is consummated by their actual return to Scotland, omnis resanendi, it is quite settled that their only domicile is in India, and that it is by the law of that country that their rights and condition must be exclusively regulated.’ Lord Moncreiff, and the Judges in the minority, say, ‘The case of persons entering into the service of the East India Company, or any similar employment, is essentially different, and let it not be thought that we have lost sight of the settled rule in such a case, though the person who engages in such a course of life may have in his mind a constant contemplation of returning at some distant and undefined period to his native country, by adopting such a trade or profession which indispensably requires a continued residence in another, and actually pursuing it for a length of time, he forms and evinces that animus remanendi which is of the essence of a constituted domicile; just as effectually as a man who settles as a merchant in London or Hamburgh does, though he may have a lingering anticipation that at some time or other, when fortune has crowned his labour, he may spend the evening of his days on his native soil.' The same illustration is put by Lord Fullerton in the case of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Gordon's Executors, 4th February 1850, who states that he 'never understood it to be doubted.' Accordingly the Lord Ordinary holds it to be quite clear that Mr Lamont had, in 1828, abandoned his original domicile, and acquired a domicile in Trinidad. As he died in Trinidad in 1850, that was his domicile, unless he had changed it in the interval between 1828 and the date of his death.

"But the second question, viz.—Did he regain his Scottish domicile after 1828? is attended with more difficulty. The original domicile is easily revived. Recurrence to the original domicile may be established more easily than the adoption of a new domicile of choice—(per Lord Stowell, in the case of the Harmony, 2 Rob. Adm. Rep. 322). With the view, therefore, of ascertaining whether such recurrence can be fairly gathered from the circumstances and the correspondence in this case, the Lord Ordinary has given to these his anxious attention. The result is, that he has arrived at the conclusion, that recurrence to the original domicile has not been established, and that Mr Lamont died domiciled in Trinidad.

"If, as must be assumed in disposing of this second question, the original domicile of Mr Lamont had been lost, and his domicile in 1828 was in Trinidad, then the abandonment of that acquired domicile in Trinidad, and the recurrence to his original Scottish domicile after 1828, must be proved by the pursuer. He must instruct the change in order to establish this alleged change of domicile: (for it is a change, though being a recurrence, it is a change more easily instructed) the pursuer must prove that Mr Lamont did, facto et animo, abandon his domicile in Trinidad, and recur to his domicile in Scotland.

"On the one hand, it is true that his constant and large remittances, his accumulating funds in Scotland, his mercantile business in Glasgow, his purchase of the estate of Benmore, and the building of a new house there, and the terms of the settlements made and left by him in Scotland, are all important facts favourable to the Scottish domicile; but then, on the other hand, it is to be observed, that there was no dissolution of the ties which had for so many years bound him to Trinidad—the Trinidad business was not wound up, not even contracted, nor was his personal management of it relaxed—the Trinidad establishments were not diminished—the Trinidad residences were not dispenished—the public office in Trinidad was held by him to the last day of his life, and at no period of his history, not even on any one occasion, does Mr Lamont appear to have written or spoken of dissolving his connection with Trinidad, or of returning to Scotland permanently, or otherwise than on a visit. Where an original domicile has once been lost, a man's floating purpose of returning, at some indefinite period, to lay his bones in his native land, is of very little weight as affecting the question of recurrence to that original domicile. It is not an intention to go there to die, but an intention to live there, and to live permanently there, that is required for the establishment of a domicile. So long as Mr Lamont lived, he never actually abandoned, and never even expressed his intention to abandon, his home and residence and social position in Trinidad—he never quitted that island, except on the footing of paying a visit and of returning. How can it, therefore, be said that, facto et animo, he changed his domicile and regained his original domicile in Scotland?

"In a letter to his brother, Alexander, dated 'Trinidad, 28th June 1841,' he says, 'I think of making a short visit home and returning early, to endeavour to stem the downward tendency of things here. I find my long absence very prejudicial, and that I am looked on as an absentee by all parties, from the Governor to the humblest labourer who works for us. This won't do, and I must act again as an every-day practical planter.' Again, on 4th July 1843, he writes to Alexander—'If I can make satisfactory arrangements, I may venture across for a short time, but only for a very short time, as affairs here require vigilant attention.' On 19th June 1844, he writes—'I am likely to be with you by the next packet;' adding, 'my sojourn is likely to be shorter than usual.' On 4th November 1845, he writes—'The commander will, I trust, take her' (a little steamer) 'off my hands soon, and let me have my money back again, and allow me to give my undivided attention to my cane farms.' On 19th June 1847, he writes—'In a month or so, I must be on the move, if I go at all, as go I suppose I ought; yet I am loath to leave, so much requires to be done here.' On 19th February 1850, he writes—'I mentioned to you that the crop here would be short this season. Even on my fine fertile soil at C. Grove, I will fall short, from careless cultivation during my absence.' It is scarcely possible to reconcile such language as this with that settled intention to abandon Trinidad and return permanently to Scotland, which the pursuer must prove; but is quite consistent with an intention of making frequent visits to Scotland, and returning to his plantations, and his residence, and his official duties or position, in Trinidad. But visits afford no indication of a purpose to change the domicile. On the contrary, it is the place which a man leaves when he goes to pay a visit, rather than the place at which he pays the visit, which has the proper character of a domicile. The recognised definition of domicile precisely applies to the residence of Mr Lamont in Trinidad, which he quitted when he set out on his journey to visit Scotland, and to which he returned when his visit to Scotland was at an end; and he had ceased to wander.

"The purchase of Benmore in 1848, completed in January 1849, and the building of a new house on that estate, are facts undoubtedly of great importance, and have been naturally and properly urged, with much earnestness, by the pursuer. But the motive and objects of Mr Lamont in this purchase must be attended to. It was not a step taken with a view to permanent settlement, nor in order to substitute a residence at Benmore for a residence in Trinidad. He does not appear to have even intended to do that, and, after the purchase, he continued to speak of Trinidad as the place where he must personally live, to attend to his business. Verbal expressions are certainly of less weight than written statements; but it cannot be altogether overlooked, that, after the purchase of Benmore, and with reference to the suggestion of retiring and residing there, Mr Lamont said, 'he would not come home and lead an idle life;' and that 'he would rather work out than rust out.' The purchase of Benmore is frequently stated by Mr Lamont himself in his letters to his brother and to Mr Newton, to have been to give his nephew, James, agricultural experience and rural enjoyment, and ultimate succession; and accordingly, by his settlement, executed in 1849, the year when the purchase was completed, he left to James Lamont the estate of Benmore. It is true that, while he lived, Mr Lamont was the proprietor of Benmore—that he so designed himself in his holograph settlement and other documents—that he took much interest in it, and looked forward with pleasure to seeing his friends there, when he might be in this country. He had previously dwelt in hotels and club-houses. He had more than one residence in Trinidad when he returned from visiting Scotland, but he wished to have a residence of his own, during his visits to Scotland, and at the same time to secure for his nephew present employment and improvement, and a valuable succession. In all this, he did not mean to abandon Trinidad, and he did not abandon Trinidad—neither facto nor animo, did he change his domicile.

"A case like the present depends chiefly on its own facts and circumstances. The Lord Ordinary has carefully consulted all the leading authorities, and it is unnecessary to refer to them. The rules of law have been settled, and the real difficulty is in their application to the circumstances of the case. The facts that Mr Lamont, leaving Scotland with no family ties and no property, was for twenty-six years a constant resident, and for above forty years an active planter, residing in Trinidad, that he had estates, houses, establishments, and official position there, in the various articles of the condescendence the whole evidence in the case, instead of the facts to be supported by the evidence. It is a very irregular record. But it brings before us the whole evidence upon which the parties rely. No. 172.

May 29, 1857.
The Crown v.
Lamont.

The facts of the case appear to be that Mr Lamond was born in Argyleshire in 1782, where both his father and mother had their domicile. In 1801 or 1802 he went to Trinidad, and settled there as a planter. He purchased estates there, which he managed personally. He had a residence and establishment in Trinidad. He was an active member of the community, and became a person of some consequence. He held a public office in the colony, and died there in his own residence in November 1850, in his 69th year.

If that were the whole case, there could be no question that, at the time of his death, Mr Lamont was domiciled in Trinidad. But it is necessary to trace his history more minutely, and ascertain whether it discloses any circumstances which shall obviate the conclusion which would otherwise arise from the general character of the case as I have now stated it.

From the time Mr Lamont went to Trinidad in 1801-2, till 1828, a period of twenty-six or twenty-seven years, he appears to have been constantly resident in Trinidad, and during all that time he does not appear to have revisited or expressed any intention of revisiting his native country. I find nothing in the record that leads to any other conclusion than that he considered himself as resident in Trinidad. He had all his interests in that place, and an establishment there, and I see nothing to lead me to doubt that, in 1828, his proper domicile was in Trinidad. His domicile of origin had been lost, and another had been acquired. If he had died in 1828, there could have been no doubt or question as to his domicile.

But the circumstances founded on by the pursuer are subsequent to that date. Therefore it is to the period of his history between 1828, and his death in 1850, that we must look for the elements on which our decision is to be rested.

The point before us is, whether after 1828 he again changed his domicile, through re-acquiring a Scotch domicile? The affirmative of that proposition must be established by the pursuer. The onus of proving that is on him. Now, it is a received principle that the re-acquisition of a domicile may be inferred from circumstances which would not be sufficient to infer the loss of the original domicile, and the question is, are the circumstances of this case sufficient to sustain the inference that Mr Lamont had lost the domicile which he had acquired in Trinidad? I think they are not. The main facts on that side of the question are, first, that he made repeated visits to Scotland; second, that he rented premises in Glasgow where he carried on mercantile business through the instrumentality of an agent; third, that he purchased a property in Argyleshire on which he caused a mansion house to be erected. These are substantially the facts on which the case for the Crown is rested.

Now, as to the first of these, Mr Lamont's first visit to Scotland was made in 1828. He remained but a short time—for two months. He then returned to Trinidad, where he remained for six years. His second visit was in 1835, on which occasion he appears to have been in Scotland for the purpose both of transacting his mercantile business and of visiting his friends. Two years elapsed before he made another visit. After 1838 these visits became more frequent; indeed, after 1840 they became almost annual. His visits to Europe were not for the purpose of spending his time entirely in Scotland; they were devoted partly to residence in England, and partly to residence on the Continent of Europe. But it does not appear that Mr Lamont ever expressed any intention of remaining permanently in all which he retained till the close of his life, that, in advanced years and unmarried, he died in his own house in Trinidad, and that he never abandoned or expressed an intention to abandon his business, residences and position there, and never returned to Scotland animo remanendi, or expressed an intention to return to Scotland animo remanendi, or otherwise than for a season, and with the view of returning to Trinidad, are, in the opinion of Lord Ordinary, sufficient to preponderate over the facts favourable to the Scottish domicile; and they have accordingly led him to the conclusion that Mr Lamont died domiciled in Trinidad."

No. 172. Scotland. He himself describes his visits as visits,—which implies that he was going from home to some other place; therefore, I do not think that upon these visits much can be rested, as inferring that Mr Lamont had changed the domicile he had acquired in Trinidad.

May 29, 1857.
The Crown v.
Lamont.

The second circumstance is, that Mr Lamont rented premises in Glasgow where he carried on business by the assistance of an agent. The fact that a party domiciled in one country, has an agent in another country, and pays the rent of premises in which his agent conducts his business, does not alter his domicile. These premises rented by Mr Lamont were for the purposes of his business. They were not for residence; and upon the occasion of his last visit before leaving Scotland Mr Lamont instructed his attorneys whom to employ as his agent in the event of the party then acting giving up his agency.

But the third and prominent circumstance in Mr Lamont's history is, that he purchased a property in Argyleshire on which he caused a mansion-house to be erected. That was in 1848 or 1849. The purchase was not a very large one, looking to the extent of his means. He paid L.13,000 for the estate, but after having made the purchase he found that the mansion-house was not in good order. He intended to have it repaired, but ultimately thought it wiser to have it rebuilt. But, though Mr Lamont made that investment, it does not appear that he had any intention of coming at any early period, or at all, to reside permanently on his estate. When in Scotland in 1849 and 1850 he visited it, but these were very transient visits. He lived more in hotels in Glasgow, and never made the estate a residence. The strong fact connected with this investment is, that the object Mr Lamont had in view in making it is completely disclosed through his whole correspondence,—it was to give employment and occupation to his nephew, whom he intended to be, and whom he did make his heir. That intention is expressed again and again. Now, an investment for that purpose is no indication of a change of domicile. There is no expression of intention by Mr Lamont at any after period to come to reside in this country. On the contrary, the statements in the record for the Crown are, that he expressed repeatedly, and up to a late period, his intention of managing his affairs at Trinidad. "He would die in harness." He "would not come home and lead an idle life." Therefore, there is nothing in this investment to prove that his domicile was other than in Trinidad.

The only point before us is the question of domicile. I therefore think that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to.

LORD IVORY.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I am also of the same opinion; and I may mention that I had the benefit, in another Court, of hearing this case fully argued; and, although on that occasion I gave no judgment, I formed a clear opinion upon the case,—the same as your Lordship has expressed.

LORD DEAS.—I am entirely of the same opinion with your Lordships and the Lord Ordinary. It is true the deceased was born in Scotland; and, although he was an illegitimate son, his domicile of origin might have been easily enough revived had he wished to revive it,—especially as his conduct and character appear to have been such as to have placed him in a position, relative to his father's family, which it is pleasing to contemplate, and which might naturally enough have resulted in an equal desire to settle among them as if he had been born in lawful wedlock. But I cannot discover that, to the end of his life, he ever manifested any such desire or intention. He left Scotland for Trinidad when he was about twenty years of age. He became a successful planter and purchased extensive estates in Trinidad, and, for twenty-six years, he never once visited Britain. For twenty-two years more he continued actively engaged in the same pursuits as formerly; and, although, during the latter period, he frequently visited this country, more for the purposes of business connected with his Glasgow agency, than of seeing his friends, he never once expressed even a wish, far less an intention, either permanently to remain, or ultimately to return for the purpose of remaining. On the contrary, he expressed his resolution to continue his occupation in Trinidad to the end, and, as he expressed it, "to die in harness." He did die in harness in that island in 1850, being upwards of forty-eight years after he had first left Scotland. The single circumstance which, at first sight, might suggest a doubt is that, some years before his death, he per-chased the estate of Benmore, in Argyleshire, and built a house on it. But this No. 172.

 circumstance is completely explained by his letters, which shew that the avowed into the possession of which he had thus been installed. Indeed it is so clear that Young v.

 that all the circumstances connected with them become only, when properly attended to, additional circumstances to prove that he had no intention whatever of ultimately quitting Trinidad and settling in Scotland.

The defence was, inter alia, that the pursuer's vessel was in a leaky and unseaworthy state when she was loading, and when she sailed went aground.
 That afterwards during the voyage she struck on a rock and was damaged, and detained through the negligence or unskilfulness of the pursuer, or those acting for him: that the cargo had been damaged in consequence of such unseaworthiness, and of the delay thereby occasioned, and that the pursuer was not entitled to claim the balance of his freight, he having taken no means whatever to save the interest of those concerned in the cargo.

The Lord Ordinary reported the case, on the issues, to the Inner House.
 The only difficulty was as to a counter issue proposed by the defender in order to bring out his defence. It was in these terms :—"Whether, in consequence of the insufficiency of the said vessel, or through the fault or negligence of the pursuer, or others for whom he is responsible, the cargo of the said vessel was not delivered in the like good order and condition in which it was shipped, whereby loss was sustained on the said cargo, to the amount of the stipulated freight, or part thereof."

Millar, for the pursuer, now objected to the word "insufficiency." There was no precedent for such a phrase. The proper word to adopt was "unseaworthiness."

D. F. Inglis, for the defender, contended that he was not bound to take an issue of unseaworthiness,—this was a mere contract of carriage, and the insufficiency of the means of carriage was the true ground to assign. The vessel might be good and seaworthy, and yet unfit for carriage.

The Court suggested the phrase "leaky condition," which was agreed to.

The pursuer's issue was in the ordinary form, whether the defender had chartered the vessel, and was resting owing the balance of the freight.

The counter issues, as adjusted, were :—"1. Whether, in consequence of the said vessel having been in a leaky condition when she sailed, and having continued in that condition during the voyage, and through the fault of the pursuer in the conduct of the voyage, the cargo of the said vessel was damaged, and loss was sustained on the said cargo to the amount of the stipulated freight, or part thereof?"

"2. Whether, in consequence of the said vessel having been in a leaky condition when she sailed, and having continued in that condition during the voyage, the cargo of the said vessel was damaged, and loss was sustained on the said cargo to the amount of the stipulated freight, or part thereof?"

"3. Whether, in consequence of the fault of the pursuer in the conduct of the voyage, the cargo of the said vessel was damaged, and loss was sustained on the said cargo to the amount of the stipulated freight, or part thereof?"

IN an action of mails and duties before Lord Benholme, the pursuer, in February 1857, took an order for revisal of his condescendence. The process was then borrowed up by his agent. The order was not obtempered, and the process was not returned, but was ultimately recovered by caption, and before it had been transmitted to the Lord Ordinary the defender moved for decree by default.

The pursuer did not appear to resist this motion, and the Lord Ordinary reported the case upon the point, whether he was bound to give decree as craved, or whether the process should not be first transmitted to him in ordinary course, and sent to the debate roll.

Fraser, for the defender ;—The pursuer has arrested the rents, and hence the importance of obtaining decree of absolvitor, and getting this action dismissed immediately. The procedure under the Act of 1850 in regard to the transmission of the record to the Lord Ordinary, was intended with a view to the adjustment and closing of the record between parties actively litigant, and was not imperative in such a case as the present, where one of the parties had ceased to make appearance, and the effect of following it No. 175. would merely be to create delay.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I had no doubt about this when in the Outer-House. If the parties are willing to close on summons and defences, the pursuer's consent must be endorsed on the defences. But if a revisal is moved for and allowed, and not complied with, the provision in section 2 of the Act of 1850 is quite explicit. The pursuer is not bound to appear, and although he does not, "the clerk to the process," without any motion to that effect, "shall transmit the same to the Lord Ordinary, with a view to the adjustment and closing of the record." The clerk here, the moment he got the process, ought to have so transmitted it. The subsequent course of proceeding pointed out by the Act must then take place. There is no difficulty in regard to it, and no option; and at this moment this process is irregularly here. It ought to have been on the table of the Lord Ordinary, and the defender should have had no opportunity of making such a motion as that reported to us.

Watt v. Watt.

LORD IVORY.—I concur in the reading of the Act of Parliament adopted by Lord Curriehill. The defender has only to take one or two steps more, and he will then get the action dismissed. To proceed now would be using great violence with the words of the statute. It is right that there should be a record closed in circumstances which shall bind even an absent party.

LORD DEAS.—When in the Outer-House I had this repeatedly before me, and I dealt with it in the way stated by Lord Curriehill. I do not think there is any irregularity here as yet. But the course pointed out by the Act of Parliament is, that the process shall be transmitted to the Lord Ordinary, and it is only after it has been so that it can be ascertained whether revisal was necessary or not. If parties fail to attend in chambers, or to satisfy the Lord Ordinary, he may put the case to the roll, and make an order, and then default may occur; but the defender must wait till the time arrives for ascertaining whether there is default or not.

LORD PRESIDENT.—That is the sound view of the Act. After the process is transmitted to the Lord Ordinary, if he conceives the record is not in a safe state to close, he may order an amendment, and if that order is not obtempered, a question may then arise. But the proper form of proceeding here is to transmit the process to the Lord Ordinary.

Process—Jury Trial—Proof by Commission—Statute 13 & 14 Vict. cap. 36, act. 49.—In a reduction on the ground of facility, fraud, and circumvention, the Court was moved to grant proof by commission, the pursuer being resident in New York, and it being stated that much documentary evidence must be taken by commission in America at any rate. The defender demanded a jury trial, and said that he intended to insist on examining before the jury the pursuer, who was the party said to have been imposed upon;—Motion refused.

This was an action at the instance of Archibald Watt, residing in New York, and Christopher Kerr, town-clerk of Dundee, his mandatory, against James Watt, junior, merchant in Dundee, his brother. It was now defended by Thomas Watt, his curator bonis. The action concluded for reduction of the decree of the Court of Session, obtained in absence against the pursuer on the 25th day of February 1840; and also of an account dated March 1838, and docquet attached to it, on which alone the decree was founded. With regard to the docquet, it was alleged "that the pursuer was prevailed upon and induced to subscribe said docquet or memorandum by fraudulent misrepresentation, and concealment and circumvention, on the part of the defender as to the state of matters betwixt them, at a time when the pursuer was weak and facile, and suffering under severe illness, and unable to attend business." The summons also contained conclusions for ascertainment

No. 176. of the true balance between the parties, and for payment of the same, and for damages arising from the defenders' wrongous and illegal proceedings.
 June 5, 1857. Tentative issues were lodged applicable to each conclusion.
 Watt v. Watt.

The Lord Ordinary, on 25th February 1857, pronounced an interlocutor sustaining the relevancy of the pursuer's averments, and finding "that the pursuer is entitled to a proof to establish his averments regarding said docketed account as being false and erroneous, and having been procured from him through facility and weakness on his part, and by falsehood, fraud, and circumvention on the part of the defender: And in respect that the pursuer has moved the Lord Ordinary, that, having regard to the particular circumstances of this case, the proof shall be appointed to be taken by commission, and to which the defender refuses to consent, Ordains the pursuer to box the record already printed, and any other parts of the process deemed necessary, to the Lords of the First Division, in order to the Lord Ordinary reporting the pursuer's motion to the Inner-House, in terms of the statute 13 & 14 Vict. cap. 36, sect. 49, and grants warrant for enrolment in the Inner-House rolls." *

The pursuer now supported his motion for a proof being allowed to be taken by commission, under sect. 49 of the 13th & 14th Vict. cap. 36, on the ground that a great part of the evidence was in New York; so that even if issues were sent to a jury, much of the evidence must at any rate be taken on commission. In these circumstances it would be most satisfactory that the whole should be taken in the same way. Although the summons did contain conclusions for damages, it was not, in substance, an action of damages, but one of reduction; therefore to grant the motion was quite within the discretion of the Court.

The defenders admitted that the matter was one for the discretion of the Court, if the pursuer limited his demand of proof to the reduction on the ground of facility. But he contended, that even that being one of the cases enumerated in 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, sect. 38, it was incumbent on the pursuer to show a higher degree of expediency to entitle him to a proof by commission than in an ordinary case. The pursuer, however, had not limited his demand for proof; and if he meant it to be applicable to all of the conclusions of the summons, even that for damages, as one of his tentative issues was, the Court had no power to grant it, for such questions were specially excluded by the 49th section of the recent Act. The fact that some of the witnesses were in America, and that it might be necessary that their evidence be ultimately placed in writing before the jury or the Court, did not affect the defenders' right to demand a jury trial. Farther, as much of the evidence would be of a documentary character, to that part the difficulty on which the pursuer based his motion had no application; and, with regard to the oral evidence, the most important witness

* "NOTE.—The defender did not contest that the pursuer had not set forth relevant grounds to entitle him to an issue, as regarded the reductive conclusions of the action to set aside the docketed account, and the decree of this Court resting upon it. The first plea in law for the defender has been accordingly repelled.

"The pursuer had lodged draft issues upon the whole cause, but under a protest that it was not a case to be sent to a jury. No discussion took place upon the terms of the issues, which were merely to be considered as indicating the pursuer's views upon the points on which he is ready to go to proof.

"The finding of the Lord Ordinary in his interlocutor is confined to the reductive conclusions of the summons, and it is so framed as to open the question for report to the Inner-House to take its direction, on the motion of the pursuer to be allowed a proof by commission.

"With regard to the other conclusions of the summons, they hang upon the pursuer's success in reducing the docketed account. The Lord Ordinary thinks they ought to stand over to abide the issue of the reduction of the docket."

in New York was the pursuer himself, the person said to have been imposed on, and the defender contended he was entitled to have him in the witness-box, to satisfy the jury out of his own mouth of his state of mind. It was not a matter of choice whether he should be here or not. The defenders would demand as a right that he, the most important of all witnesses, should be present. The only other very material witness—besides the defenders—the party through whom the fraud was said to have been committed, was dead. In these circumstances, the reason urged by the pursuer failed to make out a case for the Court departing from the ordinary rule of procedure.

Kerr.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It is, of course, for the pursuer, who asks that this case shall not go to trial before a jury, to shew good cause for our granting his motion. Such a case may perhaps be made out, and it is a material circumstance for consideration in the ordinary case, in determining whether we are to grant proof on commission, or send the case to a jury, that most or almost all of the witnesses are resident at a distance, or that all the witnesses on one side are so. But, on the other hand, an element that might guide us in an ordinary case, not enumerated as one appropriated for jury trial, would not necessarily guide us in a case that is one of those enumerated. Farther, this being a case founded on alleged fraud, the defender, who insists on the case proceeding in ordinary course of jury trial, has a strong ground indeed for maintaining that position; and the circumstance that many of the witnesses are at a distance is not of itself a sufficient reason for depriving him of that privilege. A great deal may also be said for the demand that the pursuer shall be examined personally. There may in many cases be an answer to that demand; but it is a consideration of importance that it has been made. Upon the whole, I think there are not grounds made out for departing in this case from the ordinary course.

LORDS IVORY and CURRIEHILL concurred.

LORD DEAS.—I am of the same opinion. When a case involves questions more fit for the Court than a jury, it may be an additional reason for the case proceeding before the Court that the proof requires mostly to be taken by commission. But where the case is not of that nature, the answer to the proposal is that the same disadvantage of not seeing the witnesses attaches to the Court as to the jury; and if the question itself be, as here, a question of weakness and facility on the one side, and fraud and circumvention on the other, it is not the less appropriate for a jury, in preference to the Court, that the evidence consists mainly of written depositions. Here there is the additional element that the defender asserts his right to have the pursuer in the witness-box, not merely to explain the facts, but to enable the jury to judge whether he is a person weak and facile, and likely to have been imposed upon in the manner he alleges himself to have been. On the whole, I have no doubt that the case ought to follow the usual course.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords, on report of Lord Handyside, and having heard counsel for the parties, Find that the cause should be tried by a jury, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed in this cause."

Question, whether the defenders' motion was competent, as the point was not raised on a bill of exceptions, and as the Court was not asked for a new trial.

Opinion, that an agent who, being employed to sell shares, purchases them for himself without communicating with his principal, acts in violation of his duty.

SEE ante, vol. xviii. p. 619.

This case went to trial in May 1857 upon the following issue:—"Whether, in September 1845, the said Christopher Kerr and John Kerr were employed by the Dundee Foundry Company, or those interested therein, and by William Gourlay's trustees, as their agents, to sell certain shares of the Dundee and Newtyle Railway Company, belonging to them respectively? and whether, in violation of their duty as such agents, the said Christopher Kerr and John Kerr did, as a company, or did jointly as individuals, in the said month of September or of October immediately following, become the purchasers of 217 of the said shares, or of any, and what part thereof?"

The jury returned the following verdict:—"Find for the pursuers, in so far as regards 100 of the shares referred to in the issue, and which belonged to the Foundry Company, inasmuch as these shares having been purchased by Messrs Christopher and John Kerr, for Mr Gabriel Hamilton Lang, and that transaction having fallen through, Messrs Christopher and John Kerr, as a company, in the month of October 1845, appropriated the said shares to themselves without communicating with the Foundry Company, by whom they had been employed to sell them; and find for the defenders in so far as regards the remaining 117 of the shares mentioned in the said issue."

The case now came before the Court on a motion by the pursuers to apply the verdict, and find them entitled to expenses; and on a counter motion by the defenders "to apply the verdict, and in respect thereof to assoilzie the defenders, to find them entitled to expenses," &c.

The pursuers founded their motion on the first part of the verdict, and they pleaded, that the defenders, in opposing that motion, must hold it to be—(1), unintelligible; or (2), so inconsistent in itself, that no effect could be given to it; or (3), to be a good verdict for themselves; unless (4), they admitted it to be quite satisfactory, and a verdict in favour of the pursuers.

But for the reason therein assigned, this last was the most reasonable view. Any difficulty arose out of the addition "inasmuch as," &c. These words could not be intended to express the extent of the verdict. That had been done already. They were therefore the reason for the verdict, and it was not said that they made it ambiguous, which, on the authority of Morgan v. Morris, would have grounded a motion for the verdict being corrected,—but it was said the reason assigned by the jury was a bad one, and one inconsistent with their finding. It was incompetent to state such an objection at the present stage of the case. The only way of getting the better of an inconsistent or unintelligible verdict was by applying for a new trial, not by entering up the verdict actually returned, contrary to the intention of the jury. There was truly no difficulty as to this first branch of the verdict. It would have made no difference if the jury had introduced their verdict with the explanation, "the Kerrs purchased these shares for Lang, and therefore find for the pursuers." The words "inasmuch as" were here equivalent to "because." Where the jury intend to leave anything to the Court to determine, they usually find certain facts, and then stop short of finding for either party. Here they had not done so; they had drawn their own conclusions from certain facts which pressed upon their minds, and the Court were precluded from considering whether the facts proceeded on by the jury properly led to the result they had arrived at. That result, however, the pursuers argued, was a sound one. The transaction alluded to, it was said, "fell through." That was an ordinary phrase, the meaning of which was apparent. If the transaction fell through, Lang never became the purchaser. It went for nothing—and what follows? Kerr and Company "appropriated the shares without communicating with the Foundry Company, by whom they had been employed to sell them." Did they not thereby become the purchasers? and if the defenders now objected to that legal inference, and maintained that the reason thus assigned should have led to a verdict in their favour on the first branch as well as the second, the objection was too late; they ought to have asked a direction of the judge to that effect, and to make the objection competent it ought to have formed the subject of a bill of exceptions. The facts found were sufficient to justify a verdict for the pursuers. But even if they were not, there was no precedent for entering up a verdict in favour of a pursuer as a verdict in favour of the defender.

The defenders, in support of their motion, argued;—A verdict "for the pursuer" was technically understood to be an affirmation of the whole issue, just as, on the other hand, a verdict for the defenders was negative of the whole issue. In the verdict under consideration there was no such general answer to the issue. The jury must be held to have said, that "inasmuch as what follows may be a finding for the pursuers, we find for the pursuers," or, "we find for them in so far as these facts go." But if these facts, to the extent of which alone the jury "find for the pursuers," do not answer the abstract question which was put to them, the Court could not enter up that verdict as affirming that abstract question. The jury had declined to say that the defenders were purchasers of these shares; but they say that the shares were purchased for an individual therein named, and that the defenders thereafter "appropriated them without communicating with" their clients. Was that a sale? The jury had not said that it was. They called it appropriation. But how did the defenders appropriate the shares? Was it a breach of trust? Was it criminal appropriation? Were the defenders purchasers from themselves as acting for their clients? There was no allegation of two sales, and the jury had found that the only purchase was a purchase for Lang. The fair inference was, that the shares were sold to Lang. He did not come forward to take them up. But he might come forward now and take them up. There was nothing in this action to prejudice his claim. What was the meaning of a sale "falling through," as applied to this concluded contract? An inchoate transaction might fall through, but the phrase could not apply to a completed sale, whereby the relation of buyer and seller was definitely constituted. That expression was simply intelligible. Again, while the jury affirm the purchase of the shares for Lang, they do not say that the defenders purchased the shares, but that they appropriated them. It was a fraudulent purchase that the pursuers had alleged on record. The pursuers of the action undertook to establish certain things to the satisfaction of a jury with a view to getting judgment, and having failed to do so, the defenders were entitled to have the verdict so entered up as to lead to absolvitor. The finding was inconsistent with the plea of the defenders being the purchasers. As to the competency of their (the defender's) motion, there was no imperative rule that a verdict, "find for the pursuers," must necessarily be entered for the pursuer.¹

At any rate, the verdict was ambiguous, and so could not warrant judgment for the pursuers, which must follow if the pursuers' motion were granted.²

Gourlay's
Trustees v.
Kerr.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It appears to me that, in so far as regards 100 of the shares referred to in the issue, this is a verdict for the pursuers.

In dealing with the question put to them the jury have thought that there was ground for distinguishing between 100 shares and the remaining 117 shares. What the ground for that distinction was we need not enquire. The jury, considering that a distinction did exist, deal absolutely with 117 shares and differently with regard to the others.

The jury, in the first place, “find for the pursuers in so far as regards 100 of the shares.” There can be no doubt at all that, if the verdict had stopped there, it would have been absolutely for the pursuers,—affirming everything in the issue in regard to the 100 shares. It could not be for the pursuers without affirming that the defenders “were employed to sell” the shares, and that, “in violation of their duty” as agents, they “did become purchasers of the shares, or part of them.” Therefore it would have been a verdict finding all these things. But the jury go on to say, “inasmuch as,” &c. To my mind the meaning of that addition is plain, viz. that Christopher and John Kerr made a transaction for behoof of Lang, which transaction “fell through.” There can be no doubt about the meaning of these words “fell through.” The transaction failed to take effect. These were the words of the jury, and I do not know that, by any other phraseology, they could have made their meaning clearer. They call it a “transaction,” and they say it failed to take effect. What was the position of matters? The verdict does not say that this transaction was made directly between the pursuers and Lang. It says the reverse. What then? It failed to take effect. There was no sale to Lang. Christopher and John Kerr are the sellers of shares belonging to the Foundry Company; and, being so employed to sell the shares, they “appropriated the shares to themselves. I cannot understand how the jury could have intended to say anything else than that the defenders appropriated the shares as purchasers. The jury did not mean to say that the defenders feloniously or theftuously took the shares. They are, by their verdict, explaining how the defenders came to be purchasers. They became purchasers in this way:—the sale to Lang became abortive: the defenders then appropriated the shares to themselves; and it is in that way that the jury find for the pursuers. It might have been a question in law whether that way of acquiring the shares was a failure of duty on the part of the defenders. But the jury have no doubt about that, for they “find for the pursuers.” At the trial, I was not asked to direct the jury that,—supposing the transaction to have been that the defenders had made the purchase honestly for Lang, that the purchase fell through, and became abortive, and that then the defenders themselves purchased the shares,—that would not be a purchase by the defenders in violation of their duty. I would have refused to give that direction; and, if that would have been a purchase in violation of their duty, what is described here is just the mode in which that purchase was attained. It would have been a different thing had the jury found that the defenders set about this at first, not for the purpose of securing the shares to Lang, but to themselves; and I was glad that the jury took that view of it, for, had they not done so, it would have led to a very different result in regard to the position of the defenders. But still the transaction described in the verdict was, to a certain extent, a violation of the defenders’ duty as agents,—the thing pointed at in this issue. On these grounds, this does not appear to me to be an inconsistent verdict. It may be explained by reference to the issue before the jury.

LORD IVORY declined.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—This case is attended with a good deal of nicety; but, on giving it my best consideration, I come to the same result as your Lordship, although, perhaps, not precisely on the same grounds. The verdict begins by finding for the pursuers. There can be no doubt whatever that these words mean that the defenders were the purchasers of the 100 shares to which it applies.

If the words which follow had merely expressed the reason why the jury find for the pursuers, no question could have arisen. Whether the reason was sufficient or not, a new trial not being asked for, we would have been bound to sustain the finding as a verdict for the pursuers. But, as I read the verdict, that is not the meaning of it. These words, “inasmuch as,” do not express the reason of the finding, but are a qualification of it, and are equivalent to saying, “we find for the pursuers, by which we mean so and so." But, when I enquire what is the meaning of that qualification, I keep in view that the jury have found in favour of the pursuers; and, therefore, I enquire whether the special facts which they thus find are inconsistent with that finding. First of all, the defenders did make the purchase. It is found that they were the purchasers, not for themselves originally, but for another person; but, in making the purchase, although they were the mandatories of the sellers, they were also the mandatories of the purchasers; so that we have a finding of the jury that they are in a position of purchasers in the capacity of mandatories for Lang. Next, the jury find that that transaction proved abortive. I cannot read that finding in the sense in which it has been read for the defenders, that there was a completed sale in favour of the defenders as mandatories for Lang; because, if there had been such a completed sale, it could not have fallen through. That phrase may be ambiguous, but it cannot mean, at same time, an effectual and ineffectual transaction. The purchase made by the defenders in the character of mandatories of Lang proved abortive. Then the jury farther find that the defenders retained the shares in their own hands;—"they appropriated them." If they had thought proper they might have thrown them up; and I hold that appropriation to mean that they took the shares to themselves, making a purchase in their own favour; so that, although I read these words as a qualification or explanation of the general finding, it is not inconsistent with it. I therefore agree in thinking this verdict must be entered up in favour of the pursuers.

LORD DEAS.—I agree in the opinion delivered by your Lordship in the chair, and the grounds of it. An objection is taken to the application of the verdict, so far as favourable for the pursuers, to which two answers are made,—the one, that the objection is incompetent, there having been no motion, debito tempore, for a new trial (which is not asked even now); and the other, that the objection is not in itself well founded. Now, I do not wish to give any opinion upon incompetency in a case in which, assuming the competency, I find sufficient grounds for judgment in favour of the party pleading incompetency, which is the position in which I find myself here. I think it clear that the objection taken is not well founded. The most stringent way in which the defenders can ask us to read the verdict, as to the 100 shares, is, I think, to read it as finding that Messrs Kerr (acting of course upon their authority to sell) having sold to Lang by a transaction which fell through, afterwards sold to themselves without communicating with their employers the Foundry Company now represented by the pursuers. Now, if Messrs Kerr had sold to themselves at once, the finding for the pursuer, as to these 100 shares, would, admittedly, have been unobjectionable; and what difference it can make that they first made a sale to another party which became abortive, I am unable to perceive. A sale which proved abortive was the same as no sale. If Messrs Kerr had required to go back to their employers for new authority to sell, this might have been different,—although, in that case, the sale would have been unauthorised. But the finding for the pursuers comprehends an affirmance of the authority to sell involved in the first branch of the issue. This authority was admittedly general,—to sell to anybody; and the only limitation of it was the limitation which the law implies—not to sell to themselves. The jury affirm the breach of legal duty; and to the direction they received in point of law no exception has been taken. The words "inasmuch as," which follow this finding for the pursuers, introduce an explanation which might possibly have destroyed the finding had the explanation been in its own nature calculated to do so. But I think the explanation is quite harmless,—importing as it does, nothing more than that, before selling to themselves, they had made an abortive attempt to carry through a sale to somebody else.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords having heard the counsel for the parties on the motions for them respectively contained in the notices Nos. 1427 and 1435 of process, they, in respect of the verdict returned by the jury on the issue in this cause, Find that, in September 1845, Christopher Kerr and John Kerr, mentioned in process, were employed by the Dundee Foundry Company, or those interested therein, and by William Gourlay's trustees, as their agents, to sell certain shares of the Dundee and Newtyle Railway Company, belonging to them respectively: Find

ROBERT FERGUSON of Raith, proprietor of the barony of Abbotshall, in the county of Fife, brought an action in January 1855, against David Methven, brick and tile manufacturer, to have it declared that he, the pursuer, was the owner of the clay within the barony, and that his right of property was subject only to the rights and privileges conferred upon the lessee by a lease dated 8th May 1714, between Mr Andrew Ramsay, then of Abbotshall, and William Robertson and William Adam, their heirs and assignees. The action contained declaratory conclusions to the effect that the defender, as in right of the said lease, had no power or privilege of taking away clay "excepting for the tile and brick manufactory in Linktown, as referred to in the said lease, and during the standing of the said manufactory, and subject to the conditions specified in the lease," and particularly, that he had no right of taking clay "for the uses or purposes of any pottery work, or of any persons employing the said clay in carrying on such pottery work, or for being used in the making of pottery ware of any description;" and therefore the action concluded for interdict against the defender so using the clay. There was a farther conclusion against the defender selling the clay to third parties, but it gave rise to no discussion, as it was not resisted.

The lease referred to bore to be granted by the then proprietor of Abbotshall "during the standing of the manufactory after mentioned, to the said William Robertson and William Adam, and their co-partners in the said manufactory, and their heirs and assignees," and it let and granted "the liberty and privilege of digging, winning, and away-taking clay in any place within the barony of Abbotshall they shall think fit for a tile and brick manufactory, to be erected by them in Linktown, excepting always from the said privilege the houses, yard, and parks belonging to the said

Mr Andrew Ramsay, with the feuar's properties in Linktown; and also any part or portion of the said barony that may anyways damage or prejudice the said Mr Andrew Ramsay his mills or coal-works," &c. No. 178.

Ferguson v.
Methven.

The pursuer averred, in articles 7 & 8 of his condescendence, that the defender "is now, and has been for some time past, in the wrongous and illegal practice of away-taking clay from the said barony of Abbotshall, and using it for other purposes than those which alone are warranted by the said lease. Inter alia, he has so taken away and used quantities of the foresaid clay, for the purposes of a pottery work, which is situated in the vicinity, of which the defender has become the proprietor or occupant, or in which at least he has a large interest. It is believed that the defender uses imported clay and various other articles at said pottery; but he also uses quantities of the foresaid Abbotshall clay for pottery purposes. Pottery ware is an article wholly different from bricks and tiles. It is made on different premises from those in which the defender carries on his foresaid manufacture of bricks and tiles. Different implements, materials, processes, and workmen, &c., are employed in making it, and it constitutes a separate manufacture. It was not in the contemplation of the parties to the foresaid contract of lease of 1714, and is not included within said lease. Moreover, the defender has been, and now is, in the wrongous and illegal practice of selling quantities of the said Abbotshall clay to third parties, without either asking the leave of the pursuer to do so, or accounting to him for the price of the clay thus wrongfully sold."

The defender's statements in articles 3, 4, and 5 of his condescendence, were as follows:—"3. From the earliest period, at least for more than eighty years past, the granters and their successors, under the deed of 1714, in virtue of the grant, used the clay for purposes to which it was adapted, and, in particular, for the manufacture of what is called brown ware. It is the universal custom at all brick and tile manufactories to apply the clay where it is capable of making these articles, and when these articles are in demand to apply it to this manufacture. In point of fact, in all the older brick and tile works the ware is manufactured, and is held and considered as a proper manufacture of the work. The application of clay to brown ware, complained of, is an application which, according to the universal usage and understanding of the trade, is held to be a proper application in a brick and tile manufactory. 4. The brown ware was, for upwards of fifty years, made from clay taken from the barony lands, and in buildings on property in Linktown, belonging to the defender and his ancestors. On the same property the brick and tile manufactory stands—is connected therewith—forms a part thereof—and the whole are situated in the village of Linktown, and are within the barony of Abbotshall. There is also carried on in buildings upon said property a manufactory of pottery ware. This ware is made from clay and other materials imported from other quarters, the clay within the barony contained in the grant not being adapted for the purpose of manufacturing these articles. 5. The pursuer and his ancestors, the proprietors of the barony, were perfectly aware of the use made of the clay from the barony of Abbotshall, in the manufacture of brown ware, and they have received and discharged the rents due under the contract, in the knowledge of such use, and without protest or objection of any kind. The defender and his authors have been recognised by the pursuer and his predecessors as having right under the lease, and they have demanded and received the annual payments on that footing. In receiving and acknowledging receipt of these annual payments, they received and discharged the rents or annual payments as for clay known by them to have been applied in the manufacture of brown ware; and this has continued for greatly more than the prescriptive period."

In October 1855 the pursuer raised a second action, which was afterwards conjoined with the first, concluding to have it found that the defender had no power under his lease to make "pipes and collars, or pipes or collars, for the purpose of drainage or otherwise."

The pursuer pleaded;—That the defender's right being founded on the lease of 1714, which conferred no power or privilege to do any of the things complained of, there were no termini habiles to support any plea of prescription or of homologation.

The defender pleaded;—That according to the just construction of the grant of 1714, he was entitled to use the clay within the barony of Abbots-hall, for such purposes as were usual in brick and tile manufactories. And it being according to universal usage to make brown ware at such manufactories, there were no good grounds on which the demand in the summons could be supported. The usage for greatly more than the prescriptive period, under the pursuer and his ancestors, was conclusive as to the construction of the grant, even if it were otherwise open to doubt. The application having been continued for greatly more than the prescriptive period, could not now be challenged. The pursuer and his ancestors having homologated the acts of the defender and his predecessors in right of the grant in the use of the clay, were barred from any such challenge as was now attempted.

The following issues were proposed by the pursuer:—

"It being admitted that the pursuer is proprietor of the barony of Abbots-hall, in the parish of Abbotshall, and county of Fife, and that the defender is in right of a contract of lease, dated 8th May 1714, of which No. of process is an extract:

"1. Whether the defender has taken clay from the said barony of Abbots-hall, for the purpose of using the same in the manufacture of pottery ware, being a purpose not authorised by the said contract of lease?

"2. Whether the defender has taken clay from the said barony of Abbots-hall, for the purpose of using the same in the manufacture of pipes or collars, to be employed in drainage or otherwise, being a purpose not authorised by the said contract of lease?"

The following issues and counter issues were proposed by the defender:—

"1. Whether the defender has, in violation of the said contract, taken and used clay from the said barony, for the manufacture of pottery ware?

"2. Whether the defender has, in violation of the said contract, taken and used clay from the said barony, for the manufacture of pipes or collars, to be employed in drainage? Or,

"1. Whether, for forty years before the 17th October 1855, the defender and his predecessors, in right of the said contract, took and used clay from the said barony, under and in virtue of the said contract, in the manufacture of brown ware?

"2. Whether the pursuer and his predecessors, the proprietors of the said barony, or any of them, acquiesced in and homologated the taking and using of clay from the said barony, for the manufacture of brown ware, by the defender and his predecessors, in right of the said contract?

"3. Whether the pursuer or his predecessors, the proprietors of the said barony, acquiesced in and homologated the taking and using of clay from the said barony, for the manufacture of pipes, or pipes and collars, for drainage, by the defender, or his predecessors, in said lease?"

On 27th February 1857, the Lord Ordinary reported the cause on the adjustment of the issues.*

* "NOTE.—In the course of adjusting the issues in this case, certain points of law have been discussed, particularly in connection with the pleas in defence, which it may ultimately be necessary to dispose of, but on which the Lord Ordinary has not found that he could advantageously give a decision at present. He will, however, endeavour to explain their nature, and to state his own views regarding

Ferguson v.
Methven.

The pursuer now pleaded;—That the question was, whether the tenant's operations were "authorised by the lease?" The issues proposed by the them, for the assistance of the Court, in case it should be found that they properly arise in the final adjustment of issues.

"The clay in the pursuer's lands was let to the defender's authors 'for the tile and brick manufactory' to be erected by them, and the lease is granted in somewhat singular terms, 'during the standing' of the manufactory.

"It seems clear that the clay was thus let for a special purpose, and the only questions between the parties regard the limits of the defender's rights. These conjoined actions have been raised for determining those questions.

"It is not disputed by the pursuer that the defender can take clay for the manufacture of bricks and tiles; but it is alleged, in the first of these actions, that he is also taking it for a pottery work; and the pursuer says that pottery is an article wholly different from bricks and tiles; and he seeks, accordingly, to interdict this use of the clay, as beyond the limits of the lease. The defender admits that he uses the clay for the manufacture not of pottery but of 'brown ware,' and he makes averments as to that article which require attention.

"It may be doubted whether on the record, in the action as to pottery, the parties have come to issue on the matter with all the precision that could have been wished. The pursuer does not mention 'brown ware' in his condescendence at all, and when he speaks of it in answer to the defender's statements, he does not say that it is pottery, though it is presumed he means to take that view at the trial, and to maintain that the manufacture of 'brown ware' would entitle him to a verdict upon an issue as to the improper manufacture of pottery. The first issue which the pursuer proposes relates to this matter, but makes mention only of pottery in general terms.

"In so far as regards the making of pottery other than 'brown ware' the only dispute between the parties is one of pure fact. The defender denies that he has used the clay for pottery in that sense, and does not attempt to justify it by usage, in any other way.

"Again: In so far as the defender is to maintain that 'brown ware' is not pottery' he seems to require no counter issue. If he is right in that view of the fact, then the pursuer will not be entitled to a verdict on his issue as to pottery, by proving that the defender has used the clay for brown ware, even if brown ware were in itself an improper use of the clay.

"The difficulty in the shape of the case seems only to arise in so far as regards the supposition that 'brown ware,' which the defender admits he has made, is pottery in the sense of the pursuer's issue. In that view the pursuer would be entitled to a verdict, if pottery, including brown ware, was not within the lease, and if there is no special defence to justify the making of 'brown ware.'

"The defence here may arise either on the construction of the lease, or apart from its construction. If the words of the lease letting the clay, do in their popular or technical acceptation imply the making of 'brown ware,' or if that manufacture is a known or universal accessory of a tile and brick manufactory, as seems to be alleged in the defender's statement, Art. 3, he may be entitled to a verdict; but he will need no counter-issue to cover that case. Perhaps also, he would need no counter-issue, in so far as he is to plead that possession under the lease will regulate and affect its construction, though this point may require consideration in adjusting the issues.

"But the defender seems to point at another and broader defence, and to maintain that the long usage of making brown ware may, of itself, be effectual to give a use of the clay for that purpose, even although it could not be held that the words of the lease admit of a construction to that effect. The Lord Ordinary thinks that such a plea is not well founded. If the lease is incapable of a construction that will include the disputed manufacture, he does not see how a new lease, or a collateral lease of clay for other purposes could be created out of any usage, however long continued. Such a usage might import for the past a permission to take clay, de anno in annum, for the purpose referred to, and might thus bar a claim for damages, or any other claim of a retrospective kind. But out of such a usage to create a lease not contained within the terms of the existing contract of parties, defender for the pursuer, speaking of "violation of the lease," did not raise the question fairly; for there was no express injunction in the lease against so taking clay. It was quite enough that it was not authorised.¹ In Gillespie v. Russell, the essential question put was, whether the tenant was doing what the lease did not authorise, and that was what it was now proposed to put in issue—this not being like a case of miscropping, where rotation was prescribed, and where, therefore, the acts complained of were in direct violation of the lease.

Farther, usage could be founded on by the defender only to the effect of construing any flexible terms in the lease, but for that purpose he required no counter issue. He could adduce every proof of usage without it. His object, therefore, in asking this counter issue, was to push the plea of usage beyond the construction of the lease, and for the purpose of rearing up a right to a heritable estate, or interest by mere usage and possession, even without a title.

The same objection applied to the second counter issue. Whatever rights the lease carried, it carried fully without homologation, therefore that plea must be proposed to be used to carry something outside the lease. Its object seemed to be to establish that because for a number of years the defender had taken clay for a purpose not provided for by the lease, therefore he was entitled to continue to do so. But the fact of the landlord taking the rent due for the legal uses of the clay could not be pleaded as homologation of the illegal use of it in all time coming. He was only taking payment of a just debt, which could not be turned to his disadvantage. As to the allegation that the landlord was aware of the various purposes to which the clay was applied, if proved, it only amounted to a case of tolerance, which might bar a claim of damages or accounting, but could not rear up a privilege de futuro. A counter issue for the purpose of construing the right was unnecessary. But it would be most dangerous to allow such an issue, if its object was to create a right on the ground of acquiescence. The only question between the parties was one of construction.

and this, too, for a prospective period of almost indefinite duration, seems inconsistent with the rules of law. A lease for a term of years can only be constituted scripto, and usage can confer no right for the future without a title, so that, if the terms of this lease are unambiguous and inconstruable, and must be held to be exclusive of the manufacture of pottery, or of brown ware, there seems no foundation on which any other kind of lease can be rested.

"The same view substantially may be taken of the defender's plea of homologation or acquiescence. If the terms of the lease can by no possible construction include the making of brown ware, there is nothing to homologate, and acquiescence seems only capable of supporting what is past without giving a warrant for any new and future operations.

"It thus appears to the Lord Ordinary that the only relevant pleas of the defender are those which either go to the simple matter of fact, or are such as may affect the construction to be given to the terms of the lease. But it may be doubted whether any of the defender's pleas are so stated on the record, as to admit of being safely repelled at present, or whether the questions raised do not affect the adjustment of the issues which the Court only can settle.

"The remarks above made apply only in part to the second action and second issue for the pursuer. The defender here does not seem to plead any usage except such as can affect the construction of the lease, but the plea of homologation is stated here also, and the element of usage mixed up with it.

"Upon the whole, it will be for the Court to consider whether there are any questions of law that can be determined with advantage before trial, or what course in this respect it would be best to follow."

 its date; and if brown ware, as he alleged, was part of such a business at Ferguson v.
 that time, then the lease clearly contemplated that clay should be taken for Methven.
 that purpose, and his so taking it was not a contravention; and unless it could be shewn that the privilege was limited to the taking of clay for the uses of a brick and tile manufactory, according to the pursuer's notions of what that was, or that there was an express or implied prohibition against so using the clay, the pursuer had no case. The contention between the parties was, whether this was within the lease or not, and therefore that question should be put to the jury, in the terms suggested by the defender.
 The issue proposed by the pursuer did not put the main question to the jury as such, but merely as a member of a dependent part of the sentence.

As to the counter issues, the defender's statement was that the right to use clay in a certain way was fortified by use for forty years, and even although wrong in construing the lease as originally contemplating the manufacture of brown ware as part of the ordinary business of a brick and tile manufactory, still, if there has been such continued use for forty years, the defender would be entitled to a verdict under this issue. He was not trying to establish a right which was contradictory of the contract. With regard to the second issue, this was exactly the class of cases to which acquiescence applied. At the same time, if this was only a question of construction, and it was understood that that part of the defence was not excluded, counter issues might not be necessary.

After consultation,

LORD PRESIDENT.—We think that in this case there is no necessity for counter issues. The matter resolves into a question of construction, and the defender says that, if so, he does not press for a counter issue. We are also of opinion that the issue proposed by the pursuer is not rightly framed, and that the issue proposed by the defender to be taken by the pursuer is more suitable. But perhaps some other better expression may be found than "violation of the contract," and, therefore, we think that amended issues should be put in.

LORD DEAS.—While I quite agree, I do not wish it to be understood that, in my opinion, this is a case in which there ought not to be counter issues if the defender had pressed the point, but, as he does not, we need not go into that question.

On 3d June the case was again called. The pursuer now proposed to take the following issues, prefixing the same admission as before:—

"1. Whether the defender has taken clay from the said barony of Abbots-hall, for the purpose of using the same in the manufacture of pottery ware, without power to that effect under the said contract?"

"2. Whether the defender has taken clay from the said barony of Abbots-hall, for the purpose of using the same in the manufacture of pipes, or pipes and collars, to be employed in drainage or otherwise, without power to that effect under the said contract?"

The defender then contended that the pursuer's issue must put the question whether the defender had used the clay, not merely whether he had taken it for the purpose of using. Farther, that unless he, the defender, had committed a legal wrong, and had done injury to the pursuer, there was no ground of action, and the pursuer had no title to complain, therefore it was indispensable that these two qualities should be added to the issue. What was complained of was not the taking clay, but the using it in a particular manufacture, so that the mere absence of power to that effect in the lease was not sufficient. The act must be unlawful, either at common law, or in respect of the contract. If it was an invasion of the pursuer's right as owner of the estate, it must be a legal wrong, and so injurious to him. If not

No. 178. an invasion of the pursuer's right, it was not a legal wrong, and not injurious, and therefore not a thing that he could complain of.
 June 9, 1857. Penney, for the pursuer. — There can be no difficulty in adopting the word "using" instead of "for the purpose of using," but the defender objects that the whole conception of the issue is erroneous, because the issue does not raise the question of wrong and injury. This was not, in the correct sense, a case of wrong, but substantially the case of Torbanehill. It was much the same thing as if the landlord had let coal and the tenant had worked ironstone. It was not now the practice to take an issue of "wrong" in such a case as the present. In the case of failure to implement a contract of sale, or failure to deliver, "wrong" was never inserted. And so here, if a party having a lease takes the subject of it for a purpose not intended by the lease, his so acting is in one sense a wrong, but not in the sense in which that word is usually applied. A proprietor was entitled to challenge the actings of his tenant if he proved that the tenant was doing something which by his lease he had no right to do.

LORD DEAS.—But all this is on the assumption that usage is not an element in this case,—that the averment of contravention of the lease is sufficient. Usage appears to me to be the principal element in this case.

Penney.—Usage is only of importance as construing the contract. If usage is made out to construe the contract in favour of the tenant, he establishes his right to do this thing.

LORD DEAS.—If the defender prove usage, I cannot understand how the pursuer's case can be proved unless the issue of "wrongfully" be taken.

D. F. Inglis.—The cases in which the use of the word wrongful has been discouraged have been cases in which the issue necessarily put to the jury the wrong which was complained of,—e. g. failure to implement a contract of sale,—the issue there being whether the defender sold and failed to deliver. That was a statement in so many words of a legal wrong. But there was no legal wrong on the face of the proposed issue at all. What was complained of here was not breach of contract. It was something out of this contract altogether. There was no relevant complaint unless it were stated that there was an invasion of the pursuer's right of property. The term "injury" was appropriate for expressing the liability of one person to another in reference to a subject which entitled a person to apply for a legal remedy.¹ This was not a case of "damage;" therefore there must be introduced into the issue both the elements of invasion of the pursuer's right and injury to him for which the defender was responsible, otherwise the question put to the jury was simply a fact without any quality at all, viz., the taking of clay, which might be most innocent in itself.

Penney.—The pursuer's case is on the contract, and on that alone. If the pursuer made out that the defender had no right under the lease to do this act, then the pursuer made out his case. The word "wrong" ought not to be in the issue. There was no objection to the words "violation or contravention of the contract." But it was not a question of wrong that was to be tried.

LORD PRESIDENT.—Is it quite clear that the pursuer's case rests on the contract? The defence rests on it; but the pursuer says that, without any right at all, the defender has taken the clay. The defender says "no: the contract allows me;" and, consequently, in articles 7 and 8 of the condescence, the allegation is, that the defender had "wrongously taken away." Is it not "wrongous" if the defender takes clay without authority? I think the issue should be, whether, during contain years, "the defender wrongfully took and used, for the manufacturing of No. 178. brown ware, clay from the barony of Abbotshall."

LORD DEAS.—I think that the proper and usual way of putting this issue is, ^{June 9, 1857.} whether, "in violation of the contract," &c. ^{Fraser.}

D. F. Inglis.—I do not and never did object to that.

LORD IVORY.—This action is not on the lease, but on the reserved right. I think the question is well put in the issue suggested by the Lord President.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I also think that the action raises a question, not on the contract, but on the invasion of right.

LORD DEAS.—When the case was formerly before us I was disposed to think there ought to be a counter issue. But this was not insisted in, and, looking to the practical difficulties, it was thought the better way was to try the whole question on issues for the pursuer. Before we can know what these ought to be, we must make up our minds upon the question whether this is a lease which admits of construction. Now I understood all your Lordships to be of opinion at the former advising that the lease was one which might be construed by what had followed on it. If this were not so, the question would simply be, whether the defenders did the thing complained of? For instance, if the lease was of coal, whether they had wrought ironstone. But here some expression should be used to raise the question of construction. Perhaps the word "wrongfully" is the least calculated to mislead; and the only difficulty is, whether, without some farther expressions, you have the question sufficiently connected with the contract?

The following issues were now adjusted :—

"It being admitted that the pursuer is proprietor of the barony of Abbotshall, in the parish of Abbotshall and county of Fife, and that the defender is in right of a contract of lease, dated 8th May 1714, of which No. 8 of process is an extract :

"1. Whether during the years 1852, 1853, and 1854, or any of them, the defender wrongfully took and used, in the manufacturing of pottery ware, clay from the said barony of Abbotshall?

"2. Whether during the said years 1852, 1853, and 1854, or any of them, the defender wrongfully took and used, in the manufacturing of pipes, or pipes and collars, to be employed in drainage or otherwise, clay from the said barony of Abbotshall?"

EVAN BAILLIE FRASER, Petitioner.—Crichton.

No. 179.

Minor—Tutor-at-law—Pupils Protection Act—Special powers.—Held, 1st, that is competent, under the Pupils Protection Act, to grant special leasing powers to tutors-at-law. 2d, (diss. Lord Cowan), that they should only be granted where case of necessity is made out.

Circumstances in which the Court refused to grant special powers to a tutor-at-law of two minors to enter into leases which should endure beyond the period of the last pupil attaining minority.

HUNTLY GEORGE GORDON DUFF, Esq. of Muirtown, died in 1856, leaving ^{June 9, 1857.} widow and two daughters, one born in June 1848, the other in August 1856. In November 1856, Evan Baillie Fraser, Esq. was appointed their ^{2d Division.} tutor-at-law. He reported to the Accountant of Court that the deceased had considerable moveable property, which, however, he understood would not be sufficient to meet his debts. The rental of the estate, including the manse-house, if let, amounted to L.930, out of which the widow was secured a jointure of L.400 a-year.

It was necessary to grant leases, in the ordinary administration of the estate, for subjects of which the former aggregate rent had been L.375 a-year. The tutor-at-law had advertised these, and got offers, but nearly

No. 179. all were conditional on receiving leases to endure for eleven or nineteen years.

 Fraser.

The subjects were (1), a mill, of which the lease had expired; the rent had been L.125 a-year, and the outgoing tenant was entitled to meliorations to the extent of upwards of L.400, and the buildings were in a very dilapidated condition. The highest of several offers now obtained was L.120 of rent, on condition of L.200 being spent upon the buildings, and a lease being granted for eighteen and a half years from Martinmas 1856, with a break at the end of five and a half years in favour both of landlord and tenant. On the other hand, the tenant was to pay L.400 for the machinery and buildings as they stood.

(2.) A farm, formerly estimated at L.100 a-year, but for which L.140 of rent was offered, on condition of a lease of eleven years being granted.

These two subjects were provisionally let by the tutor-at-law, subject to the sanction of the Court being obtained.

(3.) Smaller holdings, for which the tutor-at-law was of opinion that an increase of rent could be obtained, if he had authority to grant leases of eleven years.

The Accountant of Court reported that in his opinion the tutor-at-law ought to have authority granted as he desired.

Mr Fraser then presented a note to the junior Lord Ordinary craving authority. His Lordship remitted to Mr Niel Maclean, land surveyor, to report. He said, the proposed arrangement regarding the mill "appears to me to be not only fair, but advantageous to the estate." (2.) "I consider the rent of L.140, at which this farm has been provisionally let, fully as much as it is worth." (3.) Of one of the other subjects he reported, "I think there cannot be a question as to the propriety of the offer being accepted;" and of the other two, "I should think that by granting leases, say of eleven years endurance, there can hardly be a doubt of their fetching better rents than they now pay."

The Lord Ordinary reported the case to the Second Division, and stated that he thought it clearly for the advantage of the pupils that the powers craved should be granted.

Crichton, for the petitioner, referred to the cases of Kincaid, 5th July 1856, ante, vol. xviii. p. 1208; and Waddell, 19th February 1851, ante, vol. xiii. p. 739.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The Pupils Protection Act brings tutors-at-law within its operation, so far as procedure goes, but it says nothing directly as to the powers. Our difficulty as to these cases has not been apprehended in the other Division. It is not as to the competency but as to the propriety of granting special powers to tutors-dative. I think if we granted such powers as are here sought, we should immediately be made administrators for every such estate in the country. We must consider, before entering upon a course of practice which is certain to lead to such a result.

On a subsequent day,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have no special observations to make upon this case, but I think it right to say that in the case of Kincaid, the First Division seem to have mistaken what we did in the previous case of Waddell. They thought we considered it doubtful whether it was competent for the Court to entertain a petition for special powers from a tutor-at-law as coming under the Pupils Protection Act; but the only question on our minds was, whether or not the Court should, by granting special powers, undertake the administration of the affairs of pupils who have regularly appointed tutors-at-law. The criterion which should guide us seemed to be, has a case of necessity been made out? for there may be cases of necessity where the Court ought to interfere, whether for the protection of the property or the actual sustenance of the pupil.

In the case before us we have a mere question of expediency to deal with.

peculiarity of the case being that one of the pupils is within three years of being a minor, while the other is but a few months old. This is the great difficulty of the case. But this gentleman, Mr Fraser, has taken the office, and he must just bring his best discretion to the exercise of it,—it is not for the Court to interfere without necessity. It is needless to go into his difficulties in detail; but, on the whole, I am of opinion that a case has not been made out for our granting the powers craved.

LORD MURRAY concurred.

LORD WOOD.—I do not think there can be any doubt as to the competency of the Court to deal with this matter. But the question is, whether any necessity for our interference has been made out? I think none has, and that the tutor-at-law must exercise a sound discretion. The difficulty here is, how is this tutor to manage this estate? One of the pupils will be a minor in three years. Now to grant a lease beyond the three years would be to exceed his powers; for, as tutor, he cannot interfere in a manner which shall affect his pupil after ceasing to be in pupilage. I admit the difficulty; but, as no case of necessity has been made out, I do not think we should interfere.

LORD COWAN.—I cannot doubt the competency of the Court entertaining an application of this sort from a tutor-at-law, any more than from a judicial factor. It seems to me that the Pupils Protection Act puts the two upon the same footing so far as applications for special powers to this Court are concerned. I consider that, in disposing of and judging of such applications, we should act on the same principles, whether the application be by a judicial factor or by a tutor-at-law. This seems to me to have been the view of the other Division when they had the recent case of Kincaid before them.

As to this particular case, I am of opinion that the powers asked ought to be granted, in regard at least to some of the matters mentioned in the report of the Accountant of Court, and of which he approves. The pupils are two heirs-portioners—one born in 1848, the other in 1856; so that the tutor's powers as regards each expires respectively in sixty and sixty-eight, and the leading object of this application is to get power to grant leases to endure till this latter period, when both the pupils will have reached minority. Looking to the great expediency of granting the leases, and the special condition of the subjects, especially of the mills, when the tutor-at-law comes forward and says, "I have power to give a lease as to one of the pupils for eleven years, but no power as to the other beyond three, and it is essential for the interests of the estate that I should be able to grant leases for eleven years, and therefore I come and ask for authority to do so," I think we ought to grant the powers asked, there being an unexceptionable application as regards competency, and full power in the Court to grant it if deemed expedient.

Agent and Principal—Broker's account—Gaming and wagering—8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, s. 18—Pactum illicitum.—Where a party employs a broker to buy and sell stocks which he neither possesses nor intends to take up, speculating on rises and falls in the market, and hoping to settle by payment of differences;—Held (1), that such is gaming and wagering in the sense of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, sect. 18, and the broker is entitled to recover from his employer both advances made in the course of the transactions, and his ordinary commission and business charges; (2), that to constitute gaming and wagering in the sense of the statute, there must be two parties to the contract: opposed to each other, each intending the transactions shall be for his loss; and neither of them bound to deliver or accept the shares.

Question.—Whether a broker employed to carry on gaming transactions would be entitled to recover payment of his account against his principal.

Answer.—That the Act 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, applies to Scotland.

 Foulds v.
 Thomson.

2D DIVISION.
 Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
 I.

JOHN CHRISTIE FOULDS, accountant and sharebroker in Glasgow, raised the present action against Thomson and Burn for payment of "the sum of L.1017, 17s. 10d., being the balance of the price of certain railway stock and shares purchased by the pursuer in name and for the joint behoof of the said defenders, per account, commencing 11th October 1853, and ending 30th November 1854." He alleged that the defenders had been in the practice of dealing in railway and other stock on joint account, and had employed him as their agent in buying and selling their shares and stock; and that he, acting upon the joint and several authority and instructions of the defenders, entered upon the transactions, and made the sales and purchases detailed in the account. That down to the 16th of January 1854, at the close of each transaction, or series of transactions, he furnished each of the defenders with a specific statement of it, and that neither of them ever expressed any dissatisfaction; but they, in January 1854, suggested to him, that in future he should keep a pass-book for them, open to their inspection, in which he should enter their future transactions. This plan he thereafter acted upon. The defenders, he alleged, had frequently inspected the book, and they had never objected to any of the entries. The balance arising on the whole transactions was the sum sued for.

With regard to the defender Thomson, it was alleged, though not admitted, that he "a short time ago called a meeting of his creditors, submitted to them a state of his affairs, and entered the pursuer in said state as one of his creditors to the amount of L.1500—a sum which includes the amount now sued for;" and in his deposition as a witness in this action, Thomson admitted that he had offered 10s. per pound upon his share of the debt, by way of compromise, in order to avoid litigation.

In defence, it was stated that there was a well known class of speculators who, possessing no stock, went through the form of buying and selling, paying or receiving the differences between the selling price of the stock on the dates of sale and settlement. Such transactions were operations for the chance of differences in the rise or fall of the stock market; being time bargains, no purchase or sale actually took place, or was intended to take place, the transactions being merely fictitious entries in brokers' books, and the aim being merely the payment or receipt of the differences on the settling day. This, they said, had been the system followed in the account founded on, which consisted, from beginning to end, of nominal sales and purchases. No stock had been in existence so far as they (the defenders) were concerned and the entries of stock put to their debit or credit were not only so made without their knowledge, but were entirely fictitious. The whole transactions were not only unauthorised, but illegal and incompetent. They were gambling transactions, and known to be such by the pursuer; and they were, besides, in violation of the provisions of the Acts, 7 Geo. II. cap. 28 10 Geo. III. cap. 8; and 8 & 9 Vict. cap. 109.*

* The following are the terms of sect. 18, and the preamble of sect. 19, of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109:—

Sect. 18.—"And be it enacted, That all contracts or agreements, whether by parole or in writing, by way of gaming or wagering, shall be null and void; and that no suit shall be brought or maintained in any court of law or equity for recovering any sum of money or valuable thing alleged to be won upon any wager or which shall have been deposited in the hands of any person, to abide the event on which any wager shall have been made: Provided always, that this enactment shall not be deemed to apply to any subscription or contribution, or agreement to subscribe or contribute for or toward any plate, prize, or sum of money, to be awarded to the winner or winners of any lawful game, sport, pastime, or exercise."

Sect. 19.—"And whereas many important questions are now tried in the form of feigned issues, by stating that a wager was laid between two parties interested

The defenders farther admitted that they had in certain small transactions employed the pursuer; but they undertook to show that the account founded on was grossly inaccurate, and inconsistent with other statements rendered by the pursuer to them; and, moreover, that even if not void from being gambling transactions, they were in violation of the rules of the Glasgow Stock Exchange.

They pleaded, in defence;—"1. The transactions libelled being merely for differences or time bargains, and of the nature of wagers, are not actionable in law. 2. The vitium reale arising from the objectionable nature of the alleged contracts or transactions, render not merely the bargains assumed between the principals null and void in law, but also all subordinate or relative transactions between the alleged principals and brokers. 3. Upon the showing of the accounts themselves, the transactions therein referred to are struck at by the Act 7 Geo. II. cap. 8, passed to prevent the infamous practice of stock-jobbing. 4. By the common law of Scotland, recently made part of the law of England, by the statute 8 & 9 Vict. cap. 109, sect. 18, 'All contracts or agreements, whether by parole or in writing, by way of wagering or gaming, are null and void.' 5. The various entries in the accounts being fallacious, and assuming stock which was never vested in the parties referred to, transferences which never existed, and payment of prices which was never made, are unfounded in fact, and cannot be recognised in law."

respectively maintaining the affirmative and the negative of certain propositions; but such questions may be as satisfactorily tried without such form: Be it therefore enacted," &c.

* "Finds, first, in point of fact, that the defenders employed the pursuer as their agent or broker, to make purchases and sales for them of railway stock, during the period embraced in the account annexed to the summons, viz., from October 1853 till November 1854; and that the balance sued for as due to the pursuer, has risen since 30th March 1854, at which date the balance was in favour of the defenders: Finds, that although the said account contains about 180 transactions, it is proved that the defenders very rarely took up and paid for the stock they professed to buy, or gave delivery of the stock they professed to sell; and that they were frequently not possessed of stock at the time they entered into the contract of sale: Finds that the nature of the transactions is such as plainly to indicate that the defenders came into the share market as speculators for a rise or fall,—that is, in the hope that they would be able to sell at higher prices than they bought, and to buy at lower prices than they sold, and thus benefit by the differences: Finds that the pursuer could hardly fail to be aware that this was the defenders' object; it finds it not proved that the pursuer knew that the defenders would have been unable to meet their obligations if they had been called on to take up or deliver stock, instead of getting it carried over from time to time: Finds, that in as far as the pursuer is concerned, and, for aught that appears, in as far as the third parties with whom the pursuer dealt were concerned, each transaction of sale or purchase was complete in itself, and was a real and bona fide transaction: Finds that what is meant by carrying over is, that when the constituent does not put the purchasing broker in funds to pay for the stock that has been bought, and wishes a delay of the day of settlement, the broker sells the stock which he had bought to a new purchaser, to whom the original seller agrees to transfer, the broker of the first buying the difference, if the market has fallen, and charging his constituent with it, and at the same time buying again a like quantity of stock, in the hope that by a rise of the market before it requires to be settled for, the loss sustained on the first transaction may be repaired; and the same course is followed mutatis mutandis when stock is sold by the broker for his constituent, and he is not prepared to deliver it on the settling day: Finds that the parties who thus agree, by the common practice of the stock exchange, to liberate the original buyer or seller, and take other obligants in his stead, are not bound to do so; and should they refuse, the broker is in every instance personally liable: Finds that the defenders in the present case employed the pursuer to enter into the successive transactions condescended on in the account, for the purpose of getting rid of the prior ones by payment of differences; and specific statements of each transaction, or particular series of transactions, were regularly furnished to the defenders fortnightly, and were entered in a pass-book kept by the parties: Finds that the defenders did not deny the accuracy of said statements, or of the account sued for; but, on the contrary, promised to settle with the pursuer, and it was not until their affairs became embarrassed, and they could not arrange a compromise with said pursuer, that they fell back on the defence they have maintained in this action: Finds it proved that the pursuer did the work, and made the advances for the defenders, stated in said account: Finds, second, in point of law, that the Act 7 George II., cap. 8, as renewed and made perpetual by the Act 10 George II., cap. 8, is applicable exclusively to public stocks and securities, and does not extend to Scotland, so that it has no relation to the present case; but finds that a colourable contract for the sale and purchase of railway shares, when neither party intends to deliver or accept the shares, but merely to pay 'differences,' according to the rise or fall of the market, is gaming or wagering, within the 8 & 9 Vict., cap. 109, sect. 18, and also at common law, and is therefore null and void, and no suit can be maintained for recovering any sum of money claimed in respect of such contract—Grizewood, April 19, 1852, Scott's C.B.R. vol. xi. p. 538; but finds that the parties to the present case are not two parties who contracted for the pretended sale and purchase of railway shares, intending only to deal with each other for the differences, but are, on the one hand, as regards the defenders, speculators, who went into the share market in the hope of finding the differences in their favour; and, on the other hand, as regards the pursuer, the broker who was employed by the said speculators to buy or sell for them, who gave them his time, labour, and skill, besides making advances on their account, had no personal interest in the differences, however favourable they might have been to the defenders: Finds further, that as there is no evidence that the parties with whom the pursuer contracted on behalf of the defenders in the sale and purchase of stock, knew at the time that there was no intention to deliver or accept the shares sold or bought, neither the pursuer nor the defenders would have had an available defence, either under the statute or at common law, against these third parties, had actions been brought by them for implement of the transactions, the more especially considering that it is settled law, that a contract for the sale of goods to be delivered at a future day, is not invalidated by the circumstance, that at the time of the contract the vendor neither has the goods in his possession, nor has entered into any arrangement to buy them, nor has any reasonable expectation of becoming possessed of them by the time appointed for delivering them, otherwise than by purchasing them after making the contract.—Hibblewhite, 1839. Meeson and Welsby's Report, vol. v., p. 462: Finds, still further, that even although it had been proved, as it has not, that the pursuer had knowingly made, for behoof of the defenders, wagering contracts with third parties for differences which, as between the principals, would have been void, the defenders would still have been liable to the pursuer, as their broker, for labour expended and money paid at their request in fulfilment of such contracts, unless it could be shewn that the contracts were not only null under the statute or at common law, as wagers and sponsiones ludicrae, but were also illegal.—Knight, Jan. 23, 1855; Eng. Jur. N. S., vol. i., p. 525: Finds that neither the said act of Her present Majesty, nor the common law of Scotland, makes such wagering contracts illegal, but only null and void; and action therefore lies against the principals for labour given and money advanced by their agents or brokers.—Wells, April 29, 1836; Bingham's Reports, vol. ii. p. 722; and Oakley, May 4, 1836; Id., p. 732: Therefore, and in respect, 1st, that it is not proved, but, on the contrary, disproved, that there was any mutual understanding between the pursuer and defenders, and the third parties with whom they transacted in shares, that the summons: Finds the defenders liable in expenses," &c.

"NOTE.—To prevail in their defence, it is necessary for the defenders to make out that the whole transactions out of which the pursuer's account arises were illegal. Now, in the first place, whatever the defenders' own intentions may have been, they have entirely failed to prove that those other parties with whom they dealt, through the agency of the pursuer, entered into contracts with them only for differences. On the contrary, it is established by the evidence of all the brokers examined on both sides, that in every instance the pursuer, as acting for the defenders, might have been compelled to deliver the stock he sold, and to take up and pay for the stock he bought. Instead of doing so, he very often, with consent of the other party, only gave a new party's obligation to deliver or take up; but to obtain these obligations he had to effect new sales and new purchases, and paid or received differences according as the market rose or fell. There was, however, no understanding beforehand that this was to be the course of dealing; and it might have been put a stop to at any time, by any of the other brokers refusing to allow the transaction to be carried over beyond the first settling day. Now, in all this there was not only nothing illegal, but nothing of a character which made it incompetent to bring the matter into a court of law. That the defenders would not have been able to pay for the shares they bought except by selling them over again, or that they sold shares which they had no means of delivering except by purchasing before the day for delivery came, may shew that they were somewhat reckless speculators, but at the sametime shews that they did no more in regard to shares, than what is done every day in the mercantile world in regard to other commodities. In the case of Hibblewhite, quoted above, Baron Parke said,— 'I cannot see what principle of law is at all affected by a man's being allowed to contract for the sale of goods, of which he has not possession at the time of the bargain, and has no reasonable expectation of receiving. Such a contract does not amount to a wager, inasmuch as both the contracting parties are not cognisant of the fact that the goods are not in the vendor's possession; and even if it were a wager it is not illegal, because it has no necessary tendency to injure third parties.' If, then, there was no wager, there is an end of the defenders' case. But even suppose it had been shewn that all parties interested had known that the pretence of buying and selling shares was fictitious, and that it was merely the differences that were to pass between them, this might have made such contracts null and void, but it would not have tainted them with illegality, because the law attaches no penalty to them. The distinction is important as regards the broker employed by the parties speculating; for whilst it has been held that if a factor or broker engage, as such, in an illegal transaction, he cannot recover from his employer either his commission, or the advances or payments he may have made in order to carry his instructions into effect—(Russell on Factors and Brokers, and cases cited, p. 177)—the direct reverse has been held when the transactions are only null and void as wagers or sponsiones ludicræ, and not absolutely illegal.—Ib., p. 181, and case of Knight, quoted above. The Sheriff-substitute can find nothing in the law of Scotland to induce him to regard a colourable contract for differences in any other character than that of a wager, which, though it cannot be founded on in a court of law as the ground of a claim, is not, in the proper sense of the word, illegal. In the case of Gordon, Nov. 16, 1804, F. C., a contract of an analogous description, by which a party bound himself to pay another L.100 if the three per cents rose above L.70 in ten years, and the latter to pay to the former L.100 if they did not rise to that price, was held to be a wager, and not actionable, and the case was therefore dismissed, but it was not attempted to be pleaded that the contract was illegal. The distinction may be somewhat nice, but is sufficiently broad and tangible to have been frequently given effect to both in this country and in England. Be this as it may, however, the conclusive point for the pursuer is, that though

No. 180. adopting the findings in fact or law of the Sheriff-substitute, nevertheless arrived at the same conclusion.*

Foulds v.
Thomson.

A note of advocacy was presented for the defender Thomson, and reported at once to the Second Division, in terms of 13 & 14 Vict. cap. 36.

there was much speculation on the part of the defenders, there was no wagering, because it requires two parties to enter into a wager, and it has not been shewn that either the pursuer or defenders arranged with any second party to go into such wagering."

* The first part of the interlocutor was disposing of a motion to admit a condescence of res noviter, which was refused. It then proceeded:—"Finds that the action is raised for a balance of L.1017, said to have arisen on brokerage transactions for the purchase and sale of different kinds of stock: Finds it not proved that there has been in any instance any stock really either delivered to, or paid for by, the pursuer and defender, or either of them, but only a fictitious series of transactions in stocks of various kinds asserted to be sold and bought, the balance of which, one way or other, constituted the only real debt intended to be enforced between the parties, and not the stock itself delivered or taken: Finds it admitted by the pursuer, that neither of the defenders ever received or gave any stock on the occasions set forth in the account libelled on, but the difference between the price of stock at the commencement and expiry of each fortnight alone was carried to the debit or credit on either side, and the stock never changed hands from the beginning to the end of the account; but the intermediate transactions are settled by payment of the difference, and the stock, for the first time, is transferred, one way or other, at the close of the account: Finds that the pursuer was not the party alleged to be the proprietor of these shares, but the broker or mandatory who managed the transactions: Finds it proved that the pursuer was aware of the fictitious nature of these transactions, which were, in technical language, called 'Bearing and Bulling the market,' and in Glasgow were termed 'Continuations:' Finds, in point of law, in these circumstances, that, as between the principal parties, the contract was a gaming transaction, under the Act 8 & 9 Victoria, cap. 109, sect. 18, and also under the common law of Scotland.—Girzewood v. Blane, Scott's New Reports, p. 526, 20th November 1851, Erskine iii. 1, 10; Bell ii. 300, and cases there referred to: Finds, in the present case, which is an action at the instance of the broker, and not of the principal, that the broker here sues for the surplus of his expenditure over his receipts in the case above set forth, and that it is pleaded that the broker cannot receive the balance of his account in such a case, in respect, as between the principals, the contract was illegal.—Russell on Factors, and Brokers, 177; Smith's Law of Contracts, 203: Finds that it is pleaded by the pursuer, that the transactions, so far as he was concerned, were entirely bona fide, that the whole account sued for, embracing 180 transactions, was twice interrupted and closed by payment of cash: and that the transactions, which originally were bona fide for the sale of stock, became continuations, by the inability of the defenders to raise money to meet their engagements in connection with the stock, and that they went on to go into the market and continue the account: Finds it proved, in point of law, that the City Bank was impledged to the City Bank for its advances on said stock at the commencement of which the pursuer was unable to raise the money, as they were bound to do, and he was obliged to borrow money in order to evade the consequences of the contract: Finds the defender Thomson had, before this, advanced the amount of L.10,000, and held various securities, which had been forfeited, and that at this time the pursuer had given real bona fide orders for the purchase or sale of stock, but that the continuation or fictitious account: Finds, in point of law, that the employment began on the footing of real transactions, but was afterwards converted into fictitious ones, by the defe-

The import of the proof is contained in the findings in point of fact, contained in the interlocutor pronounced in the Inner-House. They were as follows:—"Find it proved, in point of fact, that the defender, along with a person of the name of Burn, employed the pursuer, as their agent or broker, to make purchases and sales for them of railway stock during the period embraced in the account annexed to the summons, viz. from October 1853 till November 1854, and that the balance sued for as due to the pursuer has arisen since 30th March 1854, at which date the balance was in favour of the defender: Find that the nature of the transactions is such as plainly to indicate that the defenders came into the share-market as speculators for a rise or a fall; that is, in the hope that they would be able to sell at higher prices than they bought, and to buy at lower prices than they sold, and thus benefit by the differences: Find, that in so far as the pursuer (respondent) is concerned, and so far as the third parties with whom he dealt were concerned, each transaction of sale or purchase was complete in itself, and was a real and bona fide transaction: Find that the defenders employed the pursuer to enter into the successive transactions condescended on in the account, for the purpose of getting rid of the prior ones, by payment of differences; and specific statements of each transaction, or particular series of transactions, were regularly furnished to the defenders fortnightly, and were entered in a pass-book kept by the parties: Find that the defender did not deny the accuracy of said statements, nor of the account sued for, but, on the contrary, promised to settle with the pursuer; and it was not until their affairs became embarrassed, and they could not manage a compromise with the pursuer, that they fell back on the defence they have maintained in this action: Find it proved that the pursuer did the work, and made the advances for the defenders stated in said account."

In the advocator's view the evidence did not establish these facts; in particular, he contended that the pursuer having examined both the defenders as his witnesses, was not entitled to repudiate their statements on oath as to the nature of the transactions.* From their oaths it was clear that Foulds ments, which obliged the pursuer, on their behalf, to enter into continuation transactions, from which the pursuer derived no benefit,—just like entering into a series of bill transactions, to postpone taking up an original bill: Finds, in these circumstances, in point of law, that the pursuer's claim is not tainted by its being founded on transactions struck at by the statute 8 & 9 Vict. cap. 109, sect. 18: Therefore adheres to the interlocutor appealed from, and dismisses the appeals, and decerns."

"NOTE.—The main ground on which the Sheriff adheres to the interlocutor under review in point of law, is the distinction founded on in the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor, and which appears to be amply established in law between a broker's or factor's claim for remuneration for trouble or reimbursement for outlay in a case such as the present, which relates to transactions not in themselves immoral, or illegal at common law, but merely declared null, or incapable of founding action by special statute, and those which are mala in se prohibited by the common law of all nations, and, consequently, incapable of affording action to any one concerned with them, and aware of their real nature. This distinction appears to the Sheriff to be well-founded, both in law and reason, and it appears to be in a peculiar manner applicable to this case, where the pursuer's employment as broker began for the conducting of real bona fide transactions, which was only turned into the conduct of fictitious ones by the inability of the defenders to make good at the requisite times the engagements consequent on real transactions."

* Peter Burn deponed, "The instructions I gave to the pursuer were, to 'bear,' in order to make up the loss incurred in the purchase of some Caledonian Railway stock in June 1853. The pursuer knew, when I gave him these instructions, that I had no stock to sell, though I told him to sell for me. At this date the City Bank held for Thomson and me an hundred shares, being L.10,000 worth of Caledonian stock, on which the bank had made a large advance. The whole never got authority to enter into a single bona fide transaction. His employment was to enter into fictitious transactions, and if he entered into real ones, his actings were not in conformity with his employment, which was, 1st, to gamble, and, 2d, to do so by bulling and bearing. The advocator denied the distinction between mala prohibita and mala in se, which, if it were sound, would lead to this result, that if brokers were interjected between two parties, whose dealings were admittedly gambling in the sense of the statute, the remedy would be complete and the statute defeated, because each broker would have action against his principal, though "the principals had not action against each other." Smugglers, also, could carry on their illegal traffic under the cover of such a doctrine. The objection, that they were not entitled to plead the illegality of their own transactions, did not apply, if they were right in their view of the proof that the pursuer all along knew their true nature, and accepted employment to wager and gamble.

For the broker it was argued:—There were two classes of items in the account. Money advanced, and remuneration for business done. It was not disputed that the business was done, and the disbursements made. Therefore the only question was whether 8 & 9 Vict., c. 109, sect. 18, makes these Acts illegal. He alleged that each transaction was a real one, and led to a transfer, more or less directly, in the books of the different companies whose stock formed its subject. The case was one, not of wager, but merely of a series of speculations on the part of the advocators. Many of them were time speculations, which were of every day occurrence, and of undoubted legality in merchandise, and were equally lawful as to shares of stock. But even assuming the advocator's statement that he and Burn went to the pursuer and said they wanted to speculate on rises and falls in the market, engaging to take and give delivery at distant dates, without any intention of ever really acquiring or selling stock, it would not amount to gambling unless they made out that the other parties with whom the broker dealt had precisely the same speculative view. This was not even alleged. Nay, it would not even be gambling if the other parties behind their broker had the same object as the defenders here alleged that they themselves had. To make out a contract by way of wager, the parties must come together for the purpose, and it must be entered into, both being in the full knowledge that a wager was intended. The elements of such a case did not exist here. For aught that was alleged, every transaction in the account might, as regards the other parties, have been a real bona fide transaction.*

transactions in the account sued for consist, without exception, of 'bearing' and 'bulling,' by which I mean selling stock that I had not to deliver, and buying stock that I did not mean to take up. I never, in the course of the transactions, either received or granted a transfer of stock. The whole transactions consist of time bargains, or contracts for differences. The pursuer was quite aware of the nature of the transactions, and he advised us in the matter. He knew that we had no stock to deliver."

John Thomson deposed, "Burn and I, before the commencement of the account, had bought on joint account, and deposited in the City of Glasgow Bank £10,000 worth of Caledonian stock. The pursuer was the broker in the purchase of that stock. I cannot say whether the said stock remained in the bank at the commencement of the account sued for. I depone, in reference to the account now in question, that it was incurred in consequence of Burn and I determining to 'bull' and 'bear.' We did not give the pursuer specific instructions as to the various transactions enumerated in the account. I was never asked to execute a transfer, or to pay the price of any stock during the course of the account. The pursuer was aware throughout that we merely intended to 'bull' and 'bear,' and that the transactions were not intended to be real or bona fide."

* In the course of the discussion, the following authorities were cited, in addition

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is an action by a stockbroker in Glasgow, against two parties, his employers, for the payment of an account incurred by them to him, in the purchase and sale of stock during the period embraced in the account. The account contains sums advanced on behoof of the defenders, and the broker's commission, and other charges. The employment is not disputed, in the proper sense of the term; nor is the accuracy of the account disputed, if the advocator is liable. I notice this particularly, because, on the record, the denials went far beyond the ground taken in this Court; but the defence to the action is this:—The transactions in which the pursuers were employed were gaming contracts under the 8 and 9 Vict., as well as by the common law of Scotland; and the pursuer, who was cognizant of, and aiding in, these transactions, is not entitled to bring action, either to recover advances or to claim commission upon the same. As for the rather comical alternative defence, viz., that if the transactions were not gaming contracts, and if the pursuer did really buy and sell for the defenders, no authority was given for any such obligations, as the employment was entirely to embark the parties in illegal gaming contracts, and hence that he cannot sue on any real contracts, for the purchase or sale of stock, as not employed for such transactions, it will be unnecessary to notice it, as it is not deserving of any attention, more especially as, after the facts are ascertained, it will be seen that the authority was direct to enter into the transactions in question, whatever was their character, and that the defender knew of all these, and homologated them.

Foulds v.
Thomson.

The reply to this defence was twofold:—1. That the stockbroking transactions were not contracts by way of gaming or wagering; and, 2. That, even if the transactions were of this character, the broker was entitled to demand to be relieved of all his advances, and to claim his commission. The Sheriff-depute (as I understand his interlocutor and note) holds, in regard to the first reply, that the transactions were gaming transactions, but, on the second, that the broker carrying them through is entitled to claim relief from advances, and ordinary remuneration for services as a broker. As I am very clearly of opinion that the transactions were not contracts or agreements by way of gaming or wagering, I intend to limit myself entirely to that part of the reply to the defence, and not to express the slightest indication of an opinion on the other point, which, in my view of the matter, does not arise at all in this case, and on which it would be highly inexpedient to state any opinion, as the point may arise in other cases which may be brought to that issue.

The first question is—What is the character of the enactment in the 8 and 9 Vict., c. 109, sect. 18, relied on by the defender; and what are the substantial requisites of the contracts or agreements therein declared to be null and void? The defender assumes that the enactment in this section of the statute, and the common law of Scotland on this subject, are identical, and that may be assumed without detriment to the pleas of either party. Now, on looking at the statute, it will be observed, that all its provisions are directed against gaming in the proper sense of the term, against common gaming-houses, of the character of which it shall be sufficient evidence, if the chances of any game played therein are not alike favourable to all the players.

Then it declares what shall be evidence that a place is a common gaming-house. Then it contains regulations as to public billiard rooms. Further, in the 17th section it declares that any person who, by cheating at play, or in betting on the sides or hands of them that do play, or wagering on the event of any game, shall win from any other person to himself or any others, any sums of money or valuable things, shall be deemed guilty of obtaining such money from such other person by false pretences, with intent to cheat or defraud such person of the same.

Every word in all the provisions up to the 18th section demonstrates, as the ordinary sense of the terms imports, that in the gaming, wagering, or betting, some person is engaged with the offender as the opposite party with whom the game is

Not one expression applies to any speculation or gambling carried on by any one party without concurrence or transaction with another, either as victim or as gaming, wagering, or betting on the other side. Two opposing parties are necessarily assumed in every one of the provisions.

Foulds v.
Thomson.

Then we come to the 18th section, the whole of which must be read and considered. The 19th section is also very important, especially the preamble. Even if the words of the 18th section were in any degree ambiguous, the other clauses in the statute show beyond dispute the true character of the things to which the 18th section applies. Contracts or agreements by way of gaming or wagering are necessarily contracts in which one party is opposed to another in the gaming or wagering—each party taking one side, and with an adversary taking the opposite side in gaming or wagering; so that, if such contract were not declared to be null, there would be money or other valuable thing won by one party and lost by the other, which might be recovered from the latter. There must thus be opposing interests in such contracts or agreements, in which one may lose by the gaming or wagering and the other win, just as in the other gaming, betting, or wagering, referred to in the other provisions in the statute. There is no other difference except that this section extends the enactment to more regular and businesslike transactions, in which the gaining or wagering between the different parties is made the subject of contract or agreement. It is absolutely necessary, therefore, to found the objection of nullity upon this enactment to make out in point of fact that there was gaming between two parties, whether by the parties to the contract, or by these parties gaming on the sides or hands of other parties playing against each other. So also as to contracts by way of wagering. A proper simple wager implies necessarily that there is a party taking the opposite side of the wager, or system of wagering, whether directly, or on the acts of others on whose play or gaming the wagers are made.

When this is once understood, the next step is to ascertain what are the actual facts established by the proof in this case. And it is the more necessary to collect and bring out these facts distinctly, because they have been entirely misapprehended by the Sheriff-depute in his interlocutor.

The two defenders were desirous to speculate, in joint adventure, in stocks. That two joined in this makes no difference in the case. They had the same interest—were to share in the gain or loss; but between themselves there was no gaming or wagering. I lay aside the fact that there was a joint adventurer with the advocate, and take the case as embracing simply his acts. The defender had shares in some stocks; but none of the transactions relate to any stock he held when this system began. He applies to the pursuer, as stockbroker, to assist him in his object. That object was sheer speculation, in which he hoped to gain by the rise of stocks bought, or by the fall of stocks sold. Gambling it was, most assuredly, in the popular sense of the term. But a party may gamble in speculations without either gaming or wagering. His course of speculation was this:—The broker was to sell for him so much stock, say in the Caledonian Railway, at such a price, which would, by the course of trade, have to be delivered to the purchaser at the end of a short period. That stock he had not at the time, but was bound to deliver. At the end of the period when bound to deliver, if the stock fell in value, the broker would have to buy for him, in order to fulfil the obligation to the purchaser, and at a gain by which the defender would profit to the extent of the difference between the price at which stock was sold, and the price at which it was bought, in order to fulfil the bargain. If the stock rose in value, the broker had still to buy to fulfil the contract of sale, and the loss—that is, the difference—fell on the defender. This was the real nature of the transactions carried on for the defender by the pursuer, as broker. In some instances the transactions of the fortnight might begin in the opposite course of buying stock, which was to be sold afterwards, in order to pay the purchase-money; and then, if the stock rose, it was sold out at profit, over and above the price to be paid to the seller. In the opposite case, the defender would lose to the extent of the difference; and often these sales or purchases were made in the hope thereby of affecting the market, in raising or lowering the prices of stock, in the way which might be for the defender's advantage. But in every one of all the transactions embraced in the account, the defender had to fulfil, through his broker, positive onerous transactions, by delivering or buying stock.

It is here that the facts have been entirely misapprehended by the Sheriff-depute. No. 180.

Now, in every one case, the pursuer, as the defender's broker, had to deliver the stock he sold, and to take and pay for the stock he bought. This point is well stated in the Sheriff-substitute's note. But, on the evidence, I should have thought the matter proved beyond the hazard of doubt. A great number of stockbrokers, with whom the pursuer carried on these transactions, are examined, and they all declare that the transactions were onerous sales and purchases, which the pursuer had to fulfil, and did implement—that is to say, he had to give stock when he sold, and to take stock when he bought, and to pay the price. It makes no kind of difference that the brokers, between themselves, will settle on the faith of another's tickets : * the real matter of fact remains, that stock was bought and paid for, and stock sold and delivered. Fictitious transactions there are none.

No doubt an arrangement may be made between two parties, or brokers for them, by which it may be agreed that, without any real transaction, and when neither party intends to hold any shares at all, or to buy and sell any, they shall go on, one party pretending to sell L.1000 of a particular stock one day, and the other to sell back again to the former two days after, and settling between themselves for the differences only at the end of the period agreed on ; and this will be a contract by way of wagering ; for transaction there will be none between such parties. They wager, in fact, on the transactions of others, by which the price of stock is regulated. A agrees that B shall be held to have L.1000 of stock on the 2d of June, and B agrees that on the 4th A shall be held to have a right to that stock. If the stock rises, the difference in price is due to A, and that difference is the only matter which passes between them ; and so they may go on gaming or wagering on the price of stock, as bought and sold by others, to an indefinite extent. This was the state of facts in the English case reported in Scott's Reports. But in the present case there was no such agreement with any one as to any one of the transactions carried through by the pursuer for the defender. It is not proved that any other broker, in any one case, agreed to such a wagering upon the price of stock, instead of entering into a real contract of purchase or sale. In each case stock was bought or sold ; the defender was bound to pay for the stock bought, and had to deliver stock when he sold, though the pursuer often had to buy at a loss, in order to deliver. True, the defender was not to hold and retain the stock. His object was, that the pursuer was to sell off, to keep him free of loss, and to endeavour to gain by speculating on the rise and fall of the prices ; and so it was pure gambling on the part of the defender, but gambling by the purchase and sale of stock for which he was onerously bound to other parties. Thus, in every essential particular, the elements are wanting to make this a contract by way of gaming or wagering. There is no contract or agreement with any other party, but an onerous contract of purchase or sale. That contract had to be implemented, in every case, by payment of price, or delivery of stock ; and in every instance it was implemented. The broker was to try to keep the defender clear, by so managing the purchases and sales as to make the sales more than meet the purchases ; but if not, then the onerous contract with other parties had to be fulfilled with loss. Hence arose the necessity for the broker's advances during this period of reckless speculation, and his claim for commission on these purchases and sales. In this state of facts, it is plain that the defender had not engaged in any contract or agreement by way of wagering or gaming ; and the transactions he carried on through the pursuer, reckless and discreditable as they were—as pure gambling,—all involved onerous sales and purchases, though his object was to sell all he bought, and not to hold or retain any stock at all.

* One of the witnesses, Mr Paul, stock-broker in Glasgow, gave the following account of these tickets :—" There is a form of ticket used in the Stock Exchange, which is passed from one broker to another, stating the amount of stock sold, the name of the broker selling, and the name of the broker buying, and the price. It also contains the name of the broker's constituent. These tickets sometimes pass by endorsement through half a dozen hands before it comes to a real purchaser who intends to take it up and pay for the stock. The giving back of this ticket to the selling broker, with the difference, discharges the purchasing broker's responsibility. The understanding on 'Change is such, that the selling broker is not entitled to refuse to take back the ticket."

The whole of these transactions were regularly reported, and stated to the defender at the end of each short period of settlement with others; and it is further proved, that he was frequently in the pursuer's office either giving him instructions, or receiving directions from him, as to whether the best chance of profit at the time was by making sales or purchases.

The defence against this action, then, wholly fails in the plea on which it is founded, and decree must be given for the pursuer.

I have taken, as the parties do, the words of the statute as the rule of law by which the legality of the transactions were to be determined. But I wish to say that there may be a question whether the statute referred to applies to Scotland; though I state no opinion on that point either way.

LORD MURRAY.—This party has stated as his defence the Statute 8 and 9 Vict., c. 109, which, it is said, made the common law of Scotland the statute law of England.

The question before us is, Is there anything like gaming or wagering in the transactions complained of? There is no difficulty as to the facts, for the defenders call the pursuer, than whom no one could be more capable of giving information, and I give full credit to his testimony, although others give a somewhat different account. In all gaming, one party wins and the other loses,—all cannot gain; but here so much stock is bought—it rises. A has sold, B has bought through, a broker. A may have sold at a higher price than he paid. B may in turn do likewise, in which case all might be gainers. This cannot be gaming. I am far from saying they are engaged in a laudable pursuit. But all the parties might equally lose. I cannot assimilate this to the nature of gaming or wagering, to constitute which there must be two parties, one of whom must lose.

I have been desirous to find the case of Sir James Craig, as to the delivery of wheat, which he did not possess, at a certain time and place. According to my recollection, that was held to be perfectly legal. Now that is the exact case before us. What he could do regarding wheat, I do not see why others should not do regarding railway stock. If such dealings were illegal, we should have to interfere largely in the ordinary course of business. The statute founded on I hold has no application to such transactions as those libelled.

LORD COWAN.—I concur in the views which your Lordships have expressed, and have very little to add.

The two Sheriffs agree in giving effect to the pursuer's claim; but they do so on different grounds, which it is necessary to discriminate. The interlocutor of the Sheriff-principal proceeds upon a view of the facts as established by the proof, in which I cannot agree. The findings contained in the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor give, in my opinion, the more correct view of the import of the proof. I hold it to be established, as found by that interlocutor, "that the defenders employed the pursuer, as their agent or broker, to make purchases and sales for them of railway stock during the period embraced in the account annexed to the summons;"—"that, in as far as the pursuer is concerned, and, for aught that appears, in as far as the third parties with whom the pursuer dealt were concerned, each transaction of sale or purchase was complete in itself, and was a real or bona fide transaction;"—"that the defenders employed the pursuer to enter into the successive transactions condescended on in the account, for the purpose of getting rid of the prior ones by payment of differences; and specific statements of each transaction, or particular series of transactions, were regularly furnished to the defenders;" and "that the pursuer did the work and made the advances for the defenders stated in said account."

The case, in this aspect of the facts, does not raise for decision the point of law disposed of by the Sheriff. It is not necessary to consider whether, had the transactions been of a different character, the situation of the broker could have been distinguished from that of the principal. The transactions which form the subject of the pursuer's claim must first be tainted with illegality or statutory nullity as between the principals to them, before any such question can be raised. Holding the true character of the transactions to be as found by the Sheriff-substitute, I have felt no difficulty in arriving at a clear opinion, that the claim of the pursuer is exposed to no good objection.

That the purchases and sales of railway stock, to effect which, as their broker, the defender and Burns employed the pursuer, were speculations on their part.

cannot affect the legality of the transactions. They were, nevertheless, real contracts. The third parties, with whom the pursuer as broker dealt, are not shewn to have been in concert with the defenders for the purpose of carrying through gambling transactions. It may be that no permanent investment of capital was contemplated by the defenders. As regards them and this broker, the account, from the system followed in these speculations, may have come in its results to be in substance nothing else than a statement of differences between the prices at which the successive purchases and sales of stock were effected. Still, so long as there was no previous concert or agreement merely for differences with the other parties to the several purchases and sales, there was nothing challengeable in what was done. A transaction of that description does not amount to a wager. The conclusive view for the pursuer, as stated by the Sheriff-substitute in his note, is, that though there was much speculation on the part of the defenders, there was no wagering, because it requires two parties to enter into a wager, and it has not been shown that either the pursuer or defenders arranged with any second party to go into such wagering, in regard to any of the transactions embraced by the account sued for.

Foulds v.
Thomson.

On the whole, therefore, I am of opinion that there is no principle in the common law that interferes with the right of the pursuer to make effectual his claim against the defender, arising as it does out of his legitimate employment as broker, in carrying through transactions in themselves not tainted with any illegality.

I may observe, that no doubt has been stated as to the Statute 8 & 9 Vict. being applicable to Scotland. I do not wish to express any opinion on the point. The case has been decided on the assumption that it is. But it is not a little remarkable that the Statute 16 and 17 Vict. c. 109, which declares that betting-houses are to be taken and deemed to be common gaming-houses within the 8 and 9 Vict., c. 109, is expressly declared not to extend to Scotland.

LORD WOOD.—The case of the defender Thomson is now substantially rested upon the Act of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, sect. 18, which, in the argument, has on both sides been assumed to apply to Scotland, and on that footing the question before the Court is to be disposed of.

It is maintained that the transactions—all and each of them—which the pursuer was employed as broker to manage and carry through, and out of which his claim against the defender arises, were purely gaming or wagering transactions, which are void and null in terms of the statute; and that, therefore, no action can lie at his instance against the defender, either for remuneration for work and services performed, or for money advanced by him in the course of his employment. I am of opinion that the defender has failed in establishing that, in the circumstances, the transactions in question are within the provisions of the statute; and if so, it will be unnecessary to consider whether, had the statute applied, there would in point of law have been a good defence to the action.

I agree with the Dean of Faculty, that taking the case in the most unfavourable view for the pursuer warranted by the proof adduced, and in the most favourable view for the defender, it is not instructed that the transactions entered in the account libelled were of the nature of contracts by way of gaming and wagering, and so struck at by the statute. I think that, upon the proof, the contrary is the result. Gambling transactions (but which is not a statutory term) they may be. That, however, does not render them gaming ones; for there may be gambling without gaming. In the popular sense, speculation is gambling without gaming or wagering in the statutory meaning of these terms.

Now let it be assumed that the defender and his associate Burn, the other defender (but who has now settled with the pursuer), had come to the pursuer and told him that they wished to enter into transactions of buying and selling stock for a rise or fall—that is, in the hope that they would be able to sell at higher prices than they bought, and to buy at lower prices than they sold, and thus benefit by the differences—that stocks were to be sold which they did not possess at the time, and that they had no intention of investing in, or holding the stocks to be purchased—that their transactions in selling and buying were to be managed accordingly; ~~shares~~ being to be purchased to fulfil the sales made, and parties or means to be ~~found~~ to take up the shares bought at the settling day; or the transactions to be ~~settled~~ over, as it is called, in the usual way, and settled as is customary between the brokers acting for the different parties who might come to be connected with them, as described by several of the witnesses adduced; while the dealings in the course of this traffic were—as between the pursuer and defenders—to be adjusted at fortnightly periods by the accounts being squared by debiting or crediting the defenders with the differences between the prices of the stock, according to whether they fell or rose, and also debiting the defenders with the pursuer's commission and other charges, and by the balance so brought out, for or against the defenders, being either paid or carried forward to account to the succeeding period. And let it be farther supposed that the pursuer undertook to act, and did act, as the broker of the defenders in the management of the business, the nature of which was so explained to him, and of which, therefore, he could not but be perfectly cognizant. And, finally, that the transactions were numerous, and extended over a period of more than a year.

Foulds v.

I am of opinion that in all this no defence would be found to the pursuer's claim. The transactions so carried on might, it is true, be merely speculative, and the defenders sheer speculators, and nothing better, having come into the share market solely as speculators for a rise or fall. But still how can such a state of facts (and nothing more adverse to the pursuer is disclosed by the proof) show that the transactions so carried on for them by the pursuer were contracts by way of gaming or wagering?

To wagering or gaming there must be two parties. The provisions of the statute are all framed on that footing. The parties must come together directly or through their brokers. In contracts within the statute there must be opposite parties, and there can be no innocent ignorant parties. If a party or his broker go to another party or his broker, and arrange or make a contract for the sale and purchase of shares, where neither party is to be bound to deliver or accept the shares, but where they are merely to pay the differences according to the rise or fall of the market, that would be gaming within the statute. But in the present case there is no evidence that any one of the contracts forming the transactions in the account libelled was a contract for payment of differences, and to be implemented by such payment. On the contrary, it appears that the transactions were with a great variety of brokers, acting for an equal variety of constituents, and as far as seen, every transaction was a real bona fide onerous purchase or sale from or to a party to whom a personal obligation was undertaken to fulfil the contract which he was entitled to enforce, and in which the responsibility of the pursuer as broker for the defenders did not terminate until the stocks bought or sold were either delivered or paid for.

Accordingly, taking the account libelled along with the evidence, it shews generally that shares of stock were bought and applied to the completion of the transaction when it was a sale, while again shares were sold to supply the means for the completion of the transaction when it was a purchase—the defenders being losers or gainers (and sometimes they were the latter) on each transaction respectively, as the case might be, and the settlement upon the whole of them during each fortnight resolving, if a loss, into the sum advanced by the pursuer for the defenders upon the fortnight's transactions, over and above the sum received by him on their accounting, so that it might no doubt come to this, that although the account with the pursuer is truly an account for stocks bought and sold, it by the course of dealing resulted,—as between the pursuer and defenders,—in the defenders having only to pay the differences, these differences constituting, with the pursuer's commission, under deduction of partial payments, the amount of the pursuer's demand. But then, as between the defenders, or the pursuer as their broker, and any other party, there is no evidence that the contracts were contracts for payment of differences only, and that implement on either side was to be by payment of the differences, as the prices might be at the settling day. Nor is there any evidence to prove that each transaction was not, as with the opposite broker, a real one for the purchase and payment, or the sale and delivery of the quantity of stock embraced by it, and which the pursuer, as the defenders' broker, was not bound so to fulfil; or that each transaction was not completed as a real bona fide transaction. If the witnesses are to be believed, the very reverse is proved, some of them speaking to transactions in the account libelled, had with themselves, and to the nature of which, and their implement as real transactions, they were consequently in a condition to depone explicitly and with certainty.

What is stated in regard to the delivery of tickets, and the intervention (it may be in many instances) of other parties, and the arrangements that might for convenience or otherwise be made between the opposite brokers themselves, cannot in the slightest degree affect the case.

No. 180.

Foulds v.
Thomson.

Take, as an example, any one instance of a sale of stock for a fall, but where there happened to be a rise of price, and stock is purchased to deliver in implement of the contract, the pursuer advancing the difference of price, and making any of the usual arrangements in such a case with the original purchaser's broker for the settlement of the transaction,—what would then follow at the settlement between the pursuer and defenders? Obviously, just a claim by the pursuer for the advance or difference, together with his commission for work done. The transaction on the part of the defenders would be truly speculative; but the contracts would not be the less real. It is clear law (and to hold the reverse would be against all mercantile convenience) that the validity of a contract, as a real contract for the sale of goods (and the same must equally hold in the sale of railway shares), cannot be impeached by the circumstance that at the time of the contract the vendor neither has the goods in his possession nor has entered into any contract to buy them, nor has any reasonable expectation of becoming possessed of them by the time appointed for delivering them, otherwise than by purchasing them after making the contract. And assuredly the validity of a contract for the purchase of goods, as a real contract, cannot be questioned on the ground of the buyer not having possessed at the time the means by which it was to be fulfilled. In either case there would be a good personal obligation by which implement could be enforced as between the contracting parties or their brokers, and the defenders could have no defence against the pursuer's claim for the amount of his advances and commission.

But if this would be true in any particular instance taken separately, it cannot alter the character of the transactions that there was a number of them, and that they went on for a considerable period. These things might be of importance in a question as to the pursuer's knowledge of the nature of the transactions, and the defenders' views in entering into them, and the way in which they intended them to be carried out; but their knowledge not being in question, but admitted, they are of no materiality. The transactions in the aggregate can in character be nothing else than that of the individual transactions composing it.

But, even although the proof had gone a step farther than I have assumed that it does (and which is beyond its actual amount), and granting that it had been established that behind each of the opposite brokers there had, in the transactions founded on, or most of them, been a gambling or speculating employer or principal, the defenders' position in resisting the pursuer's claim would not be improved, for the validity of the claim would not be thereby touched; seeing that still there would be no evidence to disprove the reality of the contracts entered into, or to instruct that they were by way of gaming or wagering. The contracts would nevertheless be real contracts, to be fulfilled by delivery of stock or payment of the price, which each party was bound so to fulfil, and which would be fulfilled as between the contracting parties or those in their right, within a limited time, although it might be that these parties were mere speculators for a rise or fall in the market, and intended that their transactions should be carried out upon that footing. But that such was the state of matters in all or any of the transactions in question is not proved. Giving the defenders the benefit of everything that may be doubtful on the proof, all the length the evidence goes—if, indeed, it can be held to go so far—is, that while the contracts might on their part be speculative contracts, and known to the pursuer to be so, they were nevertheless real onerous contracts for the sale and delivery, or the purchase and payment of stock, by which in each a personal obligation to one or other of these effects was undertaken, and which the defenders or their broker on the one hand, and the opposite party and his broker on the other, would be compelled to fulfil in terminis.

So standing the case, and it being established that the transactions in the account were entered into by the authority of the defender Thomson, or approved of by him, and that the fortnightly states, when rendered, were not objected to as inaccurate in any respect, I am of opinion that the pursuer is entitled to recover the balance claimed by him.

I have not thought it necessary to refer particularly to the cases which were cited on this branch of the case. I do not know if it can be said that in any of them the point raised is directly decided. But, so far as the authorities go, they are in favour of the pursuer. Certainly none against him have been quoted; and I can see no principle at common law, or ground of argument on the statute or otherwise, on which the plea of the defender can be supported.

I shall only add, that I abstain from intimating any opinion upon the other point relied on by the defender, viz., that if the contracts were null and void under the statute, the pursuer, as the broker in them, could not recover. It could only require consideration and decision if an opposite view were adopted of the leading one. In the view I take of the latter it is entirely superseded.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Advocate the cause (in so far as John Thomson is concerned): Recall the interlocutors complained of: (Here followed the findings quoted above, p. 809.) Find that the transactions carried on through the pursuers were not contracts or agreements by way of gaming or wagering, under the Act 8th and 9th of the Queen, c. 109, sect. 18, or by the common law of Scotland illegal as such: Therefore repel the defence, and decern against the defender, John Thomson, in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Find him liable in expenses both in this Court and in the Inferior Court."

in the statute as an appurtenance of the mansion-house suitable to the estate. I think that a dog-kennel for an establishment of this kind is as much part of the offices as a stable. Horses are for amusement and exercise, and so are dogs. I have more difficulty about the gamekeepers' houses, and I should like to hear your Lordships' opinions in regard to them. Having, in the case of the Duke of Athole, 3d July 1855, disallowed shooting lodges, as not falling under the Montgomery Act, I do not know that these gamekeepers' houses can fairly be held to fall within the statute. If it had been one house for a gamekeeper to take care of the dogs, I should have had no difficulty. But when you multiply them, and put them in various distant localities, and call them "offices," I have doubts. I place no weight on the fact which has been stated to us at the bar, that the petitioner possesses a right of forestry, and that these gamekeepers' houses are truly offices to enable the petitioner to exercise that right.

No. 181.

June 12, 1857.

Marquis of Huntly.

LORD DEAS.—The question comes to be very much whether a gamekeeper's house is an office. It would be odd to hold that a dog-kennel is an office, and that a house for a gamekeeper who is to go out with the dogs is not. But in this case the application is for watchers' houses, and I doubt whether we can grant them.

LORD IVORY.—I feel somewhat embarrassed, but I think that it is beneficial to allure parties to stay on their estates, by giving them all the accommodation which gentlemen resident in the country are entitled to have. In regard to the dog-kennels, I do not think it is of any consequence that they are not actually "attached to the mansion-house." The statute does not require that the offices shall be actually attached to the mansion-house, but merely that they shall come within the statutory meaning of offices "for the accommodation of the mansion-house." I also think that a gamekeeper's house is as much an "office" as a coachman's house, or other such offices necessary for amenity. But where an estate is so large that there are several dog-kennels and gamekeeper's houses necessary, I should not like to commit myself; but in this application the houses, although called gamekeeper's houses, are of the nature of houses for watching, and as such are not so much accessories to the mansion and offices as of the deer forest; and I am not prepared to say that the house of a watcher is an appurtenance of the mansion-house and its offices.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I think the dog-kennel is one of the offices of the mansion-house on such an estate just as much as a coachhouse or stable. The Act of Parliament deals with these improvements as suitable for a proprietor to have. They are a suitable source of recreation for persons in the position of the petitioner. My only difficulty relates to the gamekeeper's house. If there were only one gamekeeper on the estate who had charge of the dog-kennel, it is quite suitable that there should be a house for him among the "offices;" and if the question related to such an erection, I would be for allowing it. But these are outlying houses at distant parts of the forest, and far from the mansion-house; and the question is not whether they are suitable offices for a deer forest, but whether they are suitable offices for the mansion-house, for it is under that head that they are now claimed. If they had been claimed under another section as improvements on the estate,—but from the decisions, especially the cases of Athol and Grandtully, in which shooting lodges have been refused,—I should have been inclined to consider them favourably, if it is now established that the rental of shootings is to be estimated as part of the rental of the estate in determining provisions to younger children and otherwise; and offices erected with the view of rendering that rental effectual, would appear to me in principle to come under the provisions of the statute. But that is not the footing on which their expense is now claimed, and I am therefore unable to recognise the gamekeepers' houses as improvements falling under section 27 of the Montgomery Act.

II. Another point to which the attention of the Court was now directed, was, whether certain payments to labourers on the estate, for which there were no vouchers under the hands of the parties who received the money, were sufficiently instructed? The payments were entered in the overseer's book, and it appeared that that book was docketed from time to time as directed by the factor of the petitioner, in the regular course of his periodical audit of the overseer's books. The fact of expenditure to the amount claimed having been made, and of the sufficiency of the work performed,

No. 181. was farther authenticated by a man of skill, to whom the Lord Ordinary remitted, who had examined the work.¹ The Court continued the case, to allow farther evidence to be adduced. There were now produced depositions before a justice of the peace by the petitioner's factor, and also by an overseer of workmen, verifying the payments of weekly and monthly wages contained in the overseer's books. The Court declined to receive these as being of the nature of voluntary oaths; but the depositions having been afterwards sworn to before a commissioner appointed by the Court, they were admitted.

Writ—Vitiation—Presumption—Testament—Title to sue.—A testatrix, by a codicil to a previous settlement, revoked the destination of her heritable property, and of the residue of her estate, and made special bequests of certain lapsed legacies—thereby altering provisions as to the surviving legatees under the settlement. In the codicil thirty-one words, forming a complete clause,—a warrant of interment—were written on an erasure. They were interjected between two clauses of bequests which were complete, and afforded no clue to what had been erased. June 12, 1857. THE late Mrs Jane Austin or Doig died on 14th March 1849. At the opening of her repositories, her agent, a Mr Grant, produced a trust-settlement executed in April 1847, and a supplementary settlement or codicil dated 20th January 1849.

disposition of the said piece of ground, mansion-house, and others erected thereon, to the trustees named in the foregoing deed; and I now, instead of the destinations so revoked, do hereby give, grant, alienate and dispoⁿe the said piece of ground and mansion-house, and others erected thereon, all as particularly described in the foregoing deed, and here held as repeated for brevity's sake, to and in favour of Mrs Jessie Austin otherwise Watson, spouse of James Watson, in Edinburgh, manager of the Scottish Provident Institution for Life Insurance, and daughter of the late Hugh Austin, Esq. of Glasgow, who was my cousin-german, and to the said Jessie Austin's heirs and assignees: Further, my whole household furniture and others, destined on page sixth of the foregoing deed to the said Janet Gourlay Gillies, I do hereby specially convey, grant and assign to the foresaid Jessie Austin, and her heirs and assignees: Moreover, I now revoke and cancel specially the destination on said page sixth of the foregoing deed, of the residue of my whole means and estates, to and in favour of the said Janet Gourlay Gillies; and I appoint and direct my trustees, instead of that destination, to pay the said whole residue of my means and estates to the foresaid Jessie Austin, and her heirs and assignees, as soon as may be after my death: Farther, Martha Campbell and Mary Campbell, in Glasgow, having died since the foregoing deed was executed, I appoint the liferent of five hundred pounds, thereby directed to be paid to them equally, to be paid after the death of Miss Martha Maxwell, in Glasgow, the liferentrix, to Mary Maxwell and Graham Maxwell, her sisters, equally, and failing either of them, the whole to the survivor; and after the death of the survivor, the principal sum itself to be paid to the foresaid Jessie Austin, and her heirs and assignees: Moreover, I desire any notary-public to whom these presents may be presented, to give to the said Jessie Austin or her fore-saids, sasine of the lands and others above dispoⁿed: Further, I hereby provide that my personal apparel and trinkets, with my whole paraphernalia, directed on said page sixth to be divided between the foresaid Janet Gourlay Gillies and Misses Ann Peddie and Eliza Peddie, shall be divided between the two last named ladies only, equally, share and share alike: Lastly, in addition to the bequests in the foregoing deed, I bequeath to Mr William Forrest, surgeon in Stirling, my gold vinaigrette, and to his eldest son in life at my death, twenty pounds sterling, and to each of my servants, Janet Kemp and Margaret Kemp, ten pounds sterling: And I approve of and confirm the foregoing deed in all things therein contained, except in so far as now altered and added to.—In witness whereof."

The pursuers alleged that it was only on lately examining the principal deed upon record that they discovered that the passage printed above in italics was superinduced upon an erasure. No notice of this was taken in the testing clause, although a comparatively unimportant erasure of three words was mentioned in it. They pleaded;—1. That having a patrimonial interest in the means and estate of Mrs Austin or Doig, in virtue of the trust-disposition, they had a title and interest to reduce the codicil as invalid and ineffectual in law, because it was thereby attempted to diminish or take away the interest given to them by the trust-disposition. 2. The second plea had reference to an objection not insisted in, that all the proper parties had not been called as defenders. 3. The words in the codicil bearing to be a precept of sasine, being wholly written on an erasure, and no notice being taken of the fact in the testing clause, or other part of the deed, the presumption was that the erasure was made after the execution of the deed, and the deed was thereby rendered invalid, and liable to be reduced. 4. The clauses both preceding and following the part erased being complete in themselves, and it being impossible from the deed itself to ascertain what were the words for which the precept of sasine was substituted, the whole deed was thereby vitiated. 5. The codicil being set aside, the trust-disposition and settlement remained the only effectual deed regulating the succession to the means and estate of Mrs Doig.

Mrs Doig's trustees stated that they had paid away the whole estate under the trust, and were now entirely divested. That before they had done this, the pursuers were made aware of the erasure in the codicil, and of an opinion in regard to the erasure which had in consequence been obtained by the next of kin, yet they had not only failed to intimate any intention of challenging it, but they had accepted their various provisions both under the deed and the codicil.

The first plea in defence had reference to parties not having been called. The others were:—2. The erasure in the codicil was not in essentialibus and is not such as to affect the validity of the deed. 3. The parties having approbated, homologated, and adopted the codicil by taking under it, are barred from now challenging the same. 4. The pursuers having allowed the trustees to administer the whole estate, and to denude of the residue, upon the footing that the original deed and codicil together were to be taken as the settlement of the testator, cannot now be permitted to maintain the present action against the said trustees, at least to the effect of subjecting them in any liability.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor on 31st May 1855:—"Finds, that in the codicil sought to be reduced, being a codicil dated 20th January 1849, added to the will of Mrs Doig, dated 24th April 1847, there is an extensive erasure, on which thirty-one words of the codicil are written, and that this erasure is not mentioned in the testing clause, although a deletion of three words on the last page is mentioned: Finds that the pursuers, in respect of their rights and interests under the provisions of Mrs Doig's will in 1847, which is a complete deed, independent of the codicil in 1849, are entitled to pursue a reduction of the codicil on the grounds libelled, in as far as it affects their rights and interests, and that reduction of the codicil on the said grounds would not import a reduction of the will: Finds that the said erasure is not in essentialibus of the whole codicil, or of that part of the codicil affecting the rights and interests of the pursuers, and that it is not fatal to the codicil: Therefore sustains the second plea in law for the defenders, and assoilzies them from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds no expenses due to either party."*

* "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary entertains no doubt of the right of the pursuers to pursue a reduction of the codicil, and no doubt that the codicil, which was executed two years after the will, might be reduced without reducing the will, for the codicil is not necessary to the will, which is, without the codicil, a complete and independent deed. The pursuers, cannot, indeed, approbate and reprobate the settlement; but their plea is that the codicil is null and void, and not part of the settlement; and this plea they can only succeed in if the codicil was not subscribed. No subscribers on record; but as it was strongly suggested by the defenders, the Lord Ordinary has particularly adverted to it.

"The effect of the erasure is a question of considerable extent, and it is not clear how far the deletion is noticed. In so far as the deletion is noticed, the part written is not probative,—the part written is not required, and the deletion of the words is the character of the erasure. The pursuers shew what were the words erased, and the blank which they can suggest as having been there, or might, operate as a presumption of opinion that there is no authority in the deed pressed by the pursuers. Every not necessarily annul the deed, not even though the original words cannot be read. The extent of the erasure is an important element, but it cannot be said that every such erasure, to the extent of 30 or 40 words, necessarily annuls the whole deed. If there be fraud, actual or implied, the case is different; but in the absence of fraud, the nullity of the entire deed is not the inevitable penalty of an erasure, even though the original words cannot be read, and even though the erasure is of some extent. The erasure must be in essentialibus, and it is in so far as it is in essentialibus that it is followed by nullity. It may occur in regard to words essential to a legacy, and that legacy will be null and void; it may occur in regard to words essential to the nomination of an executor or a trustee, and that nomination will be null and void; it may occur in regard to words essential to the structure and import of the entire deed, and then the entire deed will be null and void. —Kemp v. Ferguson, 2d March 1802; M., 16, 949. Adam v. Drummond, 12th June 1810; Fac. Coll. Traquair v. Henderson, 26th June 1822; 1 Sh., 527. Strathmore v. Strathmore's Trustees, 1st February 1837; 15 S. and D., 449. Robertson v. Ogilvie's Trustees, 20th March 1844; 7 D., 236. Stair, b. 4, t. 42, sect. 19. Ersk., b. 3, t. 2, sect. 20. Bankton, b. 1, t. 1, sect. 34. Tait's Law of Evidence, p. 140. As Lord Stair says,—‘What points are in substantialibus must be esteemed from the nature of the writ’ (Stair, b. 4, t. 42, sect. 19.) As Lord Mackenzie says, in the Strathmore case,—‘The existence of an erasure on the face of a deed, though not noticed in the testing clause, does not of itself afford any proof or certainty of a vitiation after the deed was signed. It just comes to this, but it was quite possible that the alteration was made after the deed was signed. There may indeed have been no such vitiation; the erasure may have been made before signing; but as the very end and purpose of a probative writ is to produce legal certainty, that end is pro tanto defeated by every such erasure, so far as that it at least may have been made after signing, and the Court must then look to the effect of such erasure, in case it had been so made. That effect may be to annul the instrument in whole or in part, or it may be altogether immaterial. But in the case of simple erasure, apart from all suspicion of fraud, I know no case in which an erasure is allowed to produce total nullity, unless in its own nature it is such as, when taken along with the whole deed, amounted to a vitiation in substantialibus of the deed. The Court are obliged, therefore, to examine the nature of the erasures, and decide what is the effect of each and all of them. What, then, are the erasures which thus open the possibility of other words having stood there at the date of the signature of the deed? Are any of them such as thereby to infer the total or partial nullity of the deed? I have examined them with attention, and I have been unable to find any one which can annul any material part of the deed, and still less the whole of it. There is not one, I conceive, in substantialibus.’

“In considering to what extent the erasure in the codicil is in essentialibus, it is necessary to attend to the structure of the codicil. The testator, after narrating the disposition of the heritable property to Janet Gourlay Gillies, and her death, cancels that disposition and declares it void, and then gives, grants, and disposes the same to Mrs Watson. She then disposes of the household furniture, by giving it to Mrs Watson instead of Janet Gourlay Gillies. Then she revokes the destination of the annuity, and directs the same to be paid to Mrs Watson. Then she disposes of a sum of L.500 which had been left to Martha and Mary Campbell, who had died, and which sum she gives in liferent to Mary and Graham Maxwell, and the survivor, and thereafter to Mrs Watson. Then follows a precept of sasine, written on the erasure, and then again the bequests are resumed, the trinkets and clothes being bequeathed to the pursuer, and some trifling legacies to Mr W. Forrest and to the testator's servants. The clauses in which these several revocations and bequests are contained are distinct and separate. Each is introduced by the word ‘moreover,’ or ‘further,’ till closed by the clause of small bequests, which commences with ‘lastly.’ Between two clauses, each beginning with ‘further,’ and each containing separate bequests, this erasure occurs. The clauses which affect the rights of the pursuers are in a preceding part of the codicil, and are independent of the clauses of place in that part of the deed, which thus led to a suspicion of fraud, although they had been unable to allege it specifically. Their interest in the original settlement was a sufficient title to challenge any subsequent deed said to revoke or alter it.

They could not be met by the plea of approbate and reprobate, which applied only where the deed challenged was part of the settlement under which the parties claimed. The contention here was that the codicil was not part of the settlement, therefore success in the challenge would put an end to the sole ground on which the plea rested. The only question was, whether this deed was vitiated in essentialibus? The principle of the doctrine of erasure was that a deed written on an erasure was not authenticated by the subscription of the grantor:¹ That the testing clause did not cover words written on an erasure, unless they were specially noticed in it. But not only do words written on an erasure form no part of a deed; there is, farther, a presumption, juris et de jure,—unless there are means of rebutting it within the deed itself,—that the words were written after the subscription, and that there were originally other words in their place, which cannot now be ascertained or restored. An erasure in words of style, the deed in which it occurs may show to be of no consequence, and in such a case the deed will not be invalidated. On the other hand, where words are written on an erasure, in an important clause of the deed, e. g. the dispositive or bequeathing words of a will, the deed will not be held valid, there being no legal certainty that it expresses what the grantor intended. The question here was somewhat different. The erasure here was apparently of an entire clause. Had any part of it been written not on an erasure there might have been evidence that what originally followed was a direction to a notary to give sasine. But that not being so, the presumption was that what was written there originally was not what was written there now, and if it had formed only part of a clause, it must have affected the clause which preceded it.² The onus of get-which follow. Now, on a careful consideration of the structure and terms of this codicil, there are no grounds, necessary or reasonably probable, for presuming that the erased words were such as to annul the effect of the whole codicil. They may have been words of bequest, leaving an additional legacy; they may, perhaps, have been words of restriction or limitation of the immediately preceding legacy of £500; but there is no fair or rational presumption that they were words of recall or qualification of the revocation of the disposition, or the gift of the heritable property and the residue contained in the previous clauses. If it be settled, as the Lord Ordinary thinks it is, that a deed is not necessarily annulled in toto by every erasure, but that it may be null in whole or in part, according to the extent to which the erasure is in essentialibus, and if that extent is to be ascertained from the nature of the deed, then the mere number of the words erased is not per se conclusive, though it is an element in the consideration. If the clauses are distinct and independent, an erasure of a few words, is not fatal to other clauses where the erasure occurs is essential to the clause, and the clause is not indivisible in expression, so entirely a part of the whole that its totality must be fatal to it. There may be cases where the deed, that the nullity of the clause involved in the present case the deed is obviously divisible into words written on erasure nor the clause in which it occurs is essential to the whole codicil; and the nullity of the words immediately preceding and immediately following the words written on erasure.

"The pursuers do not seek, and have not, to have the whole of the codicil where the erasure occurs.

After much consideration, and not without some dissent of opinion that the grounds of reduction to the

ting rid of these presumptions, and demonstrating from what preceded and followed that the erasure could not be in essentialibus, lay on the party who founded on the erased deed. It was sufficient for the pursuers that there might have been such words as would have laid upon Miss Austin, now Mrs Watson, considerable burdens, or limitations, of the grant in her favour. The presumption of law was that there had been something material there to the advantage of the pursuers, and disadvantage of the parties now founding on the erasure.¹ It was quite true that in the case of a sasine, and certain other deeds, a vitiation in part did not vitiate the whole. But the effect of erasures in such deeds was quite different from that here, where words wholly immaterial were substituted for what in all probability had been very material. The erasure here was in the substance of the deed, where no ordinary words of style were to be expected. The pursuers were therefore entitled to judgment in their favour.

It was pleaded for the defenders;—The attempt of the pursuers was to approbate the settlement, and to reprobate the codicil as an improbate writ; but the trust-settlement and the codicil were in law one instrument. Now, the pursuers' argument was based on an opposite principle, for they contended that this erasure made the codicil improbate, while the original settlement stood. But the effect of erasure was not to render the whole deed improbate, unless it was in essentialibus, and it was not necessary to know what was in the original passage in order to determine whether it was in essentialibus. It was not said that the deed was not truly the deed of the granter, nor was fraud averred. The objection taken was purely legal and technical. The doctrine, as put by the pursuers, really amounted to this, that two lines and a half written on an erasure in any deed whatever was sufficient to vitiate the entire deed, because it was possible within that space to put in something very important. Where a deed became ineffectual from erasure, it did not do so because of improbativeness, but of a blank in the deed in that which it was important to have filled up. Hence it followed that where the deed was separable, and consisted of separate portions, each of which might be considered as a separate deed, erasure in one portion would not vitiate the whole deed, but only that particular part of it in which the erasure occurred. The present case was peculiarly favourable to the validity of the deed. Every part of it was completely independent of the superinduced clause. There was no occasion to speculate as to what had stood there originally, but if they did do so, the presumption was, that this blank contained originally another bequest. That would be in accordance with the nature of the deed, and the mere circumstance that that bequest was written on an erasure, and was therefore null, would not affect the validity of the other bequests.²

LORD PRESIDENT.—This case comes before us in the form of an action of reduction; and it is brought at the instance of certain beneficiaries under the settlement of Mrs Doig, against certain other beneficiaries under that settlement, and against the trustees who were appointed by her to carry her settlement into execution. The settlement consists of two writings made at different times: the first of these is a trust-deed made on 24th April 1847, and the other is a supplementary writing or codicil made at a later date—viz. on 20th January 1849—which was subjoined to the trust-deed, and was intended to make certain alterations upon it. The object of this action is to reduce that last-mentioned writing—to set it aside upon the ground that it has been vitiated and erased in an essential part. The erasure which is referred to is an erasure to this extent, that there are now superinduced upon it some thirty-one words, and these words so superinduced upon it form a

No. 182. complete clause of the nature of a warrant of infestment. It does not appear that the clause which had been there before had formed any part of the clause immediately preceding, or of the clause immediately following. They appear to be perfect in themselves; but this stands between them as an entire clause, and there is no notice taken of it in the testing clause of the deed, while there is notice taken of another and minor erasure that occurs in the course of the deed. The grounds of law on which the pursuers maintain this action are very distinctly and succinctly stated in their first, third, fourth, and fifth pleas in law. The Lord Ordinary entertains no doubt as to the right of the pursuers to bring a reduction of the codicil; and no doubt that the codicil, which was executed two years after the will, might be reduced without reducing the will, because the codicil is not necessary to prove the will, which is complete without the codicil. There is no allegation on this record of any fraud: there is nothing of that kind averred. The history of this deed, or any explanation of the erasure, we have not; nor is there any allegation as to the time when it was made. That is all left to what is said to be the presumptions and inferences of law. But it is stated that Mr Grant, a writer, produced it at a meeting after Mrs Doig's death, at which time it was erased; and that is all that is said about it.

June 12, 1857,
Peddie v.
Doig's
Trustees.

Now, in considering this case, it is proper to keep in view what is the relative position of the parties who are trying the question. It is not a question generally as to the validity of the settlement of the deceased. It is not a question of the testacy or intestacy of the deceased. It is an action pursued by parties whose title rests on the interest which they have under the settlement of Mrs Doig, by reason of certain bequests therein contained in their favour, and being legatees under the first deed, what they say is, that this second writing interferes materially with those interests, that it displaces them in some respects in favour of other parties, legatees or beneficiaries under the deed, and that in these circumstances they are entitled to have the deed set aside.

Now this is a peculiar kind of action. No case was stated to us precisely parallel to this, the case of one legatee pursuing an action for the purpose of setting aside the interest of another legatee, or other legatees, by reason of an erasure in a codicil, and from that erasure deducing the inference that the codicil must be regarded as altogether null; and, farther still, we heard but little argument upon this point, though, in my view, I scarcely think it is necessary to a decision of the case, whether, if this codicil is to be held as no part of the will of the testator, there is any will at all by the testator. The pursuers say that they are entitled to have the codicil set aside in toto. There is no allegation of any operation of the superinduced clause specially upon any bequest in their favour under the deed, and no application to have the codicil reduced partially. The proposal is to have the codicil reduced in toto, because of an erasure which they say is in essentialibus of the whole matter of the codicil. They say that in place of the words written upon the erasure, they are entitled to assume that there were words originally which were favourable to them, and which either neutralised or modified the other provisions of this codicil; and that at all events, as it is impossible now to know what the testator intended, so it is impossible to give effect to his will as originally expressed in the codicil; that is, to that part of the will which is expressed in the codicil, or to any portion of it as it now stands. They say that to give effect to the codicil as it now stands, would most probably be to give effect to something quite different from what the testator intended, and consequently, that it must be altogether set aside, and no effect whatever given to it. Now, I cannot adopt that proposition. I hold that what is written here, superinduced upon an erasure, is not authenticated; that, I think, is pretty clear. But I cannot go along with the pursuers, in the course of reasoning which they adopt, as to setting aside this codicil entirely. I think that to set it aside entirely, and to set up the will, would be most unquestionably not to give effect to the will of the testator. That is very clear. I do not think that the opposite is clear. But to set aside this codicil entirely, would be to deny effect to the will of the testator.

It is distinctly set forth, in the outset of the codicil, that the main object of the testator in making it was to alter the previous settlement, and to alter it in certain particulars, which are distinctly stated. The settlement had contained provisions especially in favour of a certain Miss Janet Gourlay Gillies. These provisions were generally of this nature, that Miss Gillies was to have the liferent of a certain house and grounds in the Castlehill of Stirling; that she was also to have certain other interests under this deed, and in particular, she was to have an annuity purchased for her with the residue of the estate, after fulfilling certain purposes, and she was to have the household furniture made over to her. The deed also contains certain provisions in favour of some ladies of the name of Campbell, giving them the fee of a certain sum of L.500, to which another lady, of the name of Maxwell, was to have the right. These three ladies, Miss Gourlay, and the two Misses Campbell, predeceased the testator. The object of her beneficence was thus defeated during her lifetime, and in these circumstances she proceeded to make this codicil,—to deal with the altered condition in which she was placed, and the interests that were thereby changed. And she begins the codicil by stating, that “whereas the piece of ground therein described.”—(See supra, p. 820.)

By the trust-deed the fee of the property had been appointed to be divided among the two pursuers and a lady of the name of Lowrie. The testatrix begins this codicil by saying that she cancels everything that had been done in favour of Miss Gillies, now deceased, and also the disposition of the ground and mansion-house to the trustees; “and I now,” she says, “instead of the destinations so revoked, do hereby give, grant, alienate,” and so forth. That is a complete revocation of the former conveyance of the house, and a complete granting of these subjects in favour of Mrs Jessie Austin or Watson,—of the fee as well as of the liferent interest.

She then proceeds to deal with the furniture, which had been given to Miss Gillies, and directs that it also shall be given to Miss Austin. Then she proceeds to deal with the residue of her estate, which was to be vested in the purchase of an annuity for Miss Gillies, and she gives that also to Miss Austin. Then she proceeds to deal with the sum, the fee of which had been given to the Campbells; and, in respect of their death, disposes of what had originally been destined to them.

Now, these are all complete clauses, as the pursuers themselves say. They deal with part of the subjects clearly and explicitly in favour of certain parties who are to be favoured by the testatrix—avowedly altering her former settlement and giving the benefit to these parties.

The only other legible provision here is in regard to the trinkets, which had formerly been appointed to be divided between Miss Gourlay and the two pursuers. They are now ordered to be divided among the two pursuers themselves. Each of these clauses is complete. They are benefits given to other beneficiaries under the deed, and under this particular portion of the deed; and the contention on the part of the pursuers is, that this deed shall be set aside, so as to annul all these things which are plainly and distinctly set forth in it, as much as anything in the original deed, on the ground of this erasure, and the assumption that the erasure contained something which was contrary to and inconsistent with those complete bequests that are contained in the previous part of the deed. I do not know of any principle for holding that, if there is an erasure in any part of a deed, it is to be presumed that what was originally in that part of the deed destroyed or annulled what was contained in the rest of the deed. The erasure may destroy that portion of the deed in which it occurs. But it would be a novelty to hold that an erasure in this part of the deed should destroy what is clearly and distinctly given as bequests in another portion of it. We have many cases in which an erasure in part of a deed destroys that member or part of the deed, and in which such an erasure destroys a bequest contained in it. But that a party—a legatee under another part of the deed—should set up this theory in order to destroy the material interests of other legatees, which interests are clearly and distinctly expressed, is a principle for which I know of no authority. In all of these matters there was some interest in the present pursuers under the former deed—that is to say, there was a provision in the previous deed that all lapsed legacies should fall to be divided among certain legatees, among whom the pursuers were included, and if the testator had not dealt with these lapsed legacies, the pursuers would have got the benefit. But there was nothing to prevent this lady from dealing with them. It was natural that she should do so, and having dealt with them clearly and distinctly, I see no reason to presume that she then undid it all in these thirty-one words, or in the space which these now fill. The principle is fixed that an erasure in one legacy does not destroy all other bequests in the deed; and unless it is evident that something has been erased from the deed, which can be shewn, not as mere presumption, but very clearly and conclusively, to be beneficial to these parties and against the other legatees, for that is the point here, I cannot give effect to the theory contended for by the pursuers. Upon this ground, I am of opinion that on this question of erasure in substantialibus, in so far as the present pursuers are entitled to plead it—that is, so far as it affects their interests, there is no erasure in substantialibus,—that is, to the effect of annulling this deed in toto. I am therefore for repelling the reasons of reduction. But I abstain altogether from giving any opinion upon the point, whether a reduction of the codicil would import a reduction of the will? The Lord Ordinary finds that a reduction of the codicil would not import a reduction of the will. I do not say whether, if I set aside this codicil, I could sustain the deed at all. That is a very grave question, and upon which I would require more argument before deciding it. The principle upon which the pursuers plead this case—that an erasure in one part of a deed is a destruction of the whole—would, if legitimately followed out, lead to the conclusion that the whole settlement must be set aside; because the principle is, that you have not got at the will and the intention of the testator. Now, we may not have got at the will and intention of the testator in the whole of this deed. When that objection is pleaded, it relates to the whole settlement. That objection, therefore, is that we have not here got at this lady's will and intention as to the final disposal or settlement of her affairs. But that will not do for the present pursuers, because they say,—You have got at the will and intention of the testatrix in the first deed in 1847, and you are to disregard all that is legible and intelligible in the document explaining her will and intention in 1849, and to revert to that which appears to me to have been plainly, not the will and intention of the lady in 1849, but the reverse. It would require a great deal more argument before I could hold that, setting aside the codicil in toto on the ground of substantial erasure, we could leave the settlement standing. But it is not necessary to settle that point. We are under another class of cases, where various bequests stand free from erasure, and where the erasure does not interfere with these bequests. These legatees, then, even if they are entitled to plead their own interest in the case as against the other legatees, have not, in my opinion, made out a case which would oblige us to set aside the bequests in their favour contained in the other clauses of the deed.

LORD IVORY.—I come to the same conclusion. I do not say that in this case there are not considerable niceties involved in some views of the questions which have been raised; but dealing with the whole deed, studying it with the best consideration that I can give to it, and comparing one thing with another, with regard to the question that has been raised here, I am quite satisfied on the grounds stated by your Lordship, and concurring substantially though not entirely with the particular dicta of the Lord Ordinary and with the legal grounds on which he rested his decision, I am satisfied that his interlocutor must be adhered to—not in terms, but substantially.

With regard to the grounds of the reduction, I do not think that we are called upon here to impugn anything connected with the general doctrine that erasure and vitiation in essentialibus operates in law a nullity of the matter in which such vitiation occurs. But then it must not be overlooked—and it has not been overlooked—that neither in the decisions of the Court nor in the dicta of any of our writers, is it made a necessary consequence that an erasure shall operate the nullity of the entire deed in which it occurs. There is a principle of exception which is introduced, and which rests on substantial reason and sound sense, that wherever the matter in which the vitiation occurs is matter separable, and truly in the deed itself separated, from the other portions of the context, that the erasure affects only that part, and does not of necessity disturb the other complete and untouched portions of the deed. The case of legacies, and the case of nomination of executors, and various other cases, might be given as illustrations of this. In a deed of legacy, one legacy may be wholly erased, and ingenuity might perhaps fill up the blank with words which might affect the other portions of the deed. But it is decided that the legacy in which the vitiation occurs is the only one that suffers; and in ordinary circumstances, unless there is reason to connect it with the other portions of the deed, it will not affect them. Here it is an entire clause that is destroyed. But where so much of a clause is left as enables you to see what it was to which it originally had reference, there again you cannot fill up and give effect to that which is partially erased, yet you take what is left as a guide in dealing with the effect the erasure is to have on other portions of the deed; and if you see evidence of an intention to separate the matter in that part of the deed from the other parts of the context, you hold that member of the deed only to be affected by the erasure.

June 12, 1857.
Peddie v.
Doig's
Trustees.

Perhaps a better illustration of this doctrine could not be given than by referring to two very important cases in this class of questions—the case of Grant and Shephard, and the case of Boswell of Auchinleck's entail. In the case of Grant and Shephard, there was an erasure in the first member of the destination of the deed of entail; the first member of the destination being destroyed, nobody could say when the other parties called under the destination were to come in. That operated on the whole series of substitutes, for you could not tell who was the first substitute, nor when the others were to come in, nor whether they were to come in to the exclusion of a certain family altogether. Yet in that case, while the destination was cut down, the deed, as a conveyance of property, was not struck down. It was sustained as a conveyance to the institute, which was saved in toto, whilst the particular matter affected by the erasure was held as null.

So in the case of Boswell; there the prohibition to sell was a prohibition to sell either irredeemably or under reversion; but the letters “ir” of the first word were written on an erasure. It was the prohibition to sell alone that was struck out of the deed. The effect of this was to give a fee-simple title instead of an entail title, which had been the intention, just shewing, that, wherever you can separate the matter which the erasure touches from the other matters in the deed, you leave as far as you can the will of the granter, and do not commit a greater departure from his will by destroying everything he has done, but limit the effect of the vitiation to that particular portion of the deed of which you can make no better.

Now the summons here seeks to set aside the whole of this codicil. Every tittle of it is to go because of this erasure, which is said to be in essentialibus of the entire codicil. For it is said that we do not know what may have been there. There may have been inserted a trust or a burden, or the clause may in some other way have neutralised, and perhaps given a different turn to the matters which are left. Now I would ask, on the principle of separability to which I have been referring, whether you could hold that the additional bequest contained in the deed after that blank—“Lastly, I bequeath to Mr William Forrest,” &c.—shall be annulled, because in the previous part of the deed there is a vitiation? It is perfectly clear, from the form and structure of the deed, that these are additional legacies, which are not to be affected by what goes before. And so as to the rest. Could the other legatees have brought a reduction of this bequest of apparel, because in another and wholly separate portion of the deed there occurred a blank or vitiation? It seems to me impossible to maintain that. Then before the erasure there is a bequest of L.500. Could it be maintained that this was to be affected by the erasure?

These are all illustrations of the general rule of law in dealing with vitiations—that it is not a necessary consequence of a vitiation, let it be ever so essential in the particular matters in which it occurs—that it is not a necessary consequence that its essentiality in that matter shall go to the destruction of the entire deed. You shall separate it from the rest of the deed, and give effect to the deed as far as you can, for the rest of the deed stands on the will of the testator. The presumption of law is that vitiation takes place after the execution of the deed—after the mind of the testator has received full effect by the execution of the deed, and you are not to disturb the will of the testator, if you can separate it from the vitiation in the way I have alluded to.

Certainly, if there was any room to suspect that there had been any fraud committed, by tampering with the deed, by the party who is founding on it, there is a weightier construction and a weightier effect given to a vitiation in such a case in fraudem corruptoris. But that is a different principle altogether, which does not occur here. There is nothing said here that touches the character of the parties: no fraud is imputed. The document seems to have been in the hands of the

No. 162. testatrix, not out of her repositories ; and therefore we have nothing but the simple fact, as it stands, that there is a vitiation in a particular portion of it.

June 12, 1857. It may be very true, as was argued by the pursuers, that in some cases where Doig's the deed has not been fairly dealt with, it has been sometimes said (and some-order to give effect to an erasure as an essential erasure, the party should be allowed to supply the words which he says might have filled it up. But, when he is going to supply words for filling up the vitiation to such an effect as this, he must supply them reasonably. There must be some rational ground to suppose that the words suggested were what the testator intended. You must not take arbitrary and capricious possibilities : you are not to make wild and fanciful constructions, and insert in strange and extraordinary places what no mortal ever could have dreamt of putting in there. You must have something to support that particular ground of argument before that can be attempted. Now, with regard to what is proposed to be inserted

The other supposition was that it might be a burden declared upon Mrs Austin. June 12, 1857.
That is liable to the same difficulties with the rest, and I do not now go into them. Peddie v.

here—in the former deed was recalled to the effect of taking the property from the trustees, and thereby destroying the power of selling it and of dividing it. If this was to be a burden, the Misses Peddie could only take by force of the words which now stand erased, because they could never go back upon the price of the subjects, the trust being put an end to, and a new disposition given. They must stand on the words which affect the new trust, and then they meet with this legal effect of the operation of erasure, that they are not certain what was there, and so cannot found on it. They cannot guess at it to the effect of giving them a bequest which was not given under the original deed, and which cannot be operated under the original deed, if the original deed is recalled, as I think it must be recalled with regard to this house. There, again, the matter ends. It is not necessary to go more into detail in reference to other points. I rest content on the general principle of the case as I have stated it.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—The summons concludes for a total reduction of a codicil executed on 20th January 1849, by the late Mrs Doig, altering to some extent a trust-settlement which she had executed on 24th April 1847. The parties at whose instance this action is sued are not the heir or other legal representatives of the testator, but only two legatees named in the original deed of settlement. The only ground of reduction which they plead in support of the challenge is, that there is an erasure in substantialibus in the codicil. And the only title and interest which they set forth for insisting in this challenge is, as stated in their first plea in law, that by the codicil a provision which was made in their favour by the original settlement is diminished or taken away.

That provision consisted of these four things:—1. Two third parts of the price of the fee of certain heritable subjects called Snowdown, of which the liferent was provided to Janet Gourlay Gillies, and which was directed to be sold after her death by the trustees named in the settlement, in order that its price might be divided among the two pursuers and a Miss Lowrie; 2. A sum of L.1000 to each of the two pursuers, the interest of which was to be payable to them respectively until their marriages, when the principal was directed to be paid to them; 3. Two fourth parts of the testatrix's personal apparel, trinkets, and paraphernalia, which were directed to be divided among the two pursuers, and Misses Gillies and Lowrie above mentioned; and, 4. Two fifth parts of whatever other legacies might lapse by the legatees predeceasing the testatrix or the terms of payment, and the subjects of which lapsed legacies were directed to be divided among the two pursuers and the other three parties therein mentioned. Before the date of the codicil under challenge this last part of the provision to the pursuers had become valuable, in as much as there had lapsed, by the death of the legatees, not only a legacy of the fee of L.500 to the two Misses Campbell, but also a legacy of household furniture, and of all the residue to Miss Gillies. Of course, each and all the parts of the provision thus made in favour of the pursuers by the original settlement was revocable or alterable by the testatrix at her pleasure.

In the exercise of this power, accordingly, the testatrix, on 20th January 1849, after the death of the above mentioned legatees, executed the codicil now in question. It thence appears that by that time the defender Mrs Watson had risen into favour with the testatrix, and that her favour for the pursuer had abated, because, on the one hand, she conferred upon the former, not only the property called Snowdown, both in liferent and fee, and the fee of the lapsed bequest of L.500 before mentioned, but also the lapsed legacies of the household furniture and of all the residue; and, on the other hand, she thereby revoked the provisions in favour of the pursuers of two thirds of the price of the fee of Snowdown. She also, by providing to Mrs Watson the lapsed legacies above mentioned, of the fee of the L.500, of the furniture, and of all the residue, deprived the pursuers of the shares thereof which would otherways have fallen to them under the ultimate bequest to them before mentioned of such lapsed legacies. But, while she thus

No. 182. seriously lessened the original provisions she had made in favour of the pursuers, she left the legacy of L.1000 to each of them unaltered, and increased her bequest to them of her paraphernalia from two fourths or one-half to the whole thereof.

June 12, 1857. Peddie v. Doig's Trustees.

Several lines in this codicil have been erased, and in place of the erased words there is now written a precept of sasine,—and not only is that operation not authenticated by the testing clause, although a deletion of three words in a subsequent part of the writing is so authenticated, but that superinduced precept, besides being inserted out of place, according to the usual practice, is quite inappropriate in a conveyance of burgage property.

The pursuers, availing themselves of this erasure, now attempt to get the better of the alterations thus made by the testatrix on her provisions to them in the original settlement; and for this purpose they by this action conclude that, in respect of the erasure in one part of the codicil, it shall be reduced and annulled in toto.

According to my view of this question, it is not necessary to inquire whether or not, if this challenge had been at the instance of the legal representatives of the testatrix, the erasure would be held to be in substantialibus, because even although that should be assumed in favour of the pursuers, I do not think that they would have a sufficient legal title to insist in this challenge, in respect that that erasure does not occur in any of those parts of the writing in which their provisions are dealt with, and that all these parts of that writing are perfectly entire. The testatrix unquestionably had power to alter the testamentary provisions she inserted in her original settlement in favour of the pursuers. She exercised that power by making alterations of these provisions in the codicil, and the clauses of the codicil containing these alterations being entirely free from vitiation or blemish, the pursuers must take the testamentary provisions as so altered, and they have no right or title to challenge these alterations. Still less have they right or title to challenge the other provisions in this codicil.

They endeavour to support their challenge upon these two grounds; 1st, that the erasure renders the whole of the codicil improbativ, and as null and void as if it had not been authenticated with the legal solemnities, and consequently, that the provisions in the original settlement remain as entire and effectual as if this codicil had never been adjoined; and, 2d, that at all events the erasure is in substantialibus, as it is impossible, on the face of the writing itself, to ascertain what the erased text has been; and that, in such a case, the law presumes it may have consisted of some clause which, in existing circumstances, might have evacuated the writing, and consequently no effect can be given it. But I do not think that either of these grounds of challenge can be maintained by the pursuers.

In the first place, the legal effect of this erasure is different from what that of a want of due authentication would have been. In the latter case the writing never would have had any validity or effect as the deed of the testator. But the legal presumption being that the erasure has been made since the writing was executed, the law holds it to have been valid and effectual, and the deed of the testator, at the time it was granted. Hence all the provisions originally contained in it, including the modifications it made on the original deed, were valid and effectual, when it received the subscription of the testatrix, and was duly authenticated. And if it has since been rendered ineffectual by an ex post facto and unauthorised vitiation, this results not from any original or radical defect in the instrument, but in consequence of the intention which it originally embodied and expressed having been subsequently rendered uncertain and undiscoverable. And accordingly any party who is interested in restoring the deed, and has not been participant in the culpable vitiating of it, might obtain its restoration by an action of proving the tenor of the destroyed text, if he could prove both the tenor thereof, by sufficient admissions and other evidence, and the causa amissionis, or how the vitiation was made without the authority of the granter.

And, in the next place, assuming that the proper effect of the erasure, even supposing it to be in substantialibus, is to render uncertain what the erased text has been, and what effect it may possibly have had on the other parts of the settlement, this is an objection which, however available it might be to the legal representative of the testatrix, cannot be pleaded by one legatee against another, because it may be retorted upon the challenger himself. Thus in the present case, while the pursuers maintain that the erased part of the text may be presumed to have consisted of some clause, whereby the provisions in favour of the defender Mrs Watson of the property called Snowdown, the fee of the legacy of L.500, and the furniture, and the ultimate legacy of the residue, may have been qualified with a clause declaring the whole of these provisions were a trust for behoof of the pursuers. Mrs Watson, on the other hand, may maintain, with equal probability, that that erased part of the text may be presumed to have consisted of an extension of the revocation contained in the preceding context of valuable portions of the original provision made to the pursuers, so as to include also that part of that provision which consisted of the sum of L.1000 to each of them. Whether or not the legal representatives of the testatrix might maintain such presumptions against both of these parties and the other legatees, is a question on which I abstain from stating any opinion, as it is not at present before us. But I am of opinion that neither of these legatees can challenge the provisions of the other on a ground which is equally applicable to the title of the challenger as to that of the party whose right is challenged. Such a challenge is in a similar predicament to that of a reduction of an act of contravention of the conditions of an entail, in cases where, although the deed of entail provides that a contravener shall forfeit not only for himself, but also for his descendants, the challenger is a descendant of the contravener; and as in such a case the challenger is not allowed to urge a plea which is fatal to his own title, so in the present case the pursuers cannot be allowed to do what would practically be the same thing.

LORD DEAS.—Where an objection is taken on the ground of erasure, it is always necessary to keep in view the nature of the deed or writing in which the erasure occurs, and the relative position of the party pleading the objection. An erasure may be fatal in one sort of deed which would not be fatal in another sort of deed:—just as it may be fatal if it occurs in one part of a deed although it would not be fatal in another part of it. Here the erasure occurs in the codicil to a deed of settlement or will, and the codicil, although of a different date from the settlement, commences on the same sheet of paper on which the settlement terminates, and bears reference to “the foregoing deed.” The parties challenging the codicil are two of the legatees or beneficiaries under the original deed, and their interest to maintain the challenge is, that the eventual share, provided to them by the original deed, of legacies which might lapse, has been circumscribed by the codicil, and that the share provided to them of the price of an heritable subject called Snowdown, which was appointed to be sold, had been taken away,—leaving, however, unrevoked their special legacies of L.1000 each, and their share of the wearing apparel and paraphernalia of the deceased. Beyond what has been now stated, they do not pretend to any interest in the settlements of the testatrix. They are not her next of kin or heirs-at-law. On the contrary, this character belongs to the defender Mrs Watson and her sisters.

Now, in order to determine whether the erasure in the codicil is to be deemed in substantialibus as in a question with these pursuers, it is necessary to consider whether it can reasonably or legally be presumed that something may have originally stood where the erasure now is, by which the revocation made to their prejudice, in the preceding part of the codicil, might have been neutralized or qualified? For, unless there be room for such presumption, it is difficult to see how they can have either title or interest to plead the erasure; or, in other words, how the erasure can be held to be in substantialibus of those parts of the codicil in which, alone, they are interested. To make my meaning clear:—Suppose that the codicil, after expressly revoking all bequests in favour of the original legatees, including the pursuers, had gone on to say that, in lieu thereof, the granter bequeathed the following legacies, — enumerating them, — to certain other persons named, and that, in enumerating the substituted legacies, there had occurred an erasure of the amount of one of them, — it is clear enough, I presume, that, although this would have been an erasure in substantialibus of that particular legacy, it would not have been an erasure in substantialibus of the whole codicil, nor revocable by an original legatee: the reason being that it was neither reasonably or legally presumable that any thing had been written, where the vitiated words and letters now stood, affecting the revocation in which alone such legatee was interested. So, I think, it is here, although less clearly than in the case supposed. The bequest of a share of the price of the subjects called Snowdown, and the relative conveyance of these subjects to trustees, are clearly and unequivocally revoked by the codicil; and, in place thereof, the subjects themselves are out and out disposed to the defender Mrs Watson, and her heirs and assignees. As regards the residue, the question whether the pursuers had any interest in it under the original deed depends on a question far from clear,—whether under the denomination of lapsed legacies the testatrix meant to include the residue which was thereby appropriated to buy an annuity for Mrs Gillies, who predeceased her? But, assuming the residue to have been so included, it will be observed that the codicil contains just as express a revocation of the destination of the residue, and as express a conveyance of the whole of it to the defender Mrs Watson, her heirs and assignees, as occur in regard to the subjects called Snowdown. And this is followed by an equally express destination to the defender Mrs Watson of the fee of the L.500 liferented by certain parties named; and the codicil, down to the close of this last mentioned clause, is all written plainly and correctly, without vitiation or erasure. Then comes the erased portion of the codicil,—forming, apparently, not a part of a clause, but a whole clause,—a peculiarity, in this case, which might have been very formidable, had the objection been by the heirs-at-law of the testatrix, having an interest to plead it, but which is really of no moment in this case, unless it can be reasonably held, or is legally presumable, that something may have been written there which negatived or qualified the previous revocation of the pursuers' interest in the subjects called Snowdown, and in the legacies which might lapse by the predecease of legatees. But, in order to presume this, we must suppose that the testatrix, after expressly revoking these particular bequests in favour of the pursuers, and just as expressly bestowing the subject-matter of them, out and out, on the defender Mrs Watson, her heirs and assignees, and after disposing of the L.500, also by giving the fee of it to Mrs Watson, her heirs and assignees, had proceeded to say something, which negatived or qualified what went before, in a manner favourable for the pursuers;—in other words, had made the deed inconsistent with itself, and undone, by one part of it, what she had expressly done by another,—a supposition, I think, the accuracy of which is here neither reasonably nor legally presumable. I am, therefore, of opinion that this erasure cannot be held in substantialibus, as in a question with these pursuers, or to affect any part of the codicil in which they are interested.

I give this opinion on the footing, which I understand to have been the condition of the argument, that no fraud is alleged. The pursuers expressly state (cond. art. 11) that “the erasure in the codicil had been made by Grant himself,” the writer of the deed; but they do not say he made it without authority, or after the deceased's death. It is not pretended that the deed is in any different state now from what it was when produced and read by Grant on the day of the funeral, or found in the house of the testatrix, where one of the pursuers was resident at the time of her death. Which of these two last mentioned things occurred—that is to say, whether the deed had been in Grant's custody, or in the deceased's repositories—is not explained. But, in any view, the question falls to be dealt with as one not of fraudulent vitiation, but of legal objection; and so it has been pleaded to us accordingly.

The view now taken renders it unnecessary to consider the larger and more important question to which your Lordship has alluded, whether, assuming the vitiation here to have been in substantialibus of and consequently sufficient to annul the codicil, the result would have been to leave us uninformed of the last will of the testatrix, and so to deprive the pursuers of all interest to plead an objection which would have struck at the original will, as well as the codicil,—a question which would have required very grave consideration, and upon which I offer no opinion.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—“Recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor reclaimed against; repel the reasons of reduction; assoilzie the defenders from the whole conclusions of the action and decern: Find the pursuers liable to the defenders in the expenses of process incurred by them; allow an account thereof to be given,” &c.

Ewing v.
Ewing's
Trustees.

Testament—Clause—Legacy—Succession.—A truster destined an heritable estate to his widow in liferent, and B in fee, in the event of his leaving no lawful issue. In the event of his leaving issue, he directed his trustees to pay to A, B, C, and D, "L.20,000 each, but said sum is only to be payable to the said B in the event of his not succeeding to the estate." In the next article of the trust-deed he directed, if he left no children, that his "trustees shall pay the haill legacies, &c., before enumerated, with the exception of the foresaid legacies to A, C, and D, which are hereby recalled, and my trustees shall, in lieu of such legacies, pay to them respectively, &c.—and my trustees shall also pay to the said B the interest of L.40,000, till such time as he shall succeed to the estate." The truster having died, leaving a widow, but no children,—Held, (aff. judgment of Lord Neaves), that B had, in the sense of the deed, succeeded to the estate, and was not entitled to the legacy of L.20,000.

THE late Mr Ewing of Levenside died on 29th November 1853, leaving a widow, but no children. He never had any issue. By trust-disposition and settlement, dated 9th September 1844, he conveyed to trustees—the defenders—his whole estate, real and personal, with power to sell and dispose of the same, but excepting from the powers of sale "the estate of Levenside, and any lands which I may acquire as an addition thereto, and the furniture and others in the mansion-house of Levenside." These he directed his trustees, under the third purpose of his settlement, to convey in favour of his wife, in liferent, but so long as she should continue his widow allenerly, "and of the heirs-male of his body, and his heirs and assignees whomsoever; whom failing, the heir-female of his body, and her heirs and assignees whomsoever; whom failing," to the pursuer, and the heirs-male, &c. in fee. In the event of there being an heir-male of the testator's body, and of his attaining majority, the liferent in favour of Mrs Ewing was to cease, and such heir to be entitled to assume possession of said estate, Mrs Ewing being secured in an annuity in lieu of the liferent. By the fourth head of the settlement, the testator directed, that in the event of the succession opening to the pursuer, the trustees should burden him and his foresaids, and the estate, with payment, for the purposes of the trust, of L.40,000, as a condition of their granting the conveyance, "such sum to be payable by the said Humphrey Ewing Crum, and his foresaids, to my said trustees, and their foresaids, within two years after he or they shall succeed to the said estate, with interest from his term of entry, and thereafter till said," the value of the moveable subjects within Levenside House and offices "eventually to be conveyed to him as aforesaid," "and that within six months after he and his foresaids shall succeed to the same." By the fifth article of the deed, the truster directed that the trustees should, in the event of my leaving a lawful child or children, pay the following legacies and annuities, and any other legacies, &c. viz.:—to the said John Crum, Humphrey Ewing Crum" (the pursuer), "Walter Crum, and James Crum, all children of Jean Ewing or Crum, my sister, and to their respective heirs and assignees, the sum of L.20,000 each; but said sum is only to be payable to the said Humphrey Ewing Crum in the event of his not succeeding to the estate of Levenside." Then followed several other bequests legacies and annuities. The seventh article commenced thus:—"In the event of there being no lawful child or children born to me, it is hereby expressly provided and declared that my trustees shall pay the haill legacies, annuities, and provisions particularly before enumerated, with the exception of the foresaid legacies to John Crum, Walter Crum, James Crum, David Buchan, and Walter Buchan, and their foresaids, which are

In the same event, of his having no children, the trustor then directed payment of certain additional sums to parties not mentioned in the preceding article; and then followed a direction to the effect that "my said trustees shall also pay to the said Humphrey Ewing Crum, and his fore-said, the interest of L.40,000, at such rate as my trustees can get for the said sum, such interest to run from the date at which the fore-said legacies to his brothers are paid, and to continue payable till such time as he or his fore-said shall succeed to the estate of Levenside, on the death of my spouse, or in the event of her entering into a second marriage, when the payment of said interest shall cease and determine." The eighth article specified the term of payment of the annuities and interest of life-tenured principal sums. And the ninth article provided that the legacies (except those, the principal sums of which were life-tenured) should be paid within one year of the testator's death, but with power to pay them at any earlier period the trustees might think proper. The tenth article regulated the payment of legacy-duty, and declared the annuities and interest of principal sums to be alimentary, excluding the jus mariti of the husbands of female annuitants; and declaring that the provisions to those children who were to succeed to the several sums before specified, on the death of their parents, should be payable, at certain specified periods.

Ewing v.
Ewing's
Trustees.

Mr Ewing having died without issue, the pursuer, subject to the life-tenure of the widow, succeeded to the estate of Levenside. He claimed the legacy of L.20,000. The trustees disputed his right, and this action was brought to determine that claim.

The pursuer pleaded;—That he was entitled to the legacy in respect (1.) that it was made payable to him by the seventh purpose of the testator's settlement, in the event which had happened, of no lawful child or children being born to him; (2.) that its payment had not been made dependent on any other event or condition whatever,—the condition or declaration attached to its payment in the sixth purpose of the settlement not having been imported into, and having no place in the seventh purpose. Even were it to be held that the condition or declaration attached to the legacy, as expressed in the sixth purpose of the testator's settlement, viz., that it should be payable to the pursuer only in the event of his "not succeeding" to the estate of Levenside, it would still be due, in respect that he had not yet succeeded to the estate of Levenside, according to the sense in which that expression had been used in the declaration of the whole deed of settlement to the estate of Levenside the enjoyment, and not the mere widow.

Pleaded for the defenders;—That the testator, as proprietor of Levenside, and vestee of L.20,000, which was declared to be payable to his assignees, only in the event of his dying without issue, was effectually excluded from having a right to the estate of Levenside, in which alone the payment was being in its nature and essence by the reference to it in clause 6, and that this essential condition was expressed in the declaration and provisions relative to the legacy, and that the provisions relative to the legacy were not to be construed as giving the pursuer a right to the estate of Levenside, but only to the legacy of L.20,000.

pursuer, and the interest payable to him, were inconsistent with the construction put upon the deed by the pursuer." No. 183.

On 12th June 1855, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustains the defences; Assolzie the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses." * June 12, 1857.
Ewing v.
Ewing's
Trustees.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I cannot say that this trust-deed is very easily read. It is somewhat confused in its expression and in its arrangement. The purposes which we have chiefly to deal with are the 4th, 6th, 7th, and 9th purposes—especially the 6th and 7th purposes.

The 6th purpose, which deals with the estate in the event of the testator leaving a lawful child or children, contains the first mention of this legacy, and it provides, in that event, that the trustees are to pay certain legacies to various parties therein named, including the pursuer, and to their respective heirs and assignees, and, as regards the pursuer, it adds these words:—"But said sum is only to be payable in

* "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the intention of the testator in this case, as discoverable on a fair construction of his trust-settlement, is adverse to the pursuer's claim to the legacy sued for.

"The testator, in framing his deed, contemplated two different contingencies—his leaving or his not leaving issue. In the event which has happened, of his not leaving issue, his estate of Levenside was to be conveyed to the present pursuer under the burden of L.40,000, to be paid by him for the purposes of the trust, and as the testator's widow was to liferent the estate, the pursuer was also to have the interest of L.40,000 in the meantime, till the beneficial enjoyment of it should open to him. All this is clear under the plain terms of the deed.

"It is also clear that, under the 6th purpose of the trust, in the event of the testator 'leaving a lawful child or children,' the pursuer, who would not then get the estate of Levenside, was to be paid a legacy of L.20,000. But the question is whether this legacy is also to be paid to him under the 7th purpose in the opposite event 'of there being no lawful child or children born to me.' In that case, the pursuer would undoubtedly have right to Levenside, either with immediate entry, or with the interest of L.40,000 during the widow's liferent; but he claims, in addition to these rights, the legacy of L.20,000, as due to him equally whether the testator has issue or not.

"The deed is not skilfully or perspicuously framed, and there are words in the 7th purpose, which, in one view, might be held to import into that purpose by reference, the bequest of L.20,000 which is given by the 6th purpose. But the Lord Ordinary thinks that the true construction of the deed excludes this view. He considers that the legacy of L.20,000, as constituted by the 6th purpose, where done it is expressly set forth, is qualified by an intrinsic declaration, that it 'is only to be payable' to the pursuer 'in the event of his not succeeding to the estate of Levenside;' and that this condition so attaches to it as to render it wholly inoperative in the opposite event of there being no child of the testator, and of Levenside thus devolving on the pursuer. The phraseology of the 7th purpose, taken altogether, seems to favour this construction, particularly the declaration here made that the interest of the L.40,000 given to the pursuer is to begin to run from the date of payment, not of any legacy to himself, but of 'the legacies to his brothers,' therein bequeathed.

"The result thus arrived at as to the testator's meaning, is, that if he left children the pursuer was to get the L.20,000. If he left no children, the pursuer was to get Levenside under a certain burden, with an interim allowance during the widow's liferent; but that the right to the land and the legacy of L.20,000 were to be incompatible. This arrangement seems at once the most intelligible and the most consonant to the general structure and special provisions of the deed.

"A discussion has been raised as to the meaning of the phrase 'succeeding' to the estate, used in different parts of the deed. But this matter does not seem to enter essentially into the present question. If the legacy of L.20,000 is only to be payable in the event of the pursuer 'not succeeding' to the estate of Levenside, it seems impossible to hold, in any view, that this negative event has here occurred as to make the legacy payable."

No. 183. the event of his not succeeding to the estate of Levenside," which it had been provided that in the event of the testator leaving no lawful children, the pursuer should do. In the event of there being lawful children, it does not appear that, under any circumstances, the pursuer could have succeeded to that estate.

June 12, 1867.
Ewing v.
Ewing's
Trustees.

The 7th purpose provides for the event of there being no lawful children; and in that event the trustees are directed to pay all the legacies which the testator had left in the event of there being a lawful child, with certain exceptions which he enumerates, and the legacy to the pursuer is not among those so enumerated. These excepted legacies he recalls, and instead of them he substitutes other of greater value. All these legatees were in this position, that in the event of there being a lawful child they were to get the legacies mentioned in the 6th purpose of the deed. In the event of there being no lawful child or children, they were to get better legacies than those first bequeathed to them. The clause then directs the trustees to pay to the pursuer the interest of L.40,000. This was to be payable to him till the event of his succeeding to the estate of Levenside by the death of the testator's spouse, or her second marriage. The meaning of "succeeding" is there very clear. The words which follow explain what it means. The payment of the interest is then to cease and determine.

Now the pursuer says that the legacy given to him by the 6th purpose is referred to in the earlier part of the 7th purpose, which provides that all the legacies before mentioned are to be paid, with certain exceptions; and his legacy not being included among these exceptions, that he is therefore entitled to it; and that when the deed afterwards provides for the payment of the interest of L.40,000, it must be independent of the L.20,000. Referring back to the 6th purpose, we find that that L.20,000 is only to be paid to the pursuer in the event of his not succeeding to the estate of Levenside. The pursuer says that that means succeeding to the estate of Levenside in the same sense in which the word "succeed" is used in the 7th purpose, viz., succeeding by the death or marriage of the testator's widow. It does not necessarily follow that the word "succeed" is to be used in the same sense in all parts of the deed. In the first part it is used broadly and unequivocally, and without any explanation at all. In the 7th purpose there are words which qualify and explain it. The 6th purpose is absolute, that the legacy shall be paid to the pursuer only in the event of his not succeeding to the estate, that is—not succeeding at all—not succeeding at any time. If that be so, and if it be clear, as it is, that the pursuer could never succeed to the estate in the event of the testator leaving a lawful child, it follows of necessity that this qualification was written in contemplation of the event which rendered such qualification necessary. This is an event different from that with which the clause commences, for there was no use for that qualification in that event. It limits his receiving the legacy to the event of his not succeeding to the estate of Levenside.

My view is, that you cannot read this legacy to the pursuer in the 6th purpose as placed upon the same footing with these other legacies in the 6th purpose which are left absolutely. The legacy is left to him with a qualification, which shows that the testator was contemplating the possibility of his not succeeding to the estate of Levenside, and placing a bar to his getting it, if he could be extricated otherwise. If he did succeed to the estate of Levenside in the event of his never succeeding. But that the legacy to be payable at all, was to be payable in the true way of reading the deed is, that in the event of the possibility of the pursuer succeeding to the estate of Levenside, so, there was no necessity for including in the 7th purpose, for the testator was he intended to say as to precluding the possibility of the 7th purpose contemplating as the real event of his succeeding to the estate of Levenside.

LORD IVORY.—I am of the same opinion as to the trustees to convey the estate in question, for when is that right conferred by it to vest? There is no difference between the testator's own children if I

Ewing v.
Ewing's

cases I think the direction implies vesting a morte testatoris, and the direction therefore seems to me to indicate that the testator used that phrase, "succeed to the estate," in the more important and primary sense of these words. But then if there be children, there is again a passage in the clause of importance, for the conveyance is to be to the heirs-male, and his heirs and assignees whomsoever; whom failing, the heir-female, and her heirs and assignees whomsoever; whom failing, to the pursuer. Now that is a simple destination; and if there was a child, the heirs would take as substitutes provided by the deed, and under the deed the pursuer would never come in at all. If at any time he did take, he would take not by force of this deed, but by force of the legal succession—not of the destination at all.

I do not propose to add anything to what your Lordship has said in reference to the 6th clause; but reading it along with the 7th clause, there is no room for doubt that any other conclusion than what your Lordship has arrived at would lead to inconsistency.

The provision in the sixth clause, "that said sum is only to be payable to the pursuer in the event of his not succeeding to the estate of Levenside," is awkwardly inserted. It shews, that in addition to the condition of the event of the testator leaving children, there is another condition which affects the pursuer, which does not affect the other legatees; and it is this, that the sum is only to be payable to him in the event of his not succeeding to the estate of Levenside. But if there be a lawful child, when is the period of succeeding? Is not the pursuer's legacy to be payable at the same term with the others? If so, all these conditions are to be purged during his lifetime. You are not to adopt a construction of "his not succeeding," that would lead to this result that he would not take the legacy till he is dead. It seems to me that there has been here an awkward anticipation by the testator of what he was to do under the seventh clause. I cannot make sense of the deed in any other way. It is clear that the maker of it never intended that the pursuer was to take both the estate and the L.20,000.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I am of opinion that the pursuer is not entitled to the legacy of L.20,000 now claimed by him, because it was provided to him only under a condition which has not been purified. That condition was, that "said sum is only to be payable to the said Humphrey Ewing Crum in the event of his not succeeding to the estate of Levenside." But he has succeeded to the estate of Levenside in virtue of the destination thereof, in the very settlement which contains this conditional legacy; for, although the trustees have not yet denuded thereof in his favour, and the testator's widow still liferents that property, yet in conformity with the principle of the cases of Gordon's Trustees, 4th December 1821, and M'Dowall v. Russell, 6th February 1824, the succession to that estate has opened to him, and, as owner thereof, he could dispose of it or burden it at his pleasure.

The pursuer says that the above mentioned condition is annexed to the legacy, only under the sixth purpose, which is applicable only to the contingency, which has not happened, of the testator leaving a lawful child,—whereas he claims the legacy under the seventh purpose, which applies to the contingency which has happened, of no lawful child having been born to the testator. But the condition is also applicable to the legacy under the seventh purpose, because the legacies thereby directed to be paid are (with five exceptions, within which this one is not comprehended) the same legacies, with all their qualifications, as are provided under the sixth purpose. The import of the sixth and seventh purposes, when read together, is this,—that the long list of legacies, as enumerated in the sixth purpose, are to be paid, whether the testator should leave issue or not, although in the latter event there should be substituted, for the five excepted legacies above referred to, legacies of larger amount, and there should be some additional legacies paid. This condition, therefore, still qualifies the bequest to the pursuer.

But he maintains that he has not succeeded to the estate of Levenside, in the meaning of the settlement, because, in other three parts thereof, the testator uses the expression succeeding as meaning, not the vesting of a right to the estate in the pursuer, but his entry to the beneficial enjoyment thereof on the termination of the widow's liferent; and as that event had not taken place at the expiry of a year after the testator's death, when, by the ninth purpose of the trust, the several legacies were directed to be paid, he the pursuer is entitled to payment of this legacy. But I concur with your Lordship in thinking that, in this part of the deed, the

No. 183. expression "succeeding to the estate" is used in its proper meaning; and that the testator's intention was, that the pursuer should not get payment of this legacy in the event of his acquiring right to Levenside under the settlement.

June 12, 1857. North British Railway Co. v. Brown, Gordon, and Co. Moreover, even if the word succeeding in this condition had referred to the event of the termination of the liferent, I would not have held the pursuer to be entitled to decree in this action. As he not only has already succeeded to the fee of that estate, but is also to succeed to the rents thereof on the termination of the widow's liferent, the event of his succeeding to that estate, even according to his own interpretation of the word succeeding, was one which would happen only on the death or marriage of the liferentrix. Hence, even in that sense, the condition, on which this legacy is expressly declared to be payable, has not yet been purified. At present, at all events, it has not become payable to him, and it is a matter of contingency whether or not it will ever be payable to him, even according to his own construction of the settlement. It is no answer to this, that, by the ninth purpose of the settlement, the legacies generally are made payable a year after the testator's death; because, by the terms of the sixth and seventh purposes, this particular legacy is expressly declared not to be payable except in a contingency which has not yet been purified, and may perhaps not be purified while the pursuer is alive.

LORD DEAS.—I think it clear that the truster's intention was not to give both the estate and the legacy to the pursuer. If the legacy is claimed under the seventh clause, that clause must be read as repeating the condition attached to the legacy in the 6th clause;—and this would not suit the pursuers' purpose.

THE COURT adhered, with additional expenses.

No. 184. THE NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY, Pursuers.—D. F. Inglis—Blackburn.

BROWN, GORDON, AND COMPANY, Defenders.—Macfarlane—Fraser.

Process—Title to sue—Res noviter—A. S. 11th July 1828, sect. 55.—Tenants of a colliery had right to use a railway belonging to their landlord, but which was afterwards conveyed to the North British Railway Company. For a few years before the tenants ceased to occupy the colliery they paid rent to their landlord as factor for the Edinburgh and Perth Railway Co. An action was now brought by the N. B. Railway Company, and by the landlord, as "factor for the said Railway Company," and "for himself," for alleged arrears of dues. They founded upon the prior sale, and homologated the payments to the Edinburgh and Perth Railway Co. The tenants stated, that the N. B. Company had never been vested in the part of the railway used by them, and pleaded, generally, that the pursuers had no title to sue. They brought a counter action against the landlord for repetition of dues paid to him, as factor for the E. and P. Company. In his defences lodged before the record in the first action was closed, he referred to a contract of sale between the N. B. and E. and P. Companies, by which the latter had obtained temporary possession of the railway, but under which it had now reverted to the former. No contract of sale or conveyance however was produced till after the record in both actions had been closed;—Held, that the tenants having been put on their guard by the defence in the counter action, were not entitled to add to the record in the first action res noviter averments of the divestiture of the N. B. Railway Company. (2.) That the general plea striking at the pursuers' title could only be held to apply to the objections specified in the record, and could not embrace objections the knowledge of which had admittedly emerged only after the record had been closed.

Observed, Parties are bound to specify objections to title, and have no right under a general plea to maintain objections of which notice has not been given.

Production after closed record.—The record in the original action being closed, and the tenants having under a diligence recovered documents, and produced them, for the purpose of cutting down the right in the N. B. Railway Company;—Held, that the N. B. Railway Company were entitled thereafter to produce a saime in their favour all along in their own possession, with a view to meet the production made by the other party, after closing the record.

DONALD SMITH PEDDIE, accountant in Edinburgh, was trustee, under deed of assumption, for Mr and Mrs Clarkson, the proprietors of the Halbeath colliery. By minute of agreement he granted a lease of the colliery to Brown, Gordon, and Company, for nineteen years from Whitsunday 1840, with the right to the use of the Halbeath Railway. It was agreed that the lease should terminate as soon as it should be found that the coal could not be wrought to a profit. Under this clause the defenders admittedly ceased to occupy the colliery on 3d April 1852.

North British
Railway Co. v.
Brown, Gordon,
and Co.
1st Division.
Ld Ardmillan.
C.

On 7th January 1847, Peddie, with consent of Mr and Mrs Clarkson, executed a disposition and conveyance of the Halbeath Railway in favour of the pursuers, John Learmonth, and others, as trustees for the North British Railway Company, but excepting therefrom any ground let to Brown, Gordon, and Company, whose rights and privileges under the then existing lease were thereby reserved. By that disposition Peddie conveyed, in favour of his disponees, the whole railway dues, and other profits payable for the railway, from and after Martinmas 1846.

This action was brought at the instance of John Learmonth, and others, "surviving proprietors of the Halbeath Railway, and holding the same in trust for behoof of the North British Railway Company, and Donald Smith Peddie, Esq. accountant in Edinburgh, their factor, for managing the same, and duly and specially authorised and empowered to demand and receive from the defenders the amount of the debt herein set forth, and to sue for, uplift, and discharge the same, and for himself."

The action concluded for payment of L.284, 8s. 9d. of railway dues, which the condescendence libelled as due "under the said lease, and the said disposition, assignation, and conveyance."

The defenders averred that they were formally discharged of all their obligations under the lease by a deed of discharge, dated 7th April 1853, executed by Peddie as trustee for Mr and Mrs Clarkson. That they "had not been able to ascertain who the proprietors of the railway were; and the right of Mr Peddie, they understand, was simply a right of tolerance." They set forth that, in 1846, a bill was brought into Parliament for making a railway to Perth by Queensferry, to be called the Edinburgh and Perth Railway. That "the North British Railway Company purchased a large amount of their stock, and these two Companies determined to procure, if possible, possession of the Halbeath Railway. The mode in which they proceeded is unknown to the defenders, or whether any bargain was completed; though it is set forth in the disposition produced, that the sum of L.25,000 was paid to Mr Peddie for the Halbeath Railway." They stated further that no intimation of sale was made to the defenders; that "in 1848 Peddie uplifted the railway dues payable from Martinmas 1846 to Whitsunday 1847, not on account of new purchasers, but on account of Mr and Mrs Clarkson, although, by the deed now produced and founded on by the pursuers, the railway is said to have been transferred to the North British Railway Company as from Martinmas 1846." That from Whitsunday 1847 to Whitsunday 1850, Peddie uplifted the dues "as factor for the Edinburgh and Perth Railway Company;"—but that the bill for the formation of the Edinburgh and Perth Railway having been then thrown out of Parliament;—the defenders refused to pay the dues to Peddie in that character, "unless he furnished them with fuller explanations, which he was unable to do." The defenders then stated that certain proceedings took place shortly after 1851, with the view to an adjustment of accounts; and that, on the dependence of a submission between Peddie and the defenders as to the rights of parties under the lease, matters remained dormant till 1854, when the North British Railway Company demanded a settlement of the dues, "but nothing was then done, inasmuch as the defender Mr Brown required to know ante

No. 184. omnia who were the true parties in right of the Halbeath Railway, and what their title was, in order that they might know with whom safely to confer. The defenders received the most contradictory statements upon the subject." That after a correspondence between the defenders and the pursuers, the present action was raised; and, on 18th December 1854, "for the first time the defenders were made aware of the nature of the title to claim the dues, and that, according to the title produced, the Edinburgh and Perth Company were not, as represented to the defenders by Mr Peddie, the proprietors; but, on the contrary, that the railway had been, as alleged by the pursuers, conveyed to the North British Railway Company so far back as 1846." In article 8 they stated, that "by the deed which has now been produced, the pursuers, the North British Railway Company, do not obtain a conveyance to the railway;" and after analyzing the deed, which the defenders alleged did not include the railway, so far as it passed through the Halbeath estate, which it did for nearly three quarters of a mile, the article concluded thus:—"This disposition and assignation contains a precept of sasine, but no sasine thereon has been produced." The defenders then stated, that "notwithstanding the alleged execution of this deed, the pursuer Mr Peddie still acted as if no such deed had been executed, and as if he were still in possession of the railway as trustee for Mr and Mrs Clarkson," and narrated the discharge by Peddie in their favour, above referred to.

North British
Railway Co. v.
Brown, Gordon,
and Co.

They farther, on the assumption that the pursuers had a title to sue, averred that the state of debt libelled on was erroneous, and stated various objections to it.

They pleaded;—"1. The pursuers have no title to sue, at least they have produced no such title. 2. The pursuer Mr Peddie having executed a discharge of all claims under the lease, having discharged the lease itself, and the lease not having been assigned over by him to the other pursuers, neither they nor he are now entitled to insist in this action. 3. Mr Peddie himself not having been the proprietor of the railway in any character whatever, the mere conveyance of Mr Peddie's right in the railway to the pursuers did not eo ipso transfer to them the lease, or the rights under it, without a special assignation thereto." The rest of the pleas were to the effect that the action was uncalled for; that the defenders were willing to settle the debt on seeing the title to discharge the money, but that the debt claimed was objectionable.

The record was closed on 23d May 1855.

Of prior date, on 16th February 1855, an action had been raised by Brown, Gordon, and Company, against Peddie, for repetition of the monies alleged to have been erroneously paid by them to him from Martinmas 1846 to Whitsunday 1850, "in respect he had no title to receive the dues, while he stated the contrary; th

No disposition or minute of sale or deed of reconveyance in support of his averments had been produced before the record was closed on 3d July 1855. On 13th July Peddie produced a copy deed of discharge by the North British to the Edinburgh and Perth Company of part of the price of the Halbeath Railway, and which deed narrated the agreement of sale and the mode in which the bargain was to be completed. June 12, 1857.
North British
Railway Co. v.
Brown, Gordon,
and Co.

During the debate in the first action at the instance of the North British Railway Company, Brown, Gordon, and Company, on 13th February 1856, moved for leave to add as res noviter certain averments contained in a condescendence,—articles 1, 2, and 3 of which narrated the contract of sale in 1847 between the North British Railway Company and the Edinburgh and Perth Railway Company, and stated that the latter Company paid half of the price and gave security for the balance, and that the North British Railway Company became bound by deed of discharge to deliver to them an assignation and conveyance of the Halbeath Railway under the real burden of the remaining half of the price. The condescendence then proceeded as follows:—“4. A deed of disposition, assignation, and conveyance, was accordingly executed by the pursuers in favour of the said Edinburgh and Perth Company, under which, as well as the contract of sale itself, the said last mentioned Company possessed, and still continue to possess as proprietors. This deed of disposition or conveyance is now in the possession of the directors, or persons who were directors of the Edinburgh and Perth Company. They have never conveyed the same to any other party, and in particular, have not conveyed the railway to the pursuers, who were absolutely and completely divested thereof. 5. The facts set forth in the preceding articles only came to the knowledge of the defenders since the record was closed. Prior to the record being closed the defenders stated all the facts that then were within their knowledge, or which they could discover. These were such as to make them believe that the pursuers were not the proprietors of the railway. The defenders had paid rent to other parties, viz., the Edinburgh and Perth Company, and their factor, down to 1850, and never heard of the pursuers being proprietors, or of the title which conveyed the railway to them as from Martinmas 1846, till the deed, or rather a copy of it, was produced in this process. The defenders were unable to explain this title consistently with the fact that they had paid rent to Mr Peddie as factor for the Edinburgh and Perth Company down to Whitsunday 1850. They believed that the pursuers had been divested, after 1846, by conveyance to the Edinburgh and Perth Company, and accordingly, before the record was closed, they applied for a diligence to the Lord Ordinary to recover documents connected with this matter of title. The first article in the specification was in these terms:—‘All missives or minutes of sale, or other deeds, between Mr Peddie, as trustee for Mr and Mrs Clarkson, or his agents, and the said North British Railway Company, or their trustees, secretaries, managers, or agents, and between him and the Edinburgh and Perth Railway Company, or their secretaries, trustees, managers, committees, and agents, and between the said North British Railway Company, their trustees, secretaries, managers, and agents, and the Edinburgh and Perth Railway Company, their secretaries, trustees, committees, or agents, of all or any part of the Halbeath Railway, or in relation thereto, or copies of them.’ The Lord Ordinary refused this diligence hoc statu, on 26th February 1855. The record was prepared and completed 12th March 1855. The case appeared in the adjustment roll on 20th March 1855. Being the first appearance in the roll the case was adjourned; and on the meeting of the Court in the Summer Session, the record was

No. 184. closed on 23d May 1855. The defenders not having access to the deeds which they have since discovered, were unable to set forth on the record the facts connected with the divestiture of the pursuers, and the conveyance to the Edinburgh and Perth Company, who are at present the proprietors. The following was the mode in which the defenders obtained information on the subject."

June 12, 1857.
North British
Railway Co. v.
Brown, Gordon,
and Co.

Article 6 then stated that, in the action raised by Brown, Gordon, and Company against Peddie, "Peddie, on 13th July 1855, and after the record was closed in the present action, produced the copy deed of discharge granted by the North British Railway Company for the sum of L.12,500, which had been paid to that Company by the Edinburgh and Perth Railway Company, with the object of shewing that the latter had bought the railway, and that he, as their factor, had properly exacted and obtained payment of the railway dues down to 1850. This deed recited the contract of sale between the two companies, and stated particularly the mode in which the bargain was carried out between them. It set forth that, in the event of the second instalment of L.12,500 not being paid to the North British Railway Company, which was declared a real burden upon the railway, they should be entitled, as creditors of the Edinburgh and Perth Company, to sell the railway, and from the proceeds pay their own debt. This deed, or the copy of it, was not produced in process until 13th July 1855, being long after the record was closed in the present action. This deed disclosed to the defenders the fact of the divestiture to the North British Railway Company, but owing to the record being closed in the present action before they saw it, they were unable to found upon it, or set forth in the record in this action the facts which it narrated.

"7. The North British Railway Company have received payment of the second instalment of L.12,500. At all events, they have never exercised the power of sale which they possess for payment thereof, and the railway remains the property of the directors of the Edinburgh and Perth Company. That Company has never made any reconveyance to the North British Railway Company."

On 20th February 1856, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel on the defenders' motion, made during the discussion of the cause on the closed record, for leave to introduce the averments contained in the condescendence, No. 50 of process, of facts said to be res noviter venientes ad notitiam, Refuses the said motion; and appoints the cause to be enrolled, that the debate on the merits may proceed; and reserves all questions of expenses." *

* "NOTE.—The record in this action was closed on 23d May 1855. Before that date the defenders Brown, Gordon, & Co., had raised their action against Mr Peddie, in which the same counsel and agent appeared for them; and in which it was stated by the defender Mr Peddie, of Halbeath Railway had been at one time Co., the deed of conveyance was then made. The fact, therefore, if relevant, is not res noviter since this record was closed. It is a fact of which was within their power from their own statement on this record deed was referred to in Mr Peddie's depositions. The pleadings in this process were in the interlocutor of 20th March 1855, and lodged and it was produced in the process again on the head of alleged res noviter was made in 1856, when it was suddenly made in these circumstances, the Lord Ordinary declared the condescendence of facts alleged to be res noviter in that light. They have not come to light."

Brown, Gordon, and Company reclaimed, and pleaded :—That there were only two considerations in this discussion,—1st, The relevancy of the averments sought to be added to the record, which could not be disputed ; and 2d, The delay which had elapsed between the closing of the record, and the motion for leave to add the new averments. That delay, however, could affect only the question of expenses. Whether or not the defenders could safely pay to the pursuers was not of the least consequence. The objection was to title, and if the objection was in itself good, the answer that the defenders were safe to pay was irrelevant.

No. 184.
June 12, 1857.
North British
Railway Co. v.
Brown, Gordon, and Co.

LORD PRESIDENT. — The only question here is, whether there is excusable ignorance on the part of the defenders ? Do the pursuers object to the defenders founding on this deed as matter of title ?

D. F. Inglis, for the pursuers.—We consent to their doing so without was closed. It would be sufficient on the authorities that they might have been ascertained ; but in this case they were actually known. The privilege of introducing new matter at so late a stage of the proceedings must be protected from abuse.

“ But, separately, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion, that, having regard to the circumstances of this case, and to the position in which the defenders stand, these averments of alleged new matter of fact are really not relevant to support the defence.

“ Their possession as tenants during the year for which rent is now demanded is not disputed ; their liability for the rents sued for is not denied—payment of these rents to any party is not alleged—and a demand by any other party than the pursuers, the North British Railway Co., or Mr Peddie, or the Edinburgh and Perth Railway Co. (if that company be now in existence, which it is not said to be), is not even averred to be possible. Mr Peddie, from whom the defenders got the lease, and under whom they commenced their possession, is a concurring pursuer. No person on the part of the extinct Edinburgh and Perth Co. has appeared, or is named by the defenders as having a right to appear, and the North British Railway Co., who have produced a conveyance in their favour of this railway, dated in 1847, and in force during the years 1850, 1851, and 1852, have judicially undertaken to procure any further concurrence the defenders may suggest, and to give the defenders a guarantee against a demand by any party whatever for second payment. This conveyance, fortified, if that were necessary, by the concurrence of Mr Peddie as a pursuer, is a good title to sustain the demand, and to make the defenders perfectly safe in paying. The defenders are seeking to raise a cloud, in which to escape from payment of a just debt ; and they ought not, in the Lord Ordinary’s opinion, to be allowed to do so. As debtors in this rent, which they do not deny that they are, they have no legitimate interest, except to see that they are safe in making payment ; and here there is no competition for the rents, and no challenge of the pursuers’ right by any party having interest. The rise and fall of the project for making the Edinburgh and Perth Railway, for which an Act of Parliament was not obtained, and the arrangement, which ultimately came to nothing, for transferring to the Edinburgh and Perth Co. the Halbeath Railway, have been laid hold of by these defenders for the purpose of complicating and obscuring this case, and enabling them to escape, or at least to postpone their liability for payment of a debt not denied to be just. The disposition to the North British Railway Co. in 1847 remains a valid and unchallenged title. Mr Peddie, who was the author of the defenders’ right, concurs in this action, and will concur in the discharge ; and against all possible hazard of a demand for second payment, the defenders are offered an ample guarantee.

“ Notwithstanding all this the defenders refuse to pay the debt, and now, during a debate on the merits and on the closed record, they endeavour to gather the materials for litigation, and the grounds for technical pleas in defence, out of the brief and long-forgotten history of the Edinburgh and Perth Railway Co., which was interposed between the lease to the defenders and the conveyance to the North British Railway Co. To permit them, under these circumstances, to succeed in this attempt, would, in the Lord Ordinary’s opinion, be pessimi exempli. The ends of justice appear to him to require the refusal of the motion now made.”

No. 184. farther averment. Farther, we homologate the payments by the defenders, and say they were perfectly safe to pay.

June 12, 1857. The Court, in May 1856, pronounced the following interlocutor: "In respect that the matter referred to by the reclaimers is not res noviter, and that it is not disputed that the deed referred to may be founded on in support of the objection to title, so far as relevant: Refuse the said reclaiming note, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed with the cause, reserving all questions of expenses."

North British
Railway Co. v.
Brown, Gordon,
and Co.

Under a diligence granted by the Lord Ordinary, the defender recovered the contract of sale between the pursuers and the Edinburgh and Perth Railway Company—discharge in favour of that Company by the pursuers, and a state of Peddie's intrusions as factor for that Company, but no conveyance. Nor did they recover any reconveyance by the Edinburgh and Perth Company to the pursuers. The pursuers then tendered production of a sasine upon the disposition of 1846 in their favour, to which the defenders objected as incompetent.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutors:—

"17th February 1857.— . . . Finds that the pursuers allege on record that they are proprietors of the Halbeath Railway, and that it has not been disputed that they were proprietors of the railway prior to February 1847: Finds that the defenders object to the pursuers' title to sue, on the ground that, by an alleged sale by the pursuers to the Edinburgh and Perth Railway Company in February 1847, the pursuers were denuded of their title as proprietors: Finds that the pursuers produced in support of their title a disposition, assignation, and conveyance in their favour, containing a precept of sasine; but that the instrument of sasine was omitted to be then produced, and has been at the debate now referred to by the pursuers' counsel, and tendered as a production at the bar, but the production thereof has been opposed by the defenders: Finds that the fact of the pursuers being infeft at the agreement, in February 1847, may be important, and that it is essential to the ends of justice that the pursuers' right should not be dealt with as personal only, if they were truly infeft, and finds that the sasine ought to be in process: Therefore allows the same to be produced, under reservation of the question of expenses.

"Edinburgh, 18th February 1857.—The Lord Ordinary having resumed consideration of the case—In respect that the pursuers' title, as proprietors of the Halbeath Railway, standing on disposition and sasine, was not destroyed by the personal right conveyed to the Edinburgh and Perth Railway Company; and that on the reversion, in terms of the agreement, of the personal title on non-payment of the second instalment of the price, the right again stood in the pursuers as proprietors undivested: and in respect that

The defenders reclaimed, and prayed the Court “to find that the pursuers, No. 184.
not having libelled upon a title by sasine, are not entitled now to produce or found upon such a title; to find that, in any circumstances, the pursuers June 12, 1857.
are not entitled to produce said sasine after the record had been closed, the North British sasine having been in their own possession; to order the said sasine to be Railway Co. v.
withdrawn from process; and, in any view, to disallow production of the Brown, Gor-pursuers’ sasine; to sustain the first plea in law for the defenders, that the don, and Co.
pursuers have no title to sue, and to dismiss the action accordingly; to find the pursuers liable in expenses to the defenders,” &c.

They pleaded;—That the only question was one of form, which was expressly regulated by Act of Sederunt.¹ Considerations of what was essential for justice were irrelevant. The question now was, was it competent for the pursuers at the last moment to produce that sasine? Admittedly, it was all along in their possession. They were aware of it, and advisedly withheld it until the last moment, when they thought it might be of importance. But these were not circumstances in which the Court would allow the rules of Court to be overturned. If this were allowed, there was no case in which a record being closed, a party might not produce at any time whatever documents he pleased, and might purposely keep back documents on which the whole case might be found to hang. LORD PRESIDENT.—Has there been anything produced by the defenders which required production of this sasine to meet it? Macfarlane, for the defenders.—Nothing but the contract of sale; but it is not explained by the pursuers that the sasine was intended to meet that production. Their object was to libel the action upon a different title from that upon which it was originally brought; and, in these circumstances, this production was incompetent. If so, the second inter-award of expenses, in the way of modification or otherwise, when the cause is concluded; and, 2dly, That if the sasine is so received as a production, and the pursuers’ completed title viewed as the radical right, reverting, in terms of the agreement, with the Edinburgh and Perth Company, then the defenders’ plea, urged against a demand for dues never paid to any one, and never claimed by the Edinburgh and Perth Company, and arising during a period when the Edinburgh and Perth Company did not possess the railway, is not well founded. Mr Peddie is himself a concurring pursuer in this action. It is not alleged by the defenders that there are any parties now representing the Edinburgh and Perth Company who can claim these dues, or, indeed, that a demand for second payment by anybody is possible.

“It is specially stipulated in the agreement founded on by the defenders, that, ‘in the event of the sum of L.12,500, secured on the contingency above contemplated on the Halbeath Railway, not being paid up within three years, the said Halbeath Railway shall revert to the North British Railway Company, &c. That the Edinburgh and Perth Company did not get their Act of Parliament, and that this sum was not paid within three years, and that therefore the railway did revert to the North British Railway Company, are facts which were not in argument disputed by the defenders. But the feudal title having been all along in the pursuers, their right of proprietorship does not rest on the clause of reversion or retrocession, but on the original radical title,—the effect of the reversion being only to discharge the personal right of the Edinburgh and Perth Railway Company.

“In these circumstances, the Lord Ordinary has repelled the defenders’ first plea in law.”

¹ A. S., 11th July 1828, sect. 55, provides, that, “after the record is made up and closed, it shall no longer be competent for the party in any case to produce any writing which was in his possession or within his power at the time of completing the record, unless he shall instruct that it is noviter veniens ad notitiam; but it shall be competent to the parties to apply for a diligence for recovery of writings ~~in~~ in modum probationis; or to produce such writings previously in their power ~~as~~ as may be rendered necessary by the production of papers made by the other party ~~after~~ the record is closed.”

No. 184. locutor, which proceeded on the assumption that this production was competent, must also be recalled. No title could be revived under that condition by which the property reverted to the pursuers in certain events, without a declarator to establish it. There was here no renunciation or evidence of renunciation of right by the Edinburgh and Perth Railway Company. It was not to be assumed that the property had so reverted without evidence to that effect.

June 12, 1857.
North British
Railway Co. v.
Brown, Gordon,
and Co.

The pursuers pleaded ;—That the title libelled in this action was the disposition and conveyance by Peddie, with consent of the proprietors of the Halbeath colliery, in favour of the pursuers. In objecting to the pursuers' title, therefore, the defenders could only mean that this disposition was not a good title on which to sue the action. But in the absence of anything to take off its effect, that disposition was as good as any possible title in a petitory action. The record was closed on that production. In the defenders' condescendence of res noviter, they alleged that the Edinburgh and Perth Railway Company now possessed the Halbeath Railway under a deed of conveyance by the pursuers, who were thereby absolutely and completely divested. That was the only deed that could be said to be res noviter, and was the deed referred to in the interlocutor of May 1856. But it had not been recovered, for this reason, that such a deed never did exist. In these circumstances, the defenders having contended that, under the agreement of sale and other documents recovered by them, a personal right was created in the Edinburgh and Perth Railway Company, sufficient to destroy the personal right in the North British Railway Company,—the answer was, that there was not such a personal right ; but it was not necessary to discuss that point, the nature of the pursuers' right being made clear by the sasine in their favour, and that sasine was therefore produced for the purpose of meeting the argument raised by the defenders upon their new productions. That was not against, but in accordance with the Act of Sederunt.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In the previous discussion, it is stated that you consented to the defenders founding on “the deed” without additional averment. They now say that that means the contract of sale as well as the conveyance to the Edinburgh and Perth Railway Company.

D. F. Inglis, for the pursuers.—That was not the meaning of my concession, which was, that if the defenders should produce such a conveyance as they said existed, I agreed to their founding on it without opening up the record.

Macfarlane, for the defenders.—Our understanding was that the contract of sale was included in the Dean's consent. Moreover, the contract of sale has been produced without objection.

LORD DEAS.—Strictly speaking, the pursuers' consent was equally necessary to enable the defenders to found on the contract of sale.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I wish to refer to my notes of the former discussion, in order, if possible, to find a clear solution of the interlocutor of May 1856, for it allows a certain deed to be founded on in support of the defenders' objection to title, and if that clearly applies to the conveyance, that deed is not now founded on. There is no allegation on record that there is any such disposition, and the interlocutor would then be out of the way that creates the difficulty.

On 5th June the case was again called.

LORD PRESIDENT.—There are here two interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary brought under review. The first deals entirely with the producing of this sasine at the present stage of the case. It appears to me that the pursuers were entitled to produce the sasine, not upon the grounds stated in the interlocutor, but in respect of the productions made by the defenders since the record was closed. Being of that opinion, the first interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary will fall to be recalled.

In his second interlocutor the Lord Ordinary has repelled the first plea in law No. 184. for the defenders, in respect of the reasons contained in his first interlocutor. I have considerable difficulty in adopting that ground of judgment. It rather appears to me that the whole matter rests on a personal title here, and that the sasine does not avail much in the question we have to decide. I am therefore not disposed to concur in this interlocutor. There are various objections to the pursuers' title set forth on the record, on some of which we have not heard parties. Therefore, I would suggest that this interlocutor should be recalled in hoc statu, and that we should appoint parties to be heard on the first plea for the defenders.

June 12, 1857.
North British
Railway Co. v.
Brown, Gordon,
and Co.

LORD IVORY.—I entirely agree as to the grounds of recalling both interlocutors. We cannot hold the pursuers entitled to produce this sasine on the ground stated by the Lord Ordinary. But the documents produced by the defenders give the pursuers an independent ground for producing it.

As to the other interlocutor, the action is not libelled on a real right, but is founded altogether on personal title, and therefore I am prepared to recall that interlocutor in hoc statu, but I think parties should be further heard.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I concur in the judgment suggested on both points. The question of title may refer to the disposition by Peddie to the North British Railway Company, or to an alleged divestiture by that Company in favour of the Edinburgh and Perth Railway Company, and alleged re-investiture. The question raised on the record is this: Is the title there referred to only a conveyance by Peddie in favour of the North British Railway Company, or does it also include such investiture of the Edinburgh and Perth Railway Company, and re-investiture of the pursuers? The discussion should have reference to that question.

LORD DEAS concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Edinburgh, 5th June 1857.—The Lords having heard counsel for the parties,—Recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary of 17th February last; but find that the pursuers are entitled to produce the instrument of sasine following on the disposition, assignation, and conveyance, both in their favour, in respect of the productions made by the defenders since the record in the cause was closed: Further, they recall in hoc statu the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary of 18th February last, and allow the parties to be heard on the first plea in law for the defenders, and on the state of the record."

When the case was called, neither party proposed to make any alteration on the record.

When the case was advised,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This case has been a very unfortunate one. It has been frequently here, and it is now before us upon a record, which, to say the least of it, is very unsatisfactory with reference to the point which has been argued to us.

When the case was before us last the attention of the parties was called to the state of the record, and doubts were expressed whether it contained anything upon the subject of the divestiture or re-investiture of the North British Railway Company. But both parties say they are resolved to stand by the record as it is. If a proposal had been made by either of them to make the record more perfect, I could have entertained that proposal, and considered the regulations under which it was to be agreed to. But both parties have repudiated that course, and they insist on the case being dealt with rigidly on the record as it stands.

That being so, we have to deal with the defenders' objection to the pursuers' title. The record does set forth such an objection, and looking to the record as presented to us, I could draw no inference from it except that the title of the pursuers was objectionable, in respect of what is stated in article 8 of the defenders' defence. The record states a specific objection to the title produced by the pursuers, and says that by that title the pursuers could not, and did not, obtain a conveyance to the Halbeath Railway. The result of the whole is summed up in the first plea in law for the defenders, that "the pursuers have no title to it, at least they have produced no such title."

Now it is impossible to read that plea otherwise than by reference to the record, and I cannot admit the broad doctrine contended for by the defenders, that it is not incumbent on them to state in the record the specific nature of their

No. 184. objections to the pursuers' title,—that if they choose to state a plea that the pursuers have no title, under that plea they have right to adduce any objection of divestiture, or anything else that may arise in the course of the proceedings. Still less would I be disposed to admit that a party is entitled to set forth in the record specific objections to the title of the pursuer with a general plea of this kind, and then say, he does not mean to plead these objections at all, but something else which he has reserved, and therefore I construe that plea in the way which I am to mention. The defenders have already said in the record that the title the pursuers have produced is not a good title to the Halbeath Railway; the plea, therefore, can only mean that the document produced is not a good title to this railway. But at a later stage of the case the defenders discovered that there were proceedings whereby, as they say, the North British Railway Company were divested of this railway in favour of the Edinburgh and Perth Railway Company, and they desired to have that proceeding connected with the state of the facts averred in the record, and they applied to the Lord Ordinary for leave to have the record opened up and this matter added to it. That application was put on the ground of res noviter. The Lord Ordinary refused that application. He observed that the transaction which they alluded to as a supposed divestiture,—the document on which that was supposed to rest had been brought under their notice in another action between them and Peddie, one of the pursuers in this action, before the record in this action was closed; and that, therefore, they were not excusably ignorant of that transaction. It is not enough, in an application for leave to add new matter to a record, that the party making the application was ignorant of the facts averred to have come recently to his knowledge. He must be excusably ignorant of them. The defenders were here put on their guard as to the existence of this document. The Lord Ordinary refused the motion on that ground. That interlocutor was reclaimed against, and we were also of opinion that the matter was not res noviter. That appeared to us very clear.

The defenders said they had ascertained that there was a deed of conveyance of the Halbeath Railway by the pursuers in favour of the Edinburgh and Perth Railway Company. "This deed of disposition or conveyance is now in the possession of the directors of the Edinburgh and Perth Company," and that, I suppose, is the disposition which, under their discharge for the L.12,500, the North British Railway Company became bound to grant. After a good deal of discussion, we thought that the whole matter alleged was not res noviter; and I think the 5th article of the defenders' condescendence went far to support that conclusion, for it says that the defenders "believed that the pursuers had been divested after 1846 by conveyance to the Edinburgh and Perth Company; and, accordingly, before the record was closed they applied for a diligence to the Lord Ordinary to recover documents connected with this matter of title." In that position of matters, with the deed referred to in defence by one of the pursuers in another action, and the defenders' own admission that they believed that the pursuers were divested, I could not hold that the divestiture was a matter of res noviter which they were entitled to put on record as such, and we so decided.

We have since heard an argument review that judgment, and to reopen argument, on that point, went mainly to show that it was a mistake, and had been under the impression that it had been produced in the other action. I never understood the Lord Ordinary to in defence in a case between them and Peddie, and therefore seen before the discharge was lodged long before to this record. Therefore, if it were noviter, nothing has been said to be pronounced. The defenders knew, or could also plain that the defenders do not made, that there is not an averment of divestiture at all. It is stated that the defenders had "reason to believe" that there was a divestiture, but in that state of the averments, I cannot hold that this record covers the objection of divestiture; and it would be pessimi exempli to allow the defenders now to plead an objection of that kind, where they have not stated it in record, and also where they admit that they believed the fact to be as they now state it, and yet that they withheld that statement from the record. I cannot sanction the doctrine that a party stating specific objections to the title produced, and putting on record a plea of this kind we are now dealing with, is entitled, under cover of that plea, to raise a question of this kind as to divestiture. It was his duty to have made that statement on record, and allowed the pursuer an opportunity of answering it. The defenders have not done so, and therefore I am for repelling their objection to the pursuers' title. I do that with the less difficulty that I do not see much in the objection itself.

It is said that there are facts averred that it is alleged that Peddie was false and that that is equivalent to saying Railway Company in their favour.

June 12, 1857.
North British
Railway Co. v.
Brown, Gor-
don, and Co.

LORD IVORY.—I am of the same opinion. Certainly this record is not in a satisfactory shape, whether as regards the averments of the pursuers or the defenders. But with reference to the matter attempted to be introduced into the case on the application of the defenders as res noviter,—that is a decided point. We have held that there was no res noviter. Then, when we come to the record as it stands, what is the ground of action? The defenders were originally the tenants of this railway, and of the Halbeath colliery. The title of the pursuers is set forth in the summons as assignees to any rights or proceeds of this Halbeath railway, which Peddie, the landlord of these parties, would have been entitled to exact from and after Whitsunday 1846. That is quite express as to the title to sue for any dues exigible from the defenders under their lease. The pursuers libel on both the assignation and the lease. It may be shewn that Peddie is divested of his title, but upon that title the summons is laid. Again, the action is at the instance of the North British Railway Company, and of Peddie, their factor, and "for himself." Peddie, therefore, is not pursuer merely as in right of the North British Railway Company, but in his own right. And in the statements by which the summons is supported, he sues for any right he might have under his original title of landlord, as regards the tenants; therefore there is first the title of their direct landlord, and also of the cedent from that landlord, upon the disposition which is produced. That title, so libelled, is complete. What is the defence? It is that the title is not good, because of certain objections which are stated in article 8 of the defenders' condescendence. The objections are somewhat of a technical kind. But none of them assert a divestiture. The objection is to the sufficiency or validity of the title founded on in the summons. And in the pleas in law that comes out still clearer. Divestiture is not intended to be alleged; so that whether you look to the statement of facts, or the pleas in law, it is perfectly clear that the ground of objection to the title as libelled is simply that it was an insufficient title, and would not avail the pursuers.

The objection which is next taken on the ground of divestiture is no longer an objection to the sufficiency or validity of the title produced. It is an admission of that title, and a statement that it was an investiture, but that the pursuers have parted with it to another party.

I entirely agree, that if the objection to title was to be rested on any such ground, it ought to have been specifically set forth in the record. That is a new plea. It is an admission that title is libelled, and an assumption that admitting that title to be good, it has been transferred, and given away to another party. That cannot be assumed. There must be a specific statement to that effect, and the defenders have not made such a statement.

Again, in regard to the matter of res noviter, the defenders tell us why they did not state it in the record. They say that they only came to know about it after the record was closed. The defence of divestiture was not within the record, and we are told why it was not within it. The only way in which it was proposed to put it in, was on the footing that it was an entire novelty. But the defenders admit that they did know of it before, and therefore there is an end of that objection to title. How far that is to go is a different affair. An objection to title is not final—that is, it is not exclusive of going into the grounds on which that title

No. 184. is to be supported. It is an objection to the title as laid; but on the merits of the action the parties have still to enter.

North British
Railway Co. v.
Brown, Gordon,
and Co.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I so entirely concur not only in the results, but in the grounds of your Lordship's opinion, that I have little to add. The subject of this action consists of dues leviable for the use of the railway. The summons sets forth that the defenders are liable in payment of them in virtue of a certain agreement entered into between them, on the one hand, and Peddie, as representing the family of Clarkson, on the other hand. The pursuers libel upon and produce a disposition and assignation from Peddie in favour of the North British Railway Company. That document expressly conveys the railway dues; and therefore there is a clear title in favour of the North British Railway Company to sue for these dues. But further, Peddie the cedent concurs with them in the action, so that the pursuers' title is ample and sufficient. The defenders, however, disputed that title; and particularly in article 8 they set forth the nature of their objection to it, and the record is closed without any other objection to title being stated. There is no allegation of divestiture from beginning to end of the record. The defenders alleged that they were unable to state this in the record, because they were ignorant of it. But we are now dealing with that record as it stands. We have already decided that this was not res noviter; but yet the opportunity was given to the defenders of moving to have the record opened up, on the ground that it did not sufficiently state the pleas of parties. But as they have not availed themselves of that opportunity, I am satisfied that the objection of divestiture is not properly before us; and I am very glad that your Lordship has expressed your opinion so strongly, that a defender is not entitled to bring forward any objection he pleases under cover of a plea generally stated as to want of title. I entirely concur that this would be setting the Judicature Act at defiance, and would introduce an improper system of pleading.

LORD DEAS.—I so entirely concur, that I should only repeat what has been already said, were I to enlarge farther. The defenders have peculiarly little reason to complain if the forms of process be strictly enforced against them, for full opportunity was offered to them to make the record more satisfactory, and they declined to do so. The sole objection urged at this bar, to the pursuers' title to sue, was their alleged divestiture in favour of the Edinburgh and Perth Railway Company. But no such objection is stated in the record either as matter of fact or matter of law. I thought, at one time, it might possibly be intended to lurk under statement 4th. But this statement was explained by the defenders' counsel. Mr Fraser, to refer to a proposed transaction, which never took effect, between the two Railway Companies on the one part, and Mr Peddie, on behalf of Mr and Mrs Clarkson, on the other part. The very words of the defenders' 1st plea indicate that it had no reference to divestiture:—"The pursuers have no title to sue, at least they have produced no such title." The precise meaning of this plea we find from the relative statement in art. 8, where it is said that the line of railway is excepted from, or not embraced in the conveyance libelled on, and that the pursuers have produced no other title than that conveyance. The plea, therefore, is not that the pursuers had a title and are now divested of it, but that they never had a title at all, which is quite different. It is settled by the interlocutor refusing the concordance of res noviter, that the deed which they now say operated be maintained that they were divested of fact, and then the plea of no title hold, therefore, that there is a title consideration. I come to this conclusion did not satisfy me there was divestiture.

THE COURT pronounced that having heard the counsel the defenders, Repel that to the pursuers in the ordinary last, the date of reclaimed against by the Ordinary that the same Reparation—Agent and client—Neglect of professional duty—Measure of damages.

—In an action against an agent for damages sustained by the loss of an action alleged to have been occasioned by the negligence of the agent, chiefly in allowing circumduction and decree by default to pass without intimating to his client the interlocutor allowing proof;—Held not necessary to aver that the agent acted fraudulently or collusively; but

Action dismissed, in respect—(1), although it is the duty of an agent generally to intimate an interlocutor allowing proof, the failure to do so had not been proved; and (2), the pursuer had not condescended upon any evidence which could have been available.

Observed, that had it been proved that the action had been lost through crassa negligentia on the part of the agent, the conclusions of the action so lost would not necessarily be the measure of the damage, but the Court would inquire into the soundness of the claim.

THIS was an action of damages raised in the Sheriff-court of Ross-shire June 12, 1857 against an agent in consequence of alleged misconducting of litigation in that court, in which he had acted on the employment of the pursuer, Mrs Urquhart, an old woman of humble rank. The facts of the case were as follows:—

2^D DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Ross-shire.
R.

1. In the year 1850, the respondent had, at Mrs Urquhart's instance, raised an action against one James Brander for recovery of an alleged loan of L.30. The defender in that action deponed on a reference that there was no loan, but that an acceptance in favour of the pursuer's father had been deposited with him in security of rent, and that he had received the contents. The action founded on loan therefore failed; and

2. In 1851, in the knowledge of the whole circumstances, the respondent raised an action of count and reckoning applicable to the contents of the bill. Brander pleaded prescription, and denied resting owing. The Sheriff-substitute, on 23d February 1853, pronounced an interlocutor allowing a proof before answer; and on 25th February he pronounced another fixing a diet, and granting "diligence against witnesses and havers—the proof to be commenced by the pursuer," &c.

This interlocutor Mrs Urquhart said was never intimated to her. This was not admitted by the respondent, who, however, led no proof, and the following interlocutor was pronounced:—"26th April 1853.—Circumduces the term for proving against both parties; and in respect the pursuer failed to adduce any evidence in support of her averments, sustains the defences on the merits; assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the libel; finds the pursuer liable to him in costs."

The defender reclaimed against this interlocutor, arguing, that the onus of proof did not lie on his client, but upon Brander, who had admitted that the contents of the bill had come into his hands. This reclaiming note was dismissed by the Sheriff-substitute, whose interlocutor was allowed to become final without any appeal being taken.

3. An action of damages precisely similar to that now before the Court was brought against the respondent, but allowed to drop.

4. Mrs Urquhart brought the present action against Grigor, concluding for payment of L.30, as the "loss and damage" sustained by her in consequence of the defender having failed to intimate to her the interlocutor allowing a proof in the second of the cases, and "to cite witnesses," and to appeal to the Sheriff from the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute circumducing the term for not proving, and assoilzieing the defender.

After the record was made up, the pursuer alleging not only that the interlocutors allowing and fixing the diet for proof had not been intimated to her, but that witnesses had been at hand to prove her case, and were ready to be adduced, and the defender denying these allegations, both parties renounced probation.

The Sheriff-substitute assoilzied the defender, and found the pursuer liable in expenses,* and an appeal against his interlocutor was dismissed by the Sheriff-depute.†

A note of advocacy for Mrs Urquhart was reported to the Second Division, in terms of the statute. It was argued for her;—If Grigor knew the whole circumstances from the first, and that it was impossible to succeed in the count and reckoning, it was most improper in him to raise the action at all, merely to give it up when he was allowed an opportunity of establishing his case. In any view, he ought not to have allowed circumduction to pass without intimating the proof to his client, and giving her an opportunity of adducing evidence. By diligence, the bill and receipts, showing how the contents had been paid, might have been recovered; or perhaps the oath of the defender in the original action, the terms of which had seemed to furnish grounds for a count and reckoning, might have been used; but the defender had not even made a new reference to oath. He indeed reclaimed, and contended that the admissions in the record were sufficient to lay the onus of accounting on the defender; but it was another gross failure in duty on his part to allow the adverse judgment on this point to become final without either intimating it to his client or appealing. The defender was

* NOTE.—After a narrative of the facts, the note proceeded:—

"At the hearing, the agents on both sides agreed to take a judgment on the case as it stands, without any further proof than is contained in the admissions and documents in process; and the Sheriff-substitute is of opinion, that, in the circumstances above stated, the defender is entitled to be assoilzied. The original debt, if there was one, was about 25 years old when the first of the four actions was raised by the pursuer, and, consequently, was proveable only, if at all, by writ or oath; and the alleged debtor swore negatively of the averment of resting owing under the pursuer's own reference. Then it is not alleged, in regard to the action of count and reckoning, that the pursuer gave her agent any writings to support it, or that any such writings existed; and parole evidence would have been incompetent and inadmissible. To 'cite witnesses' and inform the pursuer of the diet of proof would therefore have been useless; and as useless would it have been to appeal against the circumduction. Thus there is nothing, it is conceived, to warrant the conclusion that the pursuer has really suffered loss through a failure of professional duty on the part of the defender."

† "NOTE.—The Sheriff cannot hold that the situation of an agent conducting a process is to be assimilated to that of a messenger employed to execute diligence. The latter is employed to do a specific act, and has no discretion whatever; so much so, that if he fails to do the act for which he is employed, he is subjected in damages, though it might be apparent that nothing could have been recovered had the diligence been executed.—Chatto, 17th Jan. 1811. But an agent employed to conduct a case in the inferior Court has a very considerable amount of discretion committed to him. He is not bound to communicate with his client at each step of the process, and such communications would not be allowed in a question of expenses. Unless, therefore, he has acted collusively or fraudulently, the Sheriff is not disposed to hold that he renders himself liable to the client in damages by not proceeding with a proof which he regards as hopeless. Looking to the history of the previous processes, the Sheriff does not think that the agent committed any error by means of which any actual damage has arisen to the appellant."

not entitled to plead upon his denial of the averment that he had not intimated the proof; for he had nowhere condescended upon how or when, or even alleged that, he had intimated it. To make out her position that her agent, if in conducting her case he was guilty of crassa negligentia, was responsible for its loss, it was only incumbent to show that she had a fair case to litigate; and the defender, on whose advice she had brought the action, could not be heard to argue that it was one in which she could not possibly prevail.¹

Grigor.

The respondent pleaded;—In the first action against Brander, he had denied, on a reference to his oath, the averments made by the pursuer in the count and reckoning; and it was not to be supposed that, on a reference in the latter action, he would have admitted them. The respondent, in the exercise of his discretion, had been of opinion, 1st, that there were no writings, of which he was aware, that could prove his client's case; and 2d, that parole proof being incompetent, he was not bound to ask his client if she had witnesses to adduce. He had never been instructed that she had any documentary evidence; and at the date of the interlocutor allowing the proof, parties to the suit were not admissible as witnesses. The course he had taken was therefore the proper one to adopt in the discharge of his duty. He could not be blamed for want of professional skill in acting on an opinion that parole proof was incompetent, when the Sheriff-substitute's note showed that the same opinion was held by the Judge before whom he practised. That opinion was a sound one; but even assuming parole proof to have been competent, the advocator was bound to have condescended on what she could have proved by parole, or at least on the names of the witnesses she could have adduced, in order to make her allegations relevant to infer liability against the respondent for not giving her an opportunity of adducing them. Lastly, the averment that the respondent had failed to duly intimate the interlocutor to the advocator was denied, and probation had been renounced.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Whatever opinion I might form on the facts of this case, I could not adopt the doctrine of the Sheriff-depute, that an agent stopping short in a cause, and not going on to proof, so that the case is at once decided against his client, without previous communication to that client, shall not be liable in damages, unless he acted collusively or fraudulently. In many cases the partial abandonment of the cause without communication with the client, may at once be a ground of liability, although the agent bona fide believed that the case was hopeless. Having accepted the employment, communication with the client before the case is thrown up is in most circumstances a positive duty, especially when that client lives at the distance only of a few miles. But a great deal may depend on the nature of the case, the instructions received, and the character and conduct of the client. Neither am I at all disposed to allow more discretion to a country agent in regard to such a step without the knowledge of the client, than to an agent in this Court, especially if the latter has acted on the advice of counsel. It is true, as the Sheriff says, that the responsibility of an agent and of a messenger are not in the general case the same; and loss it may be necessary in most circumstances to prove in the case of the former, although that may not be required in the case of the latter. But, on the other hand, the liability of the agent may often be as broad as in the case of the messenger; and certainly one of the least favourable cases for the agent is to drop the cause after an interlocutor allowing a proof has been obtained, without the knowledge of or communication with his client, and without any pretext that an application for funds to assist him to go on has been neglected or been fruitless. Circumstances may justify such a step, and the character of the case may be an important matter for the agent in

No. 185. June 12, 1867. Urquhart v. Grigor. defending himself against liability. But the step is a strong proceeding, even when there is no reason to doubt that the agent acted as he believed for the best, and may often subject him at once in damages. It would have been a very strong proceeding in this case, when the agent undertook the action in question in the full knowledge by that time of the whole facts.

But after fully considering the case, I do not find proof, such as the Court can go on, that the agent did give up the action referred to without communication with the client or her brother; and the lapse of three years without complaint to or against the agent is a fact much in favour of the latter. Further, it would be necessary in such a case as the present to shew that there was proof which might have been adduced, and that loss and damage were sustained by the act of the agent in not having sufficient proof. Now, it is not made clear, or indeed properly stated, that any proof could have been adduced; and loss and damage in the circumstances of the cause referred to, through the case being dropped, has not been proved or rendered even probable. The notion of taking the amount of the bill for L.30 at once as the measure of damage is quite absurd in the circumstances.

Certainly the case is in a very unsatisfactory state; but that was the result of the joint act of the parties, concurring that the case should be decided without any further proof than is contained in the admissions and documents in process. Now I find no admission by the defender to the effect of supporting the action, as to the non-communication with the client, and no document which instructs the same.

A good deal of matter quite extraneous to the ground of action libelled on has been introduced into the discussion. But we can only proceed on the ground set forth in the summons, and I cannot say that the averments which I have read are proved.

The second ground, if it is a separate ground of liability, involves a very serious point as to an agent's responsibility. The defender reclaimed against the interlocutor circumducing and assoilzieing. So far as we can judge, the reclaiming petition stated a very reasonable view to the Sheriff-substitute; but he refused the petition. But the Sheriff-substitute, in his note in this case, having full knowledge of all the facts as to the claim against Brander, states in very decided terms that in that case parole proof would have been incompetent, and that it is not averred that the pursuer has given his agent any written documents to instruct a case which could not be proved by parole. This is very weighty testimony in favour of the defender, being the opinion of the Judge who refused that reclaiming petition, and who is a most experienced and intelligent person. The agent acquiesced in that interlocutor, and did not appeal to the Sheriff-depute. It cannot be maintained that an agent is bound to appeal every interlocutor, or to communicate with a client in regard to every interlocutor in the cause. On that subject the agent must have large discretion, and to hold him liable in damages because he acquiesces in the view of the Sheriff-substitute, is a view of an agent's position not warranted by any authority. Accordingly, no case ground in the pursuer's favour. Most have arisen from that act of the agent. The note shews that such loss was not sustained that interlocutor was an incautious and dishonesty and good faith of the agent is taining it.

It is very true that the situation of a country woman, must often be very true in a case being fought, he is often told of expense, and involved his poor client in the obstinacy of the client is the sole cause. The tendency of the Sheriff's note is to more absolute personal control and command sanction.

On the other hand, as to the act of the Sheriff-substitute, as the client availed himself of the skill and knowledge of the defender, he is entitled to say that he acted in his professional skill and his knowledge of defence is available to him.

I do not go on the explanation given to the Sheriff, at his desire, in the answers to the reclaiming petition. That statement is not proved, and, probable as it is, I do not rely upon it. The case was then a concluded cause.

Urquhart v.
Grigor.

It seems to me that there has been a sort of persecution of this agent, looking to the date and history of this alleged debt to the pursuer's father.

LORD MURRAY.—I have come to the same conclusion. The position of a party who acts as the agent of an ignorant woman is one of great responsibility; and her losing a debt to which she thought herself entitled, calls for our compassion; but compassion for her must not lead us to injure the defender by making him liable to her, unless that loss has been owing to his culpable neglect of the business he had undertaken.

But there must be some very serious instance of mismanagement before I would be inclined to hold that he has been guilty of crassa negligentia.

If a litigant has a good case, in which a proof is allowed, and the agent fails to do his duty in the way of preparing for and leading the proof, and does not intimate that he intends to give up the agency, that is a gross failure in the performance of his duty. But there must be something more condescended upon to show that the loss arose from such failure than we have in this case. I do not see sufficient reason for altering the judgments in the Court below; at the same time it is right to say, that if there had been made out a case of gross negligence, without any malice on the part of the defender, that would have been sufficient, in my view, to have made him liable for the debt which was lost through such negligence. But in the course of the whole of this process the pursuer has never made any clear statement of the proof by which her claim might have been established, or of any circumstances which, to my mind, bring home to the defender the charge of negligence preferred against him.

LORD WOOD.—I am of the same opinion. I certainly could not carry the protection of an agent as far as the learned Sheriff by his note would appear to do, if what is there stated were to be understood as a general proposition, viz., that to make an agent responsible for neglect of duty, it must be proved that he acted fraudulently or collusively. There may, I apprehend, be many acts of an agent in the conduct of a cause which might be said to amount to neglect of duty, but which, unless something special were qualified and proved in regard to them, would resolve merely into error in judgment; and, although the error in judgment were shewn to be a very manifest one, still I think that in such cases something more would require to be proved, and that it might be necessary to prove fraud or collusion.

Then, as regards the present case,—if it had been a fact in the case that no intimation had been made to the client of the interlocutors allowing a proof, and fixing a diet for proving, I should have been of opinion that the agent was liable for the loss the client had thereby sustained. But, although the case may be in a very unsatisfactory state for judgment, we must deal with it on the footing on which the Sheriff-substitute's note shews that it has been placed by the parties. The note bears (and its accuracy is not disputed) that the parties "agreed to take a judgment on the case as it stands, without any farther proof than is contained in the admissions and documents in process."

We are tied up to this; and it being so, it appears to me to be conclusive against the pursuer's claim as founded on the first alleged failure in duty by the defender, viz., the non-intimation of the interlocutors as to proof. The averment of non-intimation is denied by the defender. There is, therefore, no admission, and the documents afford no evidence of it. Non-intimation, therefore, cannot be taken as a fact in the case, and if it is not established, then the reverse must be held to be the fact, and so that ground of responsibility cannot be sustained.

It was indeed suggested, that to require the pursuer to instruct non-intimation was to put on her the proof of a negative, and that the onus lay on the defender. But, granting it were so, the question now is not who was bound to prove. That is excluded. The only question is, what is it that is admitted on the record or proved by the documents?

But, further, if there be no proof of non-intimation, the pursuer can, as it appears to me, have no case on the second alleged failure in duty on the part of the defender. For the second neglect of duty pleaded is not rested on the allegation that the defender failed to lead proof, of the existence of which he was aware; but that, by not intimating the interlocutors, he failed to give the pursuer an opportunity of putting him in possession of the evidence, or the names of the witnesses that would have been supplied, and that were ready at hand to be brought forward. But, in the absence of the fact of non-intimation, it cannot be so; and the defender avers that the pursuer had no evidence to adduce;—an averment which has not been met by any statement on the record that he was informed of any evidence. In this state of matters, I do not see how, on the admission or productions, any liability can attach to the defender on the second ground on which it is maintained.

As to Brander's deposition in the prior process, it was hardly contended that it was admissible. But, even if it were, the not making use of it would only amount to an error of judgment. Or, suppose the defender thought the oath negative, and that it would not avail as a foundation for the action, and that he was wrong in this, it appears from the Sheriff-substitute's note to the interlocutor of October 1856 that he was of the same opinion. Then, as to witnesses, and assuming he had been informed of any, and had not offered to adduce them because he thought parole proof inadmissible, he has the authority of the Sheriff-substitute in support of that view. And here I may observe, that the pursuer has not yet referred to any writings or witnesses by which it is said her claims could be instructed. But I apprehend that it would have been essential to do so when the alleged loss is stated to arise from the agents' neglect in not leading proof.

With regard to the third ground of liability, I entirely agree in the view which has been taken by your Lordships.

I have only to add, that it is a circumstance not a little remarkable, and which gives a very unfavourable impression of the whole case, that, while Brander was assuaged from the action against him in May 1853, and the expenses decreed for in July thereafter, the present action against the defender was not raised till 10th May 1856.

LORD COWAN.—On the only point of general interest involved in this case, I concur in the opinions of your Lordships. I cannot acquiesce in the ground of the judgment of the Sheriff-principal, as laid down by him in his note. There is no doubt that an agent must be allowed the exercise of a certain amount of discretion in the management of a case, and the distinction drawn by the Sheriff between the situation of an agent and of a messenger is well founded. But if an agent in the exercise of his discretion departs from the usual course of procedure, and acts with gross negligence, he will be responsible. I quite concur in your Lordship's repudiation of the Sheriff's opinion that the agent is not liable in this case, unless he has acted collusively or fraudulently; it is sufficient to render him responsible that he is chargeable with gross negligence in his conduct of the suit. On this principle we acted in the recent case that came before us from Aberdeen.

Your Lordships have gone into the facts, and hold that there was no gross negligence in this case. I differ from your Lordships, though I am, therefore, afraid that my views may be erroneous. I think there is enough to shew that this agent did not conduct the count and reckoning with a due regard to his client's interests, and that through his negligence those interests have been sacrificed. There had been a previous action against Brander based upon a loan, and, on a reference to his oath, the defender had distinctly avowed that he received the proceeds of the bill, and that that first action was necessarily cast, in which followed most naturally in the case of Brander. The question is—Did the agent in the latter action? He gets an interlocutor fixing the diet, and granting diligence, and he does not doubt that it was at that time in the case of the Sheriff-substitute that there should be a reference to the Sheriff with a reclaiming petition. He allows the second interlocutor after the term is circumvented, and the defender had led no evidence. This was all done by the agent, and without any intimation being opinion of the Sheriff-principal. The effect of this acquiescence was to make the judgment final.

I am of opinion that the agent was not justified in acting as he did without communicating with his client, and without authority so to act, express or implied.
 The averment is, that he did not so communicate. I hold that communication with her was his duty. She might have left her case to the defender's oath, and she ought to have had the opportunity given her of making a reference, especially considering the nature of the oath Brander had emitted in the former action. I hold that the onus of proving that he did communicate with his client lay on the defender. The pursuer cannot be held bound to prove a negative. It is the defender's case that he did communicate, and if he has failed in doing so, his defence falls, and his liability is clear. But he did not do so; and when called upon by the Sheriff, in the interlocutor ordering answers to the reclaiming petition, to explain "the grounds upon which no intimation was made to the pursuer of the proof allowed," he says, in his answers to the reclaiming petition, that he had no communication whatever with the petitioner, and he goes on to explain, that he had corresponded all along with her brother, and acted under his authority. If that were proved, it might justify the agent's actings, but there is no proof whatever of it, and even no averment about it upon the record, the allegation being made for the first time in the answers to the reclaiming petition.

I will only add one word more in reference to the extent of the damages claimed. I agree with the Chair, that this is not a case where the whole L.30 can be demanded as damages. Suppose an agent is employed to prosecute a claim alleged to amount to L.30, but takes no proper steps, and is guilty of gross negligence, it cannot be said that the measure of the mere claim, supported by no proof, is to be held the measure of the damage. It must be open for inquiry, what the true amount of the debt was for which decree might have been got, so as to fix the amount of damage incurred. At all events, this is a point that would be for serious consideration.

Trust—Judicial factor.—The Court, on the representation that a trust-settlement had been destroyed, and on the application of one of the parties who had been nominated trustees and certain of the beneficiaries, appointed a judicial factor interim to manage the trust-estate. The other parties who had been named trustees concurred in the appointment. Thereafter, the tenor of the trust-deed having been proved, and several of the parties named trustees having accepted, it was held that the appointment of a factor did not supersede the trust; and, therefore,
 on the application of the accepting trustees, it was recalled.

ON 20th February 1856, Lady Drummond and her two younger sons pre- June 13, 1857.
 sented a petition narrating, inter alia, that the late Sir Francis Walker 1st Division.
 Drummond had died in 1844, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, L.
 which had since been destroyed by two of the parties nominated trustees;
 that the wishes and directions of Sir Francis had been entirely frustrated; that his heritable and personal estates had been possessed, and, to a great

No. 186. extent, sold, and diverted from the purposes to which they were destined; that large and serious losses had arisen to the estate; and that the wreck of the estates themselves was on the eve of being sold for payment of the debts of the heir-at-law, in whose person titles had been made up, in disregard of the terms of the settlement. The petition therefore prayed for the appointment of a judicial factor with the usual powers, "to the intent and effect that he might execute the trust, and fulfil the several purposes thereof." They stated that none of the parties "named as trustees in the trust-deed of Sir F. W. Drummond have accepted the trust, and that the trust cannot be carried into effect without the intervention of the Court."

June 13, 1857.
Drummond v.
Lindsay.

The petition implicated Sir James Drummond and Mr Melville, W.S., the latter of whom, it was also alleged, was very largely indebted to the trust-estate.

Answers were lodged by these parties, and also by the petitioner William Douglas Dick, and thereafter, of consent, the Court, on 11th March 1856, appointed Mr Lindsay, accountant, to be judicial factor, with the usual powers, and decerned ad interim.

Thereafter the same parties who had petitioned for Mr Lindsay's appointment raised an action of proving the tenor of the trust-disposition and settlement,—which action was unopposed; and, on 28th February 1857, the Court found the casus omissiois and the tenor of the trust-deed proved. By that deed Lady Drummond and William Douglas Dick were appointed trustees along with Sir James Drummond and Mr Melville, and full powers of administration and management were conferred on the trustees.

This petition was now presented by Lady Drummond and Mr Dick as "accepting trust-disponees and executors," with concurrence of the testator's younger sons, for recall of Mr Lindsay's appointment, on the ground that he was not appointed for the purpose of carrying out, and had not the power to carry out, the purposes of the trust-settlement; that, at the time of presenting the petition for the appointment, Lady Drummond and Mr Dick had no title under which they could accept the office of trustees and executors under the trust-disposition and settlement. But, the tenor of that deed being proved, they had now accepted of the office, and were the only accepting trustees and executors under the deed; and, in order to their being fully vested in the trust-estate, it was necessary that the appointment of judicial factor should be recalled.

Answers were lodged by Mr Lindsay, stating that he had no personal wish to continue in office or to resign.

Answers were also lodged by Mr Melville, who objected to the recall of the appointment, because (1.) It was made on the application, and with the consent of the present petitioners; (2.) Because it was not contemplated to be of a temporary but a permanent nature. Otherwise, it would have been opposed by him; (3.) That circumstances had not changed since the appointment in 1856, nor from what they had been for some years previously. Lady Drummond and the petitioners had the draft of the trust-deed in their possession, and might at any time have accepted, but they had practically renounced the office of trustees and executors by assenting for twelve years to a family arrangement, by which the trust-deed was laid aside. They were also liable to personal exceptions of a serious nature; (4.) That the disputes and differences which had arisen between the trustees nominated by Sir Francis Drummond were such as to render it necessary for the benefit of the estate and of all concerned, that the management should remain in neutral hands.

He declined to act as a trustee, and he now judicially minuted that declinature, but he pleaded, that he was entitled to oppose this application, which evidently had for its object the personal aims of the petitioners, and to enable them the more effectually to harass him. They had already brought actions against him, concluding for L.100,000, and it was therefore plainly expedient that the estate should be managed by a neutral third party. It was on the footing that the trustees had all declined that the appointment had been asked for and consented to.

No. 186;

Drummond v.
Lindsay.

The petitioners pleaded;—That the factor had been appointed to preserve what was practically an intestate estate, but which was so no longer. There was therefore no necessity for his continuance in office. His appointment was not inconsistent with the subsequent vesting of the trustees. Mr Melville, who had been named a trustee, declined to act. He had therefore neither title nor interest to object.

The judicial factor declined to take part in the discussion.

Of this date the case was advised,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—There has been a material change of circumstances since this appointment was made. The trust-deed has been set up. It was then non-existent. If it had then existed, and the parties who applied for this appointment being themselves trustees, had made the application on the ground that none of the trustees had accepted, I would have construed that into a declinature on their part to accept. But that was not the case, and that is not the construction to be put on the words of the application, “that the trust could not be carried into effect without the intervention of the Court.” The petitioners have invoked the intervention of the Court, and have proved the tenor of the trust-deed, and although a judicial factor is appointed, with the usual powers for the management of a trust-estate, it does not follow that if a trust-deed be discovered, or the tenor of it proved, the parties named trustees are not to give effect to that deed. The object of the appointment was said to be to give effect to the purposes of the testator. But we did not accede to that. It would have been very dangerous to do so, not knowing whether the averments regarding the trust-deed were correct or not. But it was quite necessary in the circumstances that a judicial factor should be appointed to preserve the estate, and we made the appointment, with the ordinary powers, for that purpose. But the tenor of the trust-deed being now proved, I do not think that parties are barred by that appointment from now giving effect to the trust-deed by accepting the office of trustees and executors conferred on them.

Mr Melville may have exercised a sound discretion in declining to be a trustee, but we have no authority for saying that “the trustees” are at such variance amongst themselves in regard to the management of the trust-estate, that the appointment of a neutral party to manage it is necessary. We cannot give effect to that argument, and therefore, in my opinion, there is no sufficient ground for continuing this appointment.

LORD IVORY.—I am entirely of the same opinion. When the case was formerly here there was no subsisting deed of trust effective as a managing title. Nothing could be done under it. The parties nominated trustees could have taken no step for recovery of debts nor removing of tenants. They could have done nothing practical at all. If they had then brought a proving of the tenor, the same appointment of a manager for the preservation of the estate might have been necessary; and it is impossible, now that the trust-deed is set up, to say that the parties who asked for an interim management, when there was no existing title, shall be debarred from coming forward, now that there is an existing title, and acting under it.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I concur.

LORD DEAS.—I agree. The only ground on which we could have appointed a factor to supersede the trust-deed would have been that the whole trustees had declined to accept. Now these parties, when they petitioned for this appointment, perhaps did not contemplate accepting, and possibly it would have been better for all parties that the judicial management should continue. But we have nothing to do with that. The petitioners are entitled to change their mind, so long as there has been no declinature to accept, and what we have to do with is not so much the mind of the trustees as of the testator, who desired that his estate should be managed by them. That must be carried into effect, unless the trustees have placed themselves in a position to bar them from acting under the trust. I do not think that they have done so. There was no per-

No. 186. manency in the appointment itself so long as it was in the power of the trustees to accept.

THE Glasgow, Paisley, and Greenock Railway Company obtained an Act, which provided, "That the slope of all cuttings and embankments formed on the estates of Lord Blantyre shall, at the expense of the said Company, be dressed and finished, and afterwards maintained in a neat and sufficient manner; and where not in rock, such slopes shall be sown and soiled and maintained in grass, and the said Company shall not be entitled to make any use of the slopes of such cuttings and embankments as may become their property, except by planting the same with consent in writing of the said Lord Blantyre, his heirs and successors, or by cutting the grass thereof."

Blantyre v.

Glasgow,

Paisley, and

Greenock

Railway Co.

In an action by Lord Blantyre to enforce this obligation, the Lord Ordinary made a remit for the purpose of distinguishing what was matter of fact from what was matter of opinion as to the state of the railway slopes and embankments. Various reports were made, the last of which contained the following passage in reference to that part of the railway—" (1), Between Bishopton Bridge and the mouth of the tunnel; and (2), the part of the line north of the tunnel entrance. In regard to both portions, the reporters have to report that the slopes lying between the top of the rock on each side of the railway, and the walls which separate the defenders' grounds from the adjacent fields, have not been formed by cutting these slopes out of the rock, but by placing the debris or excavations from the railway above the soil which was previously there:—That so far as the reporters can now ascertain, the top soil of the railway was not preserved separately or laid on the slopes,—the slopes being formed by throwing up the materials excavated from the railway, generally consisting of rock-sand and earth, and which slopes were afterwards roughly dressed or levelled in some parts, while in others nothing appears to have been done in addition to throwing down the materials. These slopes are now generally covered with rough natural grass, interspersed with broom and furze bushes, while in part large stones are seen protruding."

On 5th June 1855 the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor, in which, after findings as to the obligations imposed on the Railway Company, and a finding that "the slopes above the cuttings between Bishopton Bridge and the mouth of the tunnel, and to the north of the tunnel entrance, are to be viewed as 'in rock,' within the meaning of the Act of Parliament, and that therefore the obligation 'to sow, soil, and maintain in grass,' as distinct from the obligation to 'dress, finish, and maintain in a neat and sufficient manner,' does not apply to them," he "decerns and ordains the defenders, at their own expense, to soil and sow in grass the slopes of the embankments, and also any slopes of cuttings which may not be in rock, and to dress, finish, and maintain the same in a neat and sufficient manner, and to take such steps in relation to the walls of the embankments as may be necessary for these purposes, provided the same do not affect the security of the railway, or the safety of the public; with this view, appoints the said operations to be performed at the sight of Mr Henry Wylie, civil engineer," &c.*

Both parties reclaimed against the interlocutor, so far as adverse to them. The reclaiming note for the Railway Company was refused without discussion, but in defence against the reclaiming note for Lord Blantyre, they pleaded;—That the entrance and exit of the tunnel were properly in rock, and so where there was a perpendicular rock-cutting, with a slope at the top, that was equally to be considered "in rock." With regard to the slope of the embankments, the Railway Company were not bound to make them an ornament to the landscape. All they were bound to do was to prevent their being an eyesore, or, at most, to keep them in accordance with the surrounding country, which was here not in a state of high cultivation. The embankments being covered with rough natural grass, intermixed with furze and broom, sufficiently fulfilled the requirements of the statute.

* "NOTE.—The Act of Parliament does not contain any obligation to construct the railway in any particular manner, so as to afford any specified angles for slopes; and accordingly, if the fact were, that, as the line has been formed, the dressing and maintaining in grass was impossible, the Lord Ordinary would not have considered the defenders bound to reconstruct the railway; but impossibility is not alleged, and as regards the slopes of the embankments, it is clear that the defenders have not fulfilled their obligation, and that they can do so if they take certain steps suggested by the reporters."

Blantyre v.
Glasgow,
Paisley, and Greenock
Railway Co.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The defenders are bound by their Act to sow and soil, as well as to dress, finish, and maintain “in a neat and sufficient manner,” all slopes, although formed of debris of rock, such not being to be viewed as “in rock” in the sense of the Act.

LORD DEAS.—I am of the same opinion on both views of the argument. I think, even if the statutory obligation of the Company were to be read as they read it, they have not fulfilled that obligation. Materials for arriving at this conclusion are afforded by both reports. For both shew that the natural soil on the slopes has been covered by debris from the rock cuttings, and then some parts roughly dressed or levelled, and some not at all,—leaving large stones protruding,—which certainly cannot be said to be dressing and finishing the slopes in a neat and sufficient manner, as the Company admit they were bound to do by the Act of Parliament. But I think, farther, that the statutory obligation of the Company was, according to the plain, natural, and grammatical construction of the words used, an obligation to sow, soil, and maintain in grass all the slopes which are not on rock. I do not say another construction might not be put on the words if this construction were shewn to be extravagant or absurd. But that is not the case, and therefore the words must receive their natural meaning.

LORDS IVORY and CURRIEHILL concurred.

THE COURT repelled the defence, and pronounced the following interlocutor:—“Recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against: Find that the defenders are bound by the Act of Parliament quoted in the summons, under which their line of railway has been constructed, to dress, finish, and maintain in a neat and sufficient manner the slopes of all cuttings and embankments formed on the estates of the pursuer: Find that where such slopes of cuttings are not ‘in rock,’ the defenders are bound to sow, soil, and maintain them in grass: Find that the slopes above the cuttings between Bishopton Bridge and the mouth of the tunnel, and to the north of the tunnel entrance, are not to be viewed as ‘in rock’ within the meaning of the Act of Parliament, and therefore that the obligation ‘to sow, soil, and maintain in grass,’ as distinct from the obligation ‘to dress, finish, and maintain in a neat and sufficient manner,’ applies to them: Find that the slopes, both of cuttings and of embankments, have not been sowed, soiled, and maintained in grass, in terms of the Act; and that in reference to all these slopes, such sowing, soiling, and maintaining in grass, is necessary to the dressing, finishing, and maintaining in a neat and sufficient manner: Find that it is not alleged by the defenders that the steepness of the slopes of the embankment is such as to render it impossible to dress them and maintain them in grass in all respects according to the Act: Therefore, decern and ordain the defenders, at their own expense, to soil and sow in grass the slopes both of the cuttings and of the embankments, so far as practicable, and to dress, finish, and maintain the same in a neat and sufficient manner, and to take such steps in relation to the walls of the embankments as may be necessary for those purposes, provided the same do not affect the security of the railway, or the safety of the public; and appoint all the said operations to be performed at the sight of Mr Henry Wylie, civil engineer, who is hereby empowered to give such directions to the defenders as he may consider necessary and proper for carrying into effect the foregoing decerniture, and is ordained to report to the Court quoad primus how far the said decerniture has or has not been implemented: Find the defenders liable to the pursuer in expenses of process incurred by him to this date: Allow an account thereof to be given in, and remit to the auditor to tax the same when lodged, and to report.”

THE REV. JAMES GRANT, Respondent.—D. F. Inglis—Cook.

June 20, 1857.

Process—Relevancy—Proof before answer.—A debtor in a bond to the Ministers' Widows' Fund suspended a threatened charge by the collector for interest, on the ground that he had already paid the interest to the charger's clerk, and got a receipt, which the charger alleged was forged. The suspension also proceeded on the ground that the clerk was the agent of the charger, duly authorised and accredited to receive payment. The charger denied the alleged employment and agency, but not the fact of payment;—Held (altering judgment of Lord Neaves, dis. Lord Ivory), that before disposing of the question of forgery, there ought not to be a judgment on the relevancy of the other reasons of suspension, but that the real state of the facts should be ascertained before deciding whether the clerk was or was not in law to be held as the agent of the charger, or as authorised and accredited by the charger to receive payment for him.

THE Earl of Galloway brought this suspension of a threatened charge by Dr Grant, as collector of the Widows' Fund for the Church of Scotland, for L.173, 12s., being the half-year's interest due 1st May 1854 upon a bond for L.9920, granted in 1827 by the late Earl and the complainer in favour of the then collector of the Widows' Fund, and his successors in office. The reasons of suspension, after setting forth the loan, were as follow:—

1st Division.
Lord Neaves.
C.

“Art. 2. The respondent Dr Grant has, during the last ten years, been collector of the funds belonging to the Ministers' Widows' Fund. His office, or place of business, as collector during that time was, and still is, situated in North St David Street, Edinburgh; and part of the same house or office was, and still is, occupied by Mr John Mackenzie Junner, S.S.C., who and his clerks acted as the clerks of the respondent in his capacity of collector foresaid, and were and are employed and authorised by him to collect the funds belonging to the said Ministers' Widows' Fund.

“Art. 3. The practice in the office of the respondent, as collector of the Ministers' Widows' Fund, in regard to the sums secured on loan belonging to said fund (which are of large amount) has been, during the said period, and down to June 1854, as follows:—Receipts were written out in the office of the respondent, or of Mr Junner, by the clerks employed by them, from forms furnished or adopted by the respondent, for the half-yearly payments of the interest on the said loans; which receipts, signed by the respondent, were entrusted to clerks employed by or for behoof of the respondent, and authorised by him to receive payment of the said interests. The interests were not collected or received by the respondent personally.

“Art. 4. The complainer's successive agents, Mr John Russell, Messrs John and Alexander Russell, and Messrs Russells and Nicolson, have been in the almost invariable practice, from the date of the said bond, to pay the termly interests due to the Ministers' Widows' Fund, by delivering a cheque for the sum on their bank account, to the clerk of the respondent, or of Mr Junner, acting for and authorised by the respondent, who thereupon handed them a receipt for the amount; and these clerks were understood to be, and as a point of fact were, the agents authorised and accredited by the respondent to receive said termly payments of interest. The demand for payment of the interest due half-yearly, on 1st May and 1st November, was not in general made until some days thereafter, and generally of dates between the 12th and 19th of said months respectively, although the drafts by the complainer's agents for the amount of the interests were frequently written out on the same day of Whitsunday or Martinmas, so as to be ready for delivery when same were called for.—Ans. 4. Admitted that the interest due by the complainer was not always or generally demanded on the very day on which arrangement the same was payable. Admitted that the complainer's debts generally paid by draft, with the explanation that in every instance,

No. 190. and in whatever form payment was made, it was invariably upon a receipt signed by the respondent as collector. Quoad ultra denied.

June 20, 1857.
Earl of Gallo-
way v. Grant.

“ Art. 5. In May 1854, a clerk of the name of Ollason, who was employed in the office of the respondent, or of Mr Junner, and who had been employed by or for behoof of the respondent on several former occasions, to collect the interests due on loans made by the Ministers’ Widows’ Fund, was entrusted by the respondent, or the said John Mackenzie Junner acting for and authorised by the respondent, with receipts for said interests, written out by Ollason, or by some other clerk in the office of the respondent, or of Mr Junner, and signed by the respondent; and Ollason was empowered or employed by the respondent, or by Mr Junner, acting for and authorised by the respondent, to apply for, and on the respondent’s account as collector foresaid to receive, payment of the said termly interests due in or about the month of May 1854.—Ans. 5. Denied.

“ Art. 6. On the 19th of May 1854, Ollason was in possession of several receipts for interests due to the Ministers’ Widows’ Fund, signed by the respondent; and, among others, a receipt for the half-year’s interest of the said loan of L.9920 payable by the complainer, and was empowered or employed by the respondent, and by the said John Mackenzie Junner, acting and authorised as aforesaid, or by one or other of them, to receive payment of said interest. On that day Ollason, while in possession of the receipt signed by the respondent for the interest due by the complainer, called at the office of the complainer’s agents, Messrs Russells and Nicolson, for payment of said interest.—Ans. 6. Denied that Ollason was empowered or employed by the respondent, or by Mr Junner acting for and authorised by the respondent, to receive payment of the interest due by the complainer in May last. Quoad ultra, not known and not admitted.

“ Art. 7. Ollason, on said 19th May, presented a receipt apparently having the respondent’s signature to it, as collector of the Widows’ Fund, which is expressed in the following terms, the proper and usual terms of the receipts granted to the complainer’s agents for this interest.—(Here the receipt was inserted.)

“ Art. 8. The complainer’s agents, believing that Ollason was authorised by the respondent, as a trustworthy person, to receive payment of the interest due on said loan, as on former occasions, handed a draft on their bank account with the Union Bank of Scotland for L.168, 10s. 9d., in payment of said interest, in favour of the respondent or bearer, and Ollason handed to the complainer’s agents the receipt above quoted, apparently bearing the respondent’s signature.—Ans. 7 and 8. The respondent has no knowledge of the matters set forth in these articles, except through the statements of the complainer; but it is believed to be true, that on or about the date herein mentioned, Ollason exhibited to the complainer’s agents the pretended receipt herein referred to, and that they paid to him the sum specified in the said document, which Ollason at the same time handed to them. Denied that the said document bears the signature of the respondent. Not known whether the complainer’s agents believed that Ollason was authorised by the respondent to receive payment of the said interest. Denied that he was authorised, or that the respondent had given the complainer’s agents any cause to believe that he was so.”

The complainer then set forth that the money was again sent for on 23d May “by the respondent, or by Mr Junner as acting for the respondent;”—that his agents were then told by Junner that a forgery had been committed—“that they communicated with the police, and ascertained that a criminal charge against Ollason had been preferred;—that no farther communication was made to them till 31st May, when the respondent addressed a letter to them demanding payment, but that, in consequence of the delay to take measures against Ollason, he escaped from the country; and after detailing a correspondence which then ensued between the complainer's agents and the respondent, the complainer stated:—"Art. 17. Ollason was sent by the respondent, or by Mr Junner, as acting for and authorised by him, with instructions to apply for and receive payment of the interest due by the complainer; and he was the respondent's agent for that purpose.—Ans. 17. Denied.

No. 190.

June 20, 1857.
Earl of Gallo-
way v. Grant.

"Art. 18. The receipt delivered by Ollason to the complainer's agent was written in the same terms as the receipts formerly issued from the respondent's office, and in the same handwriting as the receipts subscribed with the respondent's genuine signature; and the signature, 'James Grant,' subscribed thereto, appears to be the genuine signature of the respondent."

The complainers then stated that similar receipts had been presented to other persons with a like result, and,—“Art. 20. Assuming, but not admitting, that the receipt handed by the respondent's agent, Ollason, was forged, still the payment made to Ollason was made by the complainer's agent in bona fide, and believing that Ollason was the respondent's agent, which in point of fact he was; and the payment was obtained by the fraud of Ollason, the respondent's agent, and in consequence of facilities afforded to Ollason for the commission of said fraud by and through the negligence of the respondent, as collector foresaid, or of Mr Junner, his clerk, acting for and authorised by him.”—Ans. 20. The respondent does not doubt the bona fides of the complainer's agent. Quoad ultra denied.

The complainer pleaded;—1. The interest threatened to be charged for, having been paid by his agents to Ollason, who was empowered or employed by the respondent, or by Mr Junner, acting for and authorised by him to receive the same, and Ollason having delivered a receipt therefor bearing the signature of the respondent, the threatened charge ought to be suspended. 2. Assuming but not admitting that the respondent's signature to the receipt so delivered to the complainer's agents, is not the genuine signature of the respondent, and that Ollason has not accounted to the respondent for the money paid to him, the respondent must bear the loss occasioned by the fraud of his agent Ollason, more particularly as facilities for the perpetration of said fraud were afforded by and through the negligent conduct of the respondent, or of Mr Junner, his clerk, or one or other of them. 3. The respondent, or Mr Junner, his clerk, acting for him, having, after the discovery of the alleged fraud committed by Ollason, his agent, delayed to communicate the same to the complainer's law-agents, and having, without consulting the complainer's law-agents, taken measures as for his own behoof—which resulted in Ollason having time to make his escape—is not now entitled to subject the complainer or his agents in the loss occasioned by said fraud.

The respondent stated, that only one receipt for the interest due by the complainer had been signed by him, and it was still in Mr Junner's hands on 23d May, while on the other hand he had not received the money for which it should have been exchanged. “It followed that the complainer's agents, if they had parted with the money, had been defrauded by the exhibition of a false receipt, and that this money was probably in the hands of the party by whom this fraud had been perpetrated.”

He pleaded;—(1.) That payment on a forged receipt is no payment to the creditor whose name is forged, and does not liberate the debtor. (2.) Payment, although made in bona fide to a party supposed to be, but who is not the agent for the creditor, is no payment to the creditor, and does not liberate the debtor. (3.) The pretended receipt held by the complainer being a forgery, with which the respondent is in no way connected, and for

No. 190. which he is in no respect responsible, it cannot be set up on any ground as evidence of payment against the respondent. (4.) The complainer not having paid the interest in question to the respondent, or any agent authorised by the respondent to receive payment, is now liable in payment of the same.

Earl of Gallo-
way v. Grant.

On 6th March 1855, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that apart from the question as to the genuineness of the charger's alleged signature to the receipt for the payment in dispute, no relevant ground has been stated by the suspender for suspending the threatened charge complained of: Therefore repels the reasons of suspension except in so far as depending on the genuineness of the said signature, and decerns, and appoints the case to be enrolled for further procedure." *

* "NOTE.—The suspender is threatened to be charged for payment of a sum of interest as due on a bond granted by him to the Ministers' Widows' Fund, of which the charger is collector. In defence against the threatened charge, the suspender alleges that he paid the interest in question to a clerk of the name of Ollason, employed under the charger, and he refers to a receipt for the amount purporting to be subscribed by the charger. If that receipt is genuine, the suspender must prevail. The charger, however, alleges that the signature adhibited to it is forged, and this question may ultimately need to be disposed of in the case, either by the suspender admitting the forgery, or by an investigation being made into the state of the fact.

"But before disposing of the question of forgery, the suspender, with the concurrence of the charger, was desirous to have a judgment on the relevancy of the other statements made by him in his reasons of suspension, and the Lord Ordinary has disposed of this matter by the interlocutor now pronounced.

"The reasons of suspension referred to, may be reduced to several heads indicated by the three special pleas which the suspender has put upon record.

"1st, The first ground of suspension seems to be that Ollason having been employed to receive payment of the interest in question, and having given the receipt founded on for the money, the payment is good.

"It does not, however appear, that the record raises any case of general authority on the part of Ollason to receive or discharge the interest. It is not said that Ollason had power himself to grant receipts, nor did the suspender pay on Ollason's own receipt. The allegation is, that according to the practice of the party, 'receipts were written out in the office of the respondent, or of Mr Junner, by the clerks employed by them, from forms furnished or adopted by the respondent, for the half-yearly payments of the interest on the said loans, which receipts, signed by the respondent, were intrusted to clerks employed by or for behoof of the respondent, and authorised by him to receive payment of the said interests.' The nature of this allegation obviously is, that the clerks were merely employed to receive the money from the debtors of the fund upon delivering, and in exchange for a receipt signed by the charger, and it seems impossible to hold that upon that footing any clerk had authority to bind the charger, by taking money either upon his own receipt, or upon a receipt to which the charger's genuine signature was not attached.

"But the suspender under this plea has also contended that Ollason's position was such as to accredit him to third parties, and create a guarantee that whatever receipt he might tender should be held as genuine. The Lord Ordinary, however, cannot find sufficient grounds in the suspender's allegations to justify any such view. There may possibly be cases where a clerk or collector is so introduced and recommended as to entitle third parties implicitly to rely on the correctness of all his actings and representations. But no such specialty seems here to be set forth, and the plea must therefore be bad, unless it can be held that any clerk or servant employed to receive money upon his master's genuine receipts, can equally discharge the debt by giving a receipt where the signature is forged. The Lord Ordinary is not prepared to adopt such a proposition.

"It is obvious that the onus allegandi here lies on the suspender. He is due this money if he cannot show that he has duly paid it either to the charger or to a way v. Grant.

The complainer reclaimed, and pleaded;—That he had set forth relevant grounds of suspension. In equity the burden of the loss should fall on the respondent, whose servant committed the forgery, rather than on the complainer, against whom no want of caution was alleged. But authority to receive payment, and a presumption that the document offered as a receipt was genuine, might be raised up by the course of practice; and such receipt, though forged, might yet protect the party who made the payment against a second payment. The complainer's averments brought this case within that category. There might be such prior accrediting as would make a forged receipt equivalent to a good one.¹ The argument of the respondent denied the effect of such accrediting in any possible case; for the respondent said that the party who presented the forged document was not within his mandate. In point of fact, that was tantamount to saying that there could be no prior accrediting. The general rule that payment on a forged document would not avail was undoubted. But it was equally true that there were cases in which prior accrediting would avail. Had Ollason, a stranger to the complainer and his agents, presented a forged receipt, and they had accepted it in exchange for their money, the loss must have fallen on them; but that was not the case averred in record. Ollason had been employed on former occasions to collect this money. He was accredited to person authorised to receive it. The only receipt he exhibits is one bearing the charger's signature; but if that is not a genuine receipt, he must condescend on far and specific circumstances which will rear up the forged document into the position of a genuine one. This the Lord Ordinary thinks he has not done.

"2d, The second ground of suspension seems to be that the charger must suffer the fraud of Ollason as his agent, particularly as facilities were afforded for the perpetration of it by his own conduct.

"The extent and effect of Ollason's agency has been already noticed, and it is only necessary here to add, that the Lord Ordinary sees no cause of fault made out on the charger's part as affording facilities for the fraud here committed. Ollason was employed in the office of Mr Junner, who is clerk to the charger, in his capacity of collector. Ollason had thus the means of seeing what was done, and the opportunity of imitating the charger's handwriting, but no facility was given in this respect, beyond what may exist in any similar department, and therefore no farther responsibility seems to rest on the charger than what the general rules of law impose on a creditor. If Ollason had improperly procured a genuine receipt by the charger, and embezzled the money after he had received it on delivery of such receipt, the suspender's pleas would have been applicable. He would have been bound to exhibit a good voucher, and he could have pleaded the practice as a sufficient warrant for his dealing with the bearer of that document. But the case would have rested on the delivery of the genuine receipt, and the delivery of a receipt with a forged signature cannot have a similar effect.

"3d, The third plea is founded on alleged mora or neglect on the part of the charger or his agents after the fraud had been committed.

Such a case of personal exception may no doubt be made out against a party whose name has been forged, and who, after knowing the fact, allows the party charged to remain ignorant of the fraud until some prejudice is done by the delay.

But no facts seem here to be stated sufficient to support such a plea.

It is not alleged that either the charger or Mr Junner knew of the forgery on the 23d of May, and on the same day, it is admitted that the suspender was made aware that a forgery had been committed, and communicated with the police on the subject. It is said, indeed, that Mr Junner then stated that he did not know on whom the loss would fall. But what passed was enough to put the suspender on his guard, and on his inquiry as to his own position and risk of liability.

Altogether then, apart from the question as to the genuineness of the receipt, the Lord Ordinary sees no ground of suspension here stated, that can, in his opinion, be remitted for proof or investigation as relevant."

Orr and Barbour v. the Union Bank of Scotland, 31st Jan. 1852, ante, vol. xiv. 95, H. L., 7th August 1854.

No. 190. June 20, 1857.
Earl of Gallo-
way v. Grant. receive it, and it was not even necessary in this case to shew a receipt in order to prove payment by the complainer. But if necessary for the complainer's discharge to shew a receipt, it was no answer on the part of the respondent to say that Ollason's mandate was to give a genuine receipt, and that having acted beyond his mandate in giving a forged receipt, the complainer shall be liable. If the question be limited to this, whether Ollason acted beyond his mandate, no master would ever be liable for his servant's misconduct, for the answer would always be conclusive that the servant acted beyond his mandate. Here the authority to draw the money was admitted. But why stop there? Was Ollason not accredited to give a receipt as well? No doubt the respondent intended that his servant should give a good receipt, but the authority to receive payment could not be separated from the authority to give a receipt. Ollason was equally accredited to do both things, and if he acted improperly in that matter, and if there be no blame imputable to the party who paid, the impropriety of the servant must fall on the master, and not on the innocent party who paid the money.

Pleaded for the respondent;—The averments on record fall short of imputing to the receipt in question the character of a good document, or of attaching to Ollason such authority to receive the money, as if the respondent himself had called for payment of it. They amount only to this, that Ollason had authority to exchange for the money a receipt containing the genuine signature of Dr Grant. The creditor in the bond says that he has not received payment. The argument of the debtor is, that he has done something which as in a question between him and the creditor is equivalent to payment. The thing alleged was payment to somebody else who was entitled to receive payment, and the broad question therefore was, whether there was payment to a party entitled to receive payment as for the creditor in the obligation? A clerk in the respondent's office was sent with a receipt to exchange it for money. What was the position of that clerk? He was said, not as a matter of fact, but as an inferential statement, to be the agent for the respondent. He was not. He was a messenger; just the same as a person sent to the bank to draw a cheque and bring the money to the respondent. He was no doubt a messenger of trust. But the trust reposed in him was simply that he would bring the money to the respondent, and not embezzle it. That being so, if he imposes on another person, be it by forgery or anything else, shall I be responsible? It was here assumed that Ollason was in possession of the receipt, which ought to have been given to the complainer. If that was the case intended to be made by the complainer, the averments did not cover it. It was not said that Ollason was in possession of two receipts—a forged receipt and a genuine receipt (art. 6). But the complainer says that the receipt was genuine; therefore there was no question how far a party entrusted as a messenger with a genuine receipt, having forged and embezzled the money, would render his employer responsible.

On 28th January 1857, the Court pronounced the following interlocutor:—“In respect of the special circumstances of the case, they, before answer allow the suspender to give in a minute, setting forth the additions or alterations which he proposes to make in explanation of his statements in the closed record, and appoint the minute to be lodged within ten days.”

In accordance with that interlocutor the following minute was lodged:—“1. The respondent never has personally collected the half-yearly sums of interests payable to him as collector of the Ministers' Widows' Fund, or loans from that fund. He always intrusted the duty of collecting these interests to Mr Junner and his clerks. In point of fact, these interests were in use to be paid to and received by the clerks of Mr Junner, who, with the respondent's knowledge, were habitually sent for that purpose to the office of the several agents of the persons to whom the respondent, and his predecessors in office, had lent the funds under their charge as collectors; and these clerks, on payment of the interest being made to them, were in use to deliver to the agent making the payment, a receipt signed or bearing to be signed by the respondent, acknowledging payment of such interest. 2. James Greig Ollason had been in Mr Junner's office for about four years prior to Whitsunday 1854, and had been frequently employed by the respondent, or by Mr Junner with the respondent's knowledge, to apply for payment of the interests due by those who had borrowed money from the Ministers' Widows' Fund. Ollason was frequently employed to write the receipts for the respondent's signature. On or before Whitsunday 1854, he wrote all the receipts for the interests payable in the month of May of that year, including those which were in use to be paid by Messrs Russells and Nicolson, C.S., Mr Alexander Stevenson, W.S., and Mr George Wedderburn, W.S., for their respective clients; and all the receipts so written by Ollason were signed by the respondent, Dr Grant. 3. Ollason was employed by the respondent, or by Mr Junner with the knowledge of the respondent, at various dates in the said month of May, to go to the several agents above named, and to other agents, and to require them to pay to him, as representing the respondent, the interests due by their respective clients, and Ollason was employed as aforesaid to receive payment of these interests. 4. When Ollason called at the office of Messrs Russells and Nicolson, the agents of the suspender, on the 19th May 1854, and asked them for payment of the interest due by the suspender, Ollason had in his possession a receipt written by him, and signed by the respondent, for the interest due by the suspender. 5. Messrs Russells and Nicolson had for a number of years before Whitsunday 1854, paid the interests due by the suspender to clerks sent by the respondent, or by Mr Junner as acting for the respondent; and, having reason to believe that Ollason was authorised or accredited by the respondent to receive the interest due by the suspender in May 1854 (which was the case), they handed to him, as representing the respondent, a draft on the Union Bank of Scotland for the amount; and Ollason then gave them a receipt, the body of which is in his own handwriting, bearing a signature purporting to be that of the respondent, and in all respects similar to his genuine signature, which the suspender's agents at the time believed, and still believe, to be his genuine signature. 6. Ollason was authorised to ask and receive payment of the said interest, as representing the charger; and in taking payment of the interest from the suspender's agents, Ollason acted in accordance with his instructions. Assuming, but not admitting, that, as alleged by the respondent, the receipt handed by Ollason to the charger's agents has not the genuine signature of the respondent attached thereto, Ollason, as agent of the respondent, disobeyed his instructions by withholding the genuine receipt and giving a forged receipt in exchange for the money paid by the suspender's agents; and the suspender reserves his right to insist for delivery of the genuine receipt. 7. The interest due by Mr Stevenson's clients was paid to Ollason on the 17th day of May 1854. The interest due by Mr Wedderburn's client was paid to Ollason on the 3th day of the same month. At the time when these payments were made to Mr Stevenson and Mr Wedderburn to Ollason, he was in possession of receipts for the respective amounts written by him and signed by the respondent. The receipts given by Ollason to Mr Stevenson and Mr Wedderburn were in Ollason's handwriting; and a signature was attached to each, purporting to be the respondent's genuine signature, and which these gentlemen believed, and still believe to be his genuine signature. 8. The respondent did not himself generally attend to his duties in the collection or receipt of interests payable to the Ministers' Widows' Fund. In particular, he was absent from his office, from the 13th, to or about the 25th May 1854. He

No. 190. did not sufficiently inquire as to the character of Ollason, as a person worthy of trust; and the remuneration paid to Ollason by the respondent or Mr Junner was inadequate and insufficient for the services of a proper person intrusted with the discharge of such responsible duties; and while the respondent had taken caution from Mr Junner for his actings and intrusions, he did not take caution from Ollason. Dr Grant was, on or about the 23d of May 1854, aware of all the facts now alleged by him, but he did not communicate with the suspender's agents until the 31st May, when he made a demand for payment, as stated on the record."

June 20, 1857.
Earl of Gallo-
way v. Grant.

The case was again called on the 10th March 1857. The complainer pleaded;—That it was not his case,—that the genuine receipt constituted Ollason's mandate; so that if the receipt were forged the mandate fell. Possession of the receipt was set forth simply as a part of the execution of the duty otherwise imposed on him.—(Arts. 2, 3, 4, and 6 of minute.) Payment being instructed, it would be immaterial whether there was a receipt or not. The complainer's case was within the law of master and servant. It was not a case of mandate at all, but fell within that principle under which a master was liable for even the criminal misconduct of his servant, provided he be acting in the discharge of his duty.

The respondent objected to the minute being received. The object of the minute was to allow the complainer an opportunity of explaining certain articles,—inter alia, arts. 3 and 17,—which, it was supposed, might be construed to cover the relation of principal and agent, exceeding the measure of authority conveyed in a person sent with a receipt to get money in exchange for it. A genuine receipt was the only thing which conferred authority, and the only thing on which the parties paying ever relied. The minute did not specify instruction, and only demonstrated that the suspender had nothing to say more than what he had already said in his record.

LORD PRESIDENT.—We can only receive the minute of consent. Therefore it must now be refused.

The case was again called several times,—the Court expressing great difficulty in understanding the precise meaning of the complainer's statements.

On 13th June 1857, the case was put to the roll.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The majority of the Court are of opinion that there should be a general issue in this case. We do not know what amount of authority may have been given to Ollason. We wish, in hoc statu, to recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

D. F. Inglis, for the respondent.—What the Court are practically determining is, that there are sufficient averments here of agency. We wish to know the ground of that judgment; as, in the event of an appeal, we might be met with a technical difficulty on that subject.

Of this date the case was advised.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The most advisable course is to recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary in hoc statu, and let the whole case be tried at once.

There are two questions involved. 1st, Whether the receipt No. 27 is or is not genuine? Parties are agreed that this question must be tried. If the receipt shall be found to be genuine, the suspender must prevail. 2d, In the event of the receipt not being genuine, there is still another question, namely, whether payment was made to an agent of the charger duly authorised to receive payment? The suspender avers that he paid to Ollason, and he avers that Ollason was the agent of the charger authorised and accredited to receive payment. It is denied by the charger that Ollason was his agent, or was so authorised or accredited. (See reasons of suspension, 4, 5, 6, 17, 20, and answers to these reasons). 1 think that the real state of the facts should be ascertained before we decide whether Ollason is or is not in law to be held as the agent of the charger in the matter, or as authorised and accredited by the charger to receive payment for him. By what evidence the averments are to be instructed is not a point to be disposed of at this stage. The fact of payment to Ollason does not appear to be disputed; and at all events, as the payment is said to have been made by a bank cheque, it may perhaps admit of proof. The real question on this branch of the case is as to the alleged authority of Ollason. On the first hearing of the cause, it did appear to me that the manner in which the suspender had made his averments on that subject was not indicative of much confidence in the actual facts, if fully disclosed, and I cannot say that this impression has been removed by what has since taken place. But still the averments are there, and although I think that the suspender might have been more specific, without committing the irregularity of setting forth evidence, I cannot say that his averments are either not sufficiently pregnant to be relevant in any sense, or are so evasive as not to be admissible.

June 20, 1857.
Earl of Gallo-
way v. Grant.

I think that the practice, which appears to be increasing, of pronouncing an interlocutor of relevancy in each case before allowing an inquiry into the facts, is in many cases inexpedient, and I think that the present is such a case. I do not think that there is here any question of law or relevancy which ought to be decided before going to trial. I would therefore propose to recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary pronounced on the matter of relevancy in hoc statu, and allow the suspender an opportunity of having an issue or issues adjusted, to try both branches of the cause.

LORD IVORY.—I am disposed to be of a contrary opinion. This case came before the Lord Ordinary on an application by both parties for a judgment on the question we are now dealing with, and it was with the concurrence of the Lord Ordinary that this branch of the case has been separated from the matter of forgery; and it seems to me to be a strong measure, after the case has been put into this shape, that it should be again restored to the shape against which both parties fought at the early stage of it. I think that the Court is bound to deal with this interlocutor in the form in which it has been brought here.

The case divides itself into three questions—1st, the question of authority; 2d, the accrediting of Ollason with reference to the receipt on which he obtained payment; and 3d, the question of personal exception or mora. With reference to the last, it is not now insisted on. With regard to the accrediting, we are not here on an issue which excludes the question of authorisation. But it is very material, in analysing the record, to distinguish the question of authority from the question of accrediting. On the question of authority, the difficulty arises at present in the reading of the record, which is neither distinct, precise, nor even intelligible. There is a great deal of difficulty in this case, from the double shape in which the parties have chosen to deal with it. There is a case of authority. There is a case of no authority. There is a case of authority in so far as Ollason may have been authorised to receive money on a proper and genuine receipt, but none on the footing that he was to receive the money on a forged or false receipt. The record appears to be industriously vague, equivocal, and evasive. It is a disingenuous record. The suspender was called upon to make it more precise, and he did not do so; and it is impossible to read it without seeing that the complainer has gone as far as he may go to make a shew of relevancy, while, after all, upon the special question of authority, there is no relevancy whatever in his averments. A party placed in the situation of the suspender, and allowed to amend his record with the view of enabling the Court to read it, was bound to make it precise and intelligible. He has not done so. But taking it as we have it, I cannot find out what it is that the complainer means to say was the authority given, or the thing authorised to be done. It was not to levy money without a receipt at all, nor to levy money upon a forged receipt. On the contrary, when you read the whole record, as common sense would suggest, the authority alleged is to receive the money in exchange for a genuine receipt. It is said that Dr Grant signed receipts, and authorised Junner and his clerk to levy the money: That Ollason was sent out with the genuine receipt, and that he had it in his possession when he did levy the money, but instead of producing the genuine receipt he gave a forged one. There is a total blank when you come to extend the authority. The expressions vary in almost every article of the

No. 190.
 June 20, 1857.
 Earl of Gallo-

record; sometimes it is that the clerk was "authorised," sometimes "employed," sometimes "empowered," sometimes it is "acting for," sometimes "accredited," sometimes that he was "an agent," sometimes it is that he was "entrusted" with the receipts, sometimes that he was "in possession of them." There is no mode or shape in which this matter may be stated, in order to create ambiguity and confusion, which has not been adopted; but I cannot read the record in any other way, as a bona fide averment, than that Dr Grant so conducted himself in authorising the party in possession of these receipts so signed by him as to make that party his agent in levying the money. But there is no shadow of averment that there was authorisation by Dr Grant, direct or indirect, to levy money without his signed receipt: No general propositura is alleged. Nothing but that in a certain shape of things the party holding the receipts was the party representing Dr Grant, and so entitled on his authority to levy the money.

Now when a party comes into Court with a case of this kind, he is bound to make his case such that the Court and his opponent may know precisely what it is. There can be no intelligible issue without that, for if he takes an issue now with reference to all the three shapes of his case, it may mean one thing or it may mean another thing, but it cannot mean all the three things together; and therefore I think the authority must be specified in such a way that the issue shall speak of the species of authority, its extent, and the matter to which, and the manner in which it applied, otherwise there would be danger in sending it to a jury, for embarrassment would inevitably arise. Precision must be in the averments and in the issue, and then the jury will determine whether the proof comes up to that. It is not their province to deal with ambiguous matters under an issue capable of different interpretations. If it had been stated in so many words that Ollason was authorised to uplift the money upon a receipt which was genuine, but that he went to the complainer and gave another forged receipt, which forged receipt he never was authorised to deliver, it would have been difficult to refuse an issue as to the authority upon the non-genuine receipt. There may be a case of authority here, because if the receipt was genuine, there was authority to levy the money upon it. But that is the only authority spoken of. It is only said that Ollason, being entrusted with one receipt, gave another. Was he fulfilling any order of Dr Grant or Mr Junner in giving the forged receipt? The authority in this sense amounts to a case of mandate; it does not signify whether it be betwixt agent and employer, or betwixt master and servant—it is still an authority emanating from mandate. It is authority emanating from the mind and will of the party authorising that lies at the root of the whole matter. What I object to in this record is, that there is no relevant averment of authority in the distinct sense of the word "authority," when that word is defined according to the ordinary rules of common sense. On the contrary, you find this averment, that there were two receipts—a good one, for which there was authority, and a bad receipt—for which there was no authority. The record does not set forth any authority at all for what Ollason did, and therefore, upon that point, I have no difficulty in agreeing with the judgment of the Lord Ordinary. Confusion is thrown into the case by introducing two questions as one, which must be kept distinct. This is not a question of accrediting. As a question of authority, it cannot be so treated. Accrediting can only come into the case when the question of authority fails. When authority is made out, the party is agent, and binds his principal. With accrediting, the party does not act upon authority merely, but, being put in a situation to cheat a third party, he makes the party accrediting him responsible for what he does. We are to deal with the question in that shape. I am of opinion that there is no case of accrediting in the record. It is not said that the forged receipt was accredited. It is said that there could be no accrediting of a forged receipt. But that is a mistake. The books are full of such cases. Now, is there any allegation of the accrediting of Ollason? All that is said is that the respondent authorised Junner, and that Ollason was a clerk of Junner, and that he was sent out on several previous occasions with similar receipts. But it is not said that Ollason was ever sent out with similar receipts to the suspender, or that the suspender knew that he had ever been sent out with such receipts. There is no connection between Ollason and the suspender. It is not said that any propositura was given to Ollason. You must connect the party deceived with the party who deceived him. But if you merely say that the charger's ~~carelessness~~ deceived many others—unless you can say that this deception, having become known to the suspender, he himself was thereby deceived by it, you say nothing to the purpose. There is no such averment here. I think, on the whole matter, that the Lord Ordinary has taken a right view of the case. The complainer having shaped the record to meet his case, he is entitled to no favour, and therefore I shall read the ambiguities, not in his favour, but against him. I see nothing but an averment of authority to levy money on a receipt signed by Dr Grant. I see no averment of an authority to levy money on a receipt not signed by Dr Grant. If that had stood alone, there is sufficient to justify the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary. It does seem to me to be a most dangerous thing to adopt the doctrine that merely because a man holds the character of a clerk, without being entrusted with any department, or any general prepositura, but merely because he has been employed to levy money on a genuine receipt, he is to make his master responsible, when, without the knowledge of his employer, he levies money on a forged document.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I entirely concur in the judgment suggested by your Lordship in the chair, and also in the grounds of it. I have not experienced difficulty in reading this record. It appears to me quite intelligible. It raises the question whether or not Ollason was authorised to receive this money. The difficulty is in determining whether or not these statements made in support of that alleged authority are relevant. I think that that is an important and general question, but as I am not to offer any opinion on the subject at present, I abstain from entering on the views which have occurred to me in regard to it. But the statements of the complainer are denied, and, in ignorance of the facts, I refrain from deciding the question of relevancy, which, after all, may not have any application to the real facts of the case, as these shall be disclosed.

In the administration of justice, it is in the discretion of this Court to determine whether they shall ascertain the facts, or dispose of the relevancy of the application of them in the first instance. After having heard the arguments of the bar, and after considering the question of relevancy, I think it is better to wait till we know the actual facts of the case, than to decide the law now. And it is upon this ground that I agree with your Lordship that this interlocutor should be recalled in hoc statu, and that the facts should be first ascertained.

LORD DEAS.—I concur with your Lordship in the chair in holding that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary ought to be recalled; and I do so upon the single ground, which I understand to be substantially the ground relied on by your Lordship, that no judgment whatever, upon law or relevancy, ought to have been pronounced at the present stage of the cause, but that the preparation of issues ought to be proceeded with in the usual way. Whether the particular issues which may be proposed can be granted will be a subsequent question.

A practice, as your Lordship has observed, has been recently creeping in of at once pronouncing, upon the closed record, a separate and independent judgment upon relevancy;—that is to say, a judgment upon a hypothetical state of the facts which may not be the real facts,—the consequence of which is, where the relevancy is sustained, that parties must run the gauntlet of litigation, it may be both here and in the House of Lords, at double cost, great waste of time, and, very often, to no other purpose than that of finding, when the merits come to be tried, that the case decided on relevancy was an imaginary case, and that all the ingenuity and labour bestowed on it by the bar and the bench have been thrown away. Even when a judgment is obtained dismissing the action as irrelevant, this is by no means necessarily the end of strife;—for the judgment may or may not stand; and, if it does stand, the result may be that another action is resorted to, and important and difficult questions raised whether a new action be or be not competent, which could scarcely have happened if the cause had gone to issue and been decided after the facts had been ascertained. The recent practice of the Outer House is neither in accordance with the ancient and better practice of this Court, nor with the spirit of our new forms of process under the Judicature Act, whereby it is obviously contemplated, as indeed it was under the statutes of 1815 and 1819, (55 Geo. III. c. 42, and 59 Geo. III. c. 35), that decisions upon law or relevancy before trial, shall be the exception and not the rule. So strongly was the expediency of this felt, that large classes of cases specially appropriated for trial by jury were directed by the Judicature Act (sect. 28), to be at once remitted to the jury court without

No. 190. discussing law or relevancy, and it was only by getting a special order sending them back, on cause shewn, that such discussion could take place before trial. Even then the decision of such causes was not entrusted to the Lord Ordinary, who was directed by sect. 65 of the A. S., 11th July 1828, to report to the Inner House. As regarded cases not appropriated by the statute for trial by jury, it was only in the special circumstances set forth in sections 13 and 16 of the statute, that power was given either to the Lord Ordinary or the Court to decide questions of law or relevancy before trial or probation. The enactments in the Judicature Act still regulate the whole of this matter, with this difference only, that the Jury Court and Court of Session being amalgamated by the statute 1, William IV. c. 69, there is no longer room for transmission and retransmission between the two Courts. We have a discretionary power to determine law or relevancy before trial; and in certain cases, such as cases of fraud, to which special rules are applicable, there may be a strong expediency in doing so. But in the general case the discretion is one to be cautiously exercised, keeping in view the principles and consequences I have alluded to, and by no means as a matter of course in every case, even when the parties have put on record an objection to the relevancy, which they have not done here. A decision upon relevancy, under a closed record, is, it must be kept in view, a very different thing from—what it is apt to be confounded with—an examination into the correctness of the summons and defences, and whether the grounds of action in the summons are sufficiently particular and clear, and the conclusions regularly and clearly deduced therefrom, all which, under the express terms of sect. 6 of the statute, ought to be ascertained, before the Lord Ordinary, at a stage of the cause when there is no closed record, and when he may either dismiss the action, reserving to bring a new one if otherwise competent, or order an amendment of the libel. A decision upon relevancy, under a closed record, is, in a certain sense, a judgment upon the merits. In what sense and to what effects it is so I do not wish to consider here, because that is a question which, in one aspect of it, is very seriously raised in another case now before us for judgment. Undoubtedly a judgment dismissing an action in whole or in part, as irrelevant in point of law, without ascertaining the facts, is, in any view of it, a judgment not lightly to be pronounced; and, in the present case, I can see no ground whatever for following that exceptional course. What is called relevancy here is truly an important question of law, hypothetically put to us, which may never arise, and which, if it does arise, may be, fittingly enough, disposed of at the trial, subject to a bill of exceptions, or, upon the application of the verdict, if the verdict shall be so framed as to raise that question. The whole enactments I have referred to in the Judicature Act, proceed upon the footing, which is conformable also to our previous practice, that there may be questions of relevancy which ought not to be disposed of before trial; and I think we are taking no startling view in holding that such may be the case here, when we see that the respondent deliberately closed the record without stating any plea whatever against the relevancy, although he seems latterly to have asked and obtained a judgment just as if he had stated it.

Taking this view of the right course of procedure, I express no opinion upon the legal questions alluded to by Lord Ivory, and I have formed none. I agree with Lord Curriehill that the more nice and important these questions are, the greater the objection to deciding them upon a hypothesis, and I am not for so deciding them.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I wish to state that I did not mean to indicate any opinion on any of the hypotheses that have been suggested. I did not mean to express an opinion on this case, or on any other that might be imagined.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary in hoc statu, and appoint the parties to give in the issue or issues, which they respectively propose as issue or issues for the trial of the cause, and that quam primum."

Poors' Roll—A. S. 21st Dec. 1842, sect. 5.—In an application for the benefit of Halket. the Poors' Roll, the kirk-session had omitted the usual certificate. After a favourable report on the probabilis causa, the Court remitted to supply the omission.

AN action having been brought against Halket by the trustees of a pre-1st Division. deceasing brother, he applied for the benefit of the Poors' Roll for conducting his defence. The report on the probabilis causa was favourable, but the reporters directed the attention of the Court to the circumstance that there was no certificate "under the hands of the minister and elders with regard to their knowledge of his circumstances and character, as required by the Act of Sederunt." There was in process a letter from the session-clerk, to the effect that the session intended to certify that all the facts spoken to by the applicant in his examination were not within their knowledge.

Thoms, for the petitioner, now pleaded;—That all the information required by the Act of Sederunt was before the Court, although not formally stated. The Act prescribed merely an examination, although it was technically known as a certificate. A certificate had been repeatedly dispensed with.¹ Farther, the objection ought to have been taken in the Single Bills, this petition being now in the Summar Roll; and, at any rate, after a favourable report, no objection to the certificate could be stated.²

The pursuers compeared, and maintained, that under the Act of Sederunt, it was never too late to object to a party getting on the Poors' Roll. In the cases cited, there had been certificates; but here there was none. It was now incompetent to supply the omission, because the three months allowed by the Act of Sederunt, within which a party must be admitted or refused, would be exceeded.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This point is quite competently before us. There must be a remit to grant a certificate. Confessedly there is none here. As to the limitation of time in the Act of Sederunt, the objection by the compearers would only lead to the emission of a new declaration by the applicant, and to his making this application over again. The omission here was no fault of his; and the Court can competently enough make a remit to get it supplied, without beginning the whole matter of new.

The rest of the Court concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"In respect that, by the Act of Sederunt dated 21st December 1842, the minister and elders are directed, when they examine an applicant for the benefit of the Poors' Roll, to certify how far the statement given by the party consists with their own proper knowledge, or that of any one of them; or whether its credit rests on the information of others, or solely on the statement of the applicant; in which latter case they shall certify whether he or she be of good character, and worthy of credit: And, in respect that the reporters for the poor have pointed out the omission of the minister and elders to give such a certificate in this case, remit to the minister and elders to supply this omission, and to give such a certificate as it may be in their power to give in the circumstances.

Process—Jury Trial—Expenses.—There is no absolute rule that the granting of a new trial is conditional on payment of the expenses of the first trial.

SEE ante, vol. xviii. p. 343.

This case went to trial on 18th March 1856. The jury returned a verdict for the pursuer. The case then came before the Court on the motion of the defenders to have a new trial, on the ground of the verdict being contrary to evidence. The Court were of opinion that a new trial should be granted. The pursuer then moved, as a condition of granting the new trial, that the defenders should pay the expense of the first trial.¹ It was stated that the rule on the subject in the Second Division was absolute.

After consultation,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The case of Shiells was peculiar, and not conclusive either way. I have communicated with the Judges of the Second Division, and find from them that there is no absolute rule in regard to expenses. At the same time it is very common to give expenses of the trial, in so far as it is conceived that the party applying for a new trial is entitled to have the reconsideration of a jury. We think that this case falls under that class, and that the pursuer is entitled to have the expenses of the last trial, so far as not available for the next.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Set aside the verdict in this cause, and grant a new trial on the defenders paying the expenses of the former trial, so far as not available for the new trial: Appoint an account thereof to be lodged," &c.

Sheriff-court of Lanarkshire

RALSTON, GOODWIN, AND COMPANY, iron merchants in Glasgow, brought an action against Wilson and M'Lean, sometime callenderers in Glasgow, now dissolved as a company, and Robert Wilson and John M'Lean, the individual partners of the company, for payment of L.46, 18s. 1d., "being the amount of an account for goods sold by them to the defenders, per account commencing the 5th day of July and ending the 15th day of September 1853." Wilson was now bankrupt, and the following was the note of the defence made for M'Lean:—"The defender John M'Lean, procurator stated that the defence was—Preliminary: That the defender Wilson's trustee has not been made a party to the action. On the merits A denial of the present defender's liability to the pursuer for the sum so for."

¹ Shiells v. Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Co., 4th July 1856, ante, vol. xv. p. 1200.

The preliminary plea was repelled, and a proof allowed of the averments No. 193. of parties.

Amongst the items charged were three items for furnishing a pitch chain, the total cost of which, with carriage, was stated at L.30, 7s. In regard to these, it was urged in defence that they had been ordered and used by Wilson as an individual, and not for the firm of Wilson and M'Lean. Excerpts were produced from the pursuer's books, shewing, inter alia, that the account was entered as against Wilson alone, he having dealt with the pursuers before entering into partnership with M'Lean, and the name at the head of the account never having been changed.

The Sheriff-substitute (Skene), on 12th January 1855, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds sufficient evidence that the goods charged for in the account libelled on were furnished by the pursuers to the defenders: Finds, with regard to the pitch chain in particular, that it was ordered by Mr Wilson, one of the partners of the defenders' firm; that it was erected in the defenders' premises, and intended to be used in the defenders' business: Finds no sufficient evidence that Mr Wilson ordered it for himself individually, and not for his firm: Finds, therefore, that the pursuers are entitled to charge the chain against the defenders, and that the price charged therefor is moderate and reasonable: Finds no evidence that any part of the account libelled on has been paid: Therefore decerns against the defender, in terms of the conclusions of the libel; and finds the defenders liable to the pursuers in expenses."

On appeal, the Sheriff-depute adhered, on the ground "that the articles sued for, and in particular the pitch chain, were ordered by Mr Wilson for the company, and suitable for the business of the company, and not for him as an individual, and in respect the pitch chain was delivered at the premises of the defenders."

M'Lean presented a note of advocacy, which was reported to the First Division along with a note of additional pleas in law, all directed to support his plea of non-liability.

At the bar, however, he pleaded payment of the account, at least such items of it,—amounting in all to about L.16,—as did not refer to the pitch chain, as to which last he argued on the evidence that he was not liable. He founded this plea upon one of the excerpts produced, and maintained that, assuming the debt sued for to be constituted as a good debt against him, it must be held, on the evidence of the pursuer's books, to be paid and extinguished.

Replied;—The excerpts founded on were not made or put in for the purpose of proving payment. They were incomplete, and stopped short of what should have been copied from the ledger to give a fair view of the state of accounts between the parties to meet a plea of payment. Therefore the excerpts could not, in the circumstances, be founded upon as evidence of payment.

LORD PRESIDENT.—A sufficient case has not been made out for altering the judgment of the Sheriff. As to the chain, the question really is, to whom was the furnishing made? and the evidence instructs that it was made to the firm and delivered at their premises, not that it was furnished to Wilson for himself and on his individual credit. Therefore, so far the defence of non-liability fails.

The next question relates to this L.16, 11s. 10d., the balance of the original account over and above the L.30, the cost of the pitch chain; The defence now maintained is payment. That was not pleaded in the inferior Court, nor was the evidence directed to that inquiry. It was not referred to in the additional pleas in law in this Court, but it is now founded on an excerpt from the books of the pursuer,—the history of which excerpt we have not very clearly before us. How it came into process we do not very well see; but it certainly was not produced with reference to any question of payment, for none was raised. In that state of matters I cannot hold that we have evidence that these sums were paid. A party's books

No. 193. may prove against himself when applied to on any particular point of which they ought to contain the record, but in this case, where payment is not alleged in defence, or raised in the proof, I cannot hold that this excerpt is evidence of such payment, and therefore on both points I am for adhering to the judgment.

June 23, 1857. Ralston, Goodwin, and Co v. M'Lean.

LORD IVORY.—I am of the same opinion. With regard to the chain, as the case is presented to us, the Sheriff-substitute has taken a correct view of the matter. The question is not what the chain was suitable for, or even what became of it. The question is, upon whose credit was it furnished? The evidence is quite enough to fix the liability on the company.

In reference to the plea of payment, I go chiefly on this, that there is no defence except non-liability stated on record. That is not a defence of non-payment, and therefore, whatever latitude may be given under the recent statute to vague and unsatisfactory defences, it would be giving a totally opposite construction to the natural meaning of a plea of non-liability if we were to hold it tantamount to a plea of payment. The defence of payment is an admission of the original liability. There being no such defence here, I do not think the defender is entitled to be heard on it. But, besides, there is not satisfactory evidence that there was payment.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I concur.

LORD DEAS.—I am of the same opinion. Two defences have been pleaded at the bar,—1st, payment; and 2d, non-liability. But the latter alone is stated in the record. Now, payment is a matter of fact and ought to have been stated in the record. I doubt if introducing it into the pleas in law in this Court would have been sufficient. But, at all events, this is not done. The statute (16 and 17 Vict. cap. 80, sect. 3) requires that the minute shall state concisely the grounds of defence, and the schedule appended to the Act gives instances of how this should be done—shewing clearly that, although short, the defences are intended to be intelligible and specific. Were it otherwise, indeed, the record could only be calculated to mislead. In the present case the full account was appended to the summons, and letters had passed about it previously, so that the advocator, if he meant to plead payment, could have no excuse for merely pleading non-liability, which was, in truth, inconsistent with the supposition of payment. If the advocator suffers hardship from the state of the record, it is a hardship for which he has himself to blame. But I do not see that he suffers any. For it is plain enough that when the excerpt, so much dwelt upon, from the respondents' books was made, the object in view was to obtain entries bearing on the question of non-liability, and not upon the question of payment, which had not then been raised. Upon the 2d point, viz., whether the chain was ordered for, and delivered to, the advocator, the proof is not perhaps, in all respects, so satisfactory as it might have been; but, on the whole, I agree with your Lordships that the result of it is in favour of the respondents.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Advocate the cause, and recall the interlocutors complained of: Find that it is sufficiently established as matter of fact, that the pieces of pitch chain, the charges for which, and the carriage thereof in the account sued for, and amounting to L.30, 7s., are the only items in that account liability for which has been denied by the defender, M'Lean, were furnished to the company of Wilson & M'Lean, of which the defender, M'Lean, was a partner: Find as to the remainder of the account libelled on, amounting to L.16, 11s. 1d., payment of which, though not pleaded in the record, was the only defence urged at the bar. that such payment has not been instructed: Find, in point of law, that the advocator, M'Lean, is liable for the account sued for, and that payment of any part thereof has not been instructed: Therefore, decern against the defender and advocator, M'Lean, in terms of the conclusions of the libel in the inferior Court: Find the defender and advocator liable to the pursuers in expenses of process, both in the inferior Court and in this Court: allow an account thereof," &c.

June 25, 1857.
North of Scotland Banking
Co. v. Duncan.

Reparation—Defamation—Title of a banking company to sue an action of damages for slander.—A banking company brought an action of damages for slander against the writer of a letter reflecting on members of the committee of management. This letter was inuendored as “of and concerning the pursuers,” and as calumniously representing, “that through the fraudulent connivance of the committee of management some of their number had been allowed to put their hands into the bank till,” &c.; “that the money so taken away was substantially of the nature of a payment by the members of the committee of the bank or some of them to themselves;” that the transaction was similar to a “juggle” which had caused great loss to the bank, and affected its character and reputation, a few years ago; and that the persons in the management of the bank were not entitled to public confidence. There was no element of malice or intent to injure the bank;—Held (aff. judgment of Lord Ardmillan, diss. Lord Deas), that the action at the instance of the bank was relevant—the inuendo sufficiently fixing the slander as directed against the corporate body, and not the members of committee merely.

This action was brought by the North of Scotland Banking Company against John Duncan, writer in Aberdeen, concluding for L.10,000 of damages and reparation for alleged libel. It was one of several actions for the same libel all brought against Duncan, the pursuers in these other actions being certain directors of the bank in their individual capacity. This case now came before the Court on the question of relevancy; and it was arranged that the decision in this case should rule the others. The pursuers’ allegations were as follows:—

1st DIVISION.
Ld. Ardmillan.
C.

“Art. 1. The pursuers have their head-office in Aberdeen, where their banking business is conducted under the superintendence of a board of directors, and a committee of the directors, usually styled the committee of management. Now, as well as on the 23d of January 1857, and previously, the board of directors is and was composed, inter alios, of Mr John Duguid Elmsly, senior, advocate, Aberdeen; Mr George Elmsly, coach-builder there; Mr Alexander Gibb, civil-engineer, Aberdeen; and Sir Thomas Blaikie, knight, residing in Aberdeen. These gentlemen, excepting Mr Elmsly, are also members of the committee of management.

“Art. 2. The pursuers transact a considerable business both in the town and county of Aberdeen, as well as in the adjoining counties, and elsewhere throughout the country. In particular, &c.

“Art. 3. A few years ago the character, credit, and stability of the pursuers’ bank were seriously affected, in consequence of very large losses it had sustained through the mismanagement and malpractices of the manager at the time, and of some of the persons who had been for some time, and particularly in or about 1846, in the management and direction of the affairs and business of the bank. The parties alluded to, it was discovered, had been in the practice of drawing from the funds of the bank large sums of money for the purposes of their individual speculations, and of allowing large advances to be made to others, without giving or obtaining any security, or adequate security, therefor. The consequence was, that it was found that considerably more than one-half of the capital of the bank had been drawn out, over and above the whole of what was called the reserved fund. But by a change in the manager and in the direction, and by subsequent prudent and careful management, the bank has gradually recovered its character, credit, and stability; and when the letter, afterwards more particularly adverted to, was published, it had entirely re-established itself in the good opinion of the public, and was in a very prosperous condition.

“Art. 4. It was in this state of matters, as regards the pursuers’ bank, that the defender wrote and published, or caused to be written and published,

No. 194. in a newspaper called the 'Aberdeen Free Press, Peterhead, Fraserburgh, and Buchan News, and North of Scotland Advertiser,' of Friday the 23d June 25, 1857. January 1857, a statement, in the form of a letter, addressed by him to—North of Scot- 'The Shareholders of the Aberdeen, Peterhead, and Fraserburgh Railway,' land Banking Co. v. Duncan. in which, among other things, he made the following statements:—

" 'The Act (alluding to an Act of Parliament which a rival Railway Company were then seeking to obtain), whether successful or not, however, naturally induces inquiry how (meaning the rival railway scheme or party) they made up their deposits. It certainly was not from their shareholders.

" 'The North of Scotland Bank coffers are open to them for all purposes, and at all times. How comes this? Why, because the committee of management of that bank consists of Mr John Duguid Milne, senior; Mr Elmsly, coach-builder; Mr Gibb, civil-engineer; and Sir Thomas Blaikie. Every one knows the connection of these four individuals with the Great North of Scotland Railway, and with the Formartine and Buchan Railway. As promoters of this last-named scheme, Messrs Milne, Elmsly, and Gibb, by connivance with the other two members of the bank committee, had simply to put their hands into the bank till, and transfer any sum they chose to Mr Robert Milne, the Great North of Scotland secretary; and thus that secretary obtained for deposits on the Formartine scheme, . . . L.27,000
 And on the Denburn scheme, 9,000

Total, . . . L.36,000

What security did he give? Looking to the subscription contracts, we find that the Formartine and Buchan contract amounted to . . . L.277,500
 The Denburn branch, 90,000

L.367,500

Of this sum the following parties subscribe,—

Alex. Anderson, advocate in Aberdeen,	L.40,000
W. Adam, Esq. of Ranna,	50,000
Robert Milne, secretary,	L.59,000
And „ „	50,000
	109,000

199,000

Subscribed by contractors and others, . L.168,500

If the bank committee chose to advance the deposits from themselves to themselves as the promoters of the Formartine and Buchan Railway, it was only such a juggle as was done in 1846 by some of the same parties; and such a juggle as was done in the Royal British Bank in London the other day. Public opinion is rather outspoken on Mr Macgregor's conduct about the Royal British Bank; but have we not a nest of Macgregors in the members of the committee of the North of Scotland Bank?

" 'Mr Gibb is a civil-engineer. It was not for his great talent in that line that he was selected for the Formartine and Buchan line, but for his influence as a financier at the North of Scotland Bank Board. The promoters of the railway may have paid dearly for the purchase of that influence, seeing the value of his engineering plans to be so questionable. If, however, the influence of a bank had not been so acquired, where would the Formartine and Buchan Railway promoters have gone for their deposits? They could go nowhere else. They have referred the banking friends of the Aberdeen, Peterhead, and Fraserburgh scheme to the guarantee subscriptions made by me last year, as sufficient to justify the refusal of credit to our undertaking. I would in answer refer all financiers, and especially the shareholders generally of the North of Scotland Bank, to the circumstances con-connected with the North of Scotland Railway Subscription Contract of 1846, No. 194. which was signed by Adam and Anderson, William Gordon, broker, Mr Jopp, advocate, Mr Thomas Blaikie, and others, to the tune of upwards of L.100,000. Did they pay the money so subscribed for? No; but they as directors forfeited their own shares as shareholders. Oh, shade of Macgregor! have you done worse than this?—All as set out in the said newspaper and letter themselves, which are now specially referred to.”

June 25, 1857.
North of Scotland Banking
Co. v. Duncan.

In art. 5 the pursuers quoted a letter published by their manager, to the effect that the bank had not made any advances to “the Denburn or Aberdeen Junction Line,” and obtained ample security “for any comparatively small advances we have ever made on account of the other line.”

“Art. 6. Notwithstanding of this, the defender again published his letter, above referred to, and partly set out in article 4, in ‘The Northern Advertiser,’ of 27th January 1857, an advertising paper published in Aberdeen, and having a very extensive circulation” there, and throughout the county.

“Art. 7. The statements quoted above, in article 4, are of and concerning the pursuers, and the defender did thereby falsely, calumniously, and injuriously represent and assert, that through the fraudulent, or at least reckless and improper, connivance of the committee of management of the bank, some of their number had been allowed to put their hands into the bank till, and take away or transfer any sum they chose to Mr Robert Milne, the secretary of the Great North of Scotland Railway Company; that, in point of fact, large sums had been so taken away or transferred; that the bank held no security for the sums so taken away or transferred; that the money so taken away or transferred was substantially of the nature of a payment by the members of the committee of management of the bank, or some of them, to themselves; that the transaction was only such a juggle as was done in 1846, by some of the same parties, thereby meaning and intending that it should be understood, that the present committee of management indulged in the same description of malpractices which had caused so great loss to the bank shareholders, and affected its character, credit, and reputation a few years ago, as above mentioned; and that the persons now in the direction and management of the affairs and business of the pursuers’ bank, were as little entitled to public confidence as John Macgregor, who had been for some time previously held up by the public press, and generally talked of, as a person through whose improper conduct the Royal British Bank of London had become bankrupt, and the shareholders, and others connected therewith, had been ruined or seriously injured, or did make statements or representations of a similar import.

“Art. 8. The statements or representations of and concerning the pursuers’ bank, referred to in last article, have been extensively published.

They are entirely false. No person has been allowed to put his hands into the till of the bank and take what funds he pleased. No juggle or malpractices have been indulged in, and no transaction has taken place, or been connived at, by their directors, or committee of management, in any respect irregular or improper, or inconsistent with good and safe banking.

“Art. 9. The whole of the defender’s statements, made of and concerning the pursuers, as above referred to, are not only entirely false, but have been made in the most reckless manner, in the worst spirit, and without any just cause or excuse. They have been most injurious and detrimental to the pursuers in their trade and business, have already created mistrust and alarm among those who deal with them, and are calculated seriously to affect them in their character, credit, and reputation with their customers and the public generally. And this all the more, that the defender is a well-known individual, not only in Aberdeen and surrounding district, but throughout the country. He is an advocate in Aberdeen in large practice. He is one of the directors of the rival bank in Aberdeen, known as the ‘Aberdeen Bank;’

or Aberdeen Branch of the Union Bank of Scotland. He is at present chairman of the directors of the Deeside Railway Company; and, not long since, he was chairman of the directors of the Caledonian Railway Company."

They pleaded;—That, in the circumstances condescended on, the defender, in respect of the false, calumnious, injurious, and libellous statements published by him, of and concerning the pursuers, is liable to them in damages and reparation, as concluded for.

The defender, in article 1 of his condescendence, stated:—"With regard to the transactions of the North of Scotland Bank in 1846, which are referred to by the pursuers in their summons, the defender believes and avers the state of the matter to have been this:—That various individuals obtained from the directors of the bank advances to a very large amount, in connection with railway speculations, and in particular with the projected formation of the Great North of Scotland Railway. Most of the influential directors of the bank were at the same time directors of that railway. These advances from the bank funds were made in many cases without security, and in others with only inadequate security. The result of these incautious and improper proceedings was, as stated by the pursuers themselves, an enormous ultimate loss to the bank."

He then stated, that these advances were chiefly on account of the Great North of Scotland Railway, which was now completed, and had given rise to two rival schemes for the purpose of accommodating those districts which the Great North of Scotland Railway did not supply, the one the "Formartine and Buchan" line, avowedly promoted by the directors of that company; the other, "the Aberdeen, Peterhead, and Fraserburgh Railway," of which the defender was the principal promoter. That "in the course of the parliamentary contests between these rival schemes much excitement was created, and the credit and financial arrangements of each were uncereemoniously handled, both in the form of newspaper warfare, and otherwise;" and after particularising certain attacks upon the defender's scheme, and stating that large sums were advanced by the pursuers to the "Formartine and Buchan line" in consequence of the members of the bank committee being also directors of the Great North of Scotland Railway Company, he stated:—

"Art. 5. The defender thought himself entitled to characterise this course on the part of the bank as being a repetition of the same reckless and improper course which had produced so much injury to the bank in 1846, and was led, not unnaturally, to compare it to the case of the Royal British Bank, which was then the subject of general conversation, where the directors, it was understood, had been in the habit of making large advances to each other with inadequate security, and where the result had been a great loss to the shareholders. The defender had no intention of imputing, and did not impute any dishonesty to the pursuer or the other members of the direction;—he simply intended to point to the conduct of the bank directors in advancing money from themselves, as directors, to themselves as directors or shareholders of railways, in order to defeat a rival project, as reckless and improper, and likely to produce a repetition of the misfortune which had overtaken the bank in 1846. And this, as a principal promoter of the Aberdeen, Peterhead, and Fraserburgh line, he was naturally led to do, in considering how the sources forming the deposits of the rival line had been procured."

The defender pleaded;—"1. The bank, as such, have no title to pursue the present action of damages, and have made no averments relevant to support an action of damages, at the instance of the company, as separate from the actions at the instance of individual members of the board of direction, to whom alone any allusion is made in the letter libelled."

The Lord Ordinary, on 2d June 1857, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuers have made averments relevant to support this action, at the instance of the North of Scotland Banking Company and their manager, on their behalf: Finds that the pursuers have alleged sufficient to pursue this action: Therefore repels the first plea in law stated for the defender, and reserves the question of expenses." *

Co. v. Duncan.

* "NOTE.—The first plea in law for the defender must be considered, in regard to this action alone, without reference to the separate actions, at the instance of the individual directors. The directors are the managing body, but they alone do not constitute the corporation; and if the Bank, as a corporation, has been slandered and injured, and has relevant grounds of action for reparation, the right of action cannot be destroyed by the fact, that certain individual directors have raised separate actions for the individual injury they suffered.

"It is not disputed that an action of damages, for reparation of injury inflicted by slander, may be competently raised by the incorporation, if there be relevant grounds of action. It is not disputed that this action, if relevant at the instance of the bank, is competently raised. There is no plea of privilege. There is no plea of insufficient specification, either as regards the wrong, or the injury alleged. The plea urged is, as was explained at the bar, that the defender's letter complained of as libellous, does not contain any defamation of the bank, whatever may be its import in regard to the directors and the Committee of management. It is rather singular that the defender, in the 5th article of the statement of facts, says, that 'the defender thought himself entitled to characterise this course on the part of THE BANK, as a repetition of the same reckless and improper course, &c. &c.; while he pleads that there is no libel on the bank at all. But, apart from this criticism, it is, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, impossible to read attentively this letter, without perceiving that it contains statements defamatory of the bank as a body corporate, as an institution dependent on public confidence and credit.

"The persons alleged, in this letter, to have been engaged in transactions of a most culpable and discreditable character, are directors and members of the managing committee of the bank. The transactions so alleged are in the department of their management, and, 'by connivance with the other two members of the bank committee,' so that the whole bank committee are involved; and among the acts alleged to have been done by individual directors, by connivance with the bank committee, is that of putting their hands into 'the bank till.' The reference to the proceedings of the same bank in 1846, and to the recent conduct of the Royal British Bank in London, gives additional point and sting to the statements of the defender.

"The pursuers allege that these statements are false and calumnious, and that they have already injured the bank, and are calculated still further to injure the bank in character, credit, and reputation. The Lord Ordinary does not doubt that, the statements are false (and, in hoc statu, their falsehood must be assumed), they are calumnious and injurious, and that action for reparation cannot be refused.

"The whole letter must be read and construed fairly. It is not an incidental notice of a piece of conduct, culpable or fraudulent, on the part of an officer of the bank. It is not an accusation against a manager or a director, written in the interest of the bank, with a view to protect the bank from further injury at the hands of the alleged offender. Such cases were put in illustration of the defender's argument. But they are not in point. In this case the accusations are direct and unequivocal, and were repeated in a different newspaper, after being publicly denied by the manager of the bank. They affect the directors and the managing committee in their management of the affairs of the bank; and particularly, in their charge of the bank till; and the result of the general belief of such accusations would not be otherwise than seriously injurious to the bank. A bank, as a corporation, has, indeed, no personal feelings, and an action for mere solatium for wounded feeling is unsuitable. But a bank, sustained by public confidence, has no better citage than credit and character; and a false accusation affecting its credit and character, and injuring it by creating distrust and alarm, is surely a wrong of a tremendous description, for which reparation may be sought.

The defender reclaimed, and pleaded;—That there was nothing said against the solvency of the bank, or the honesty or fairness with which it conducted its transactions, but only that certain of the directors were engaged in a railway speculation, and had abused their position as bank directors to promote that railway undertaking. That might be a libel which would entitle these individuals to damages against the defender. But it was no libel against the bank. It was not said that the effect of the charge had been to diminish the credit of the bank, or the value of the shares.¹ Therefore the bank had no interest to sue for damages. The question here was, Who was defamed? If it had been said that the company conducted its business in a discreditable manner, that would have been defamation of the company, for which action would lie. But if it were said that the cashier had gone off with L.100,000 of the bank funds, that might be defamation of the individual, but not of the bank, for it was not a statement that the bank had committed anything wrong, but that somebody had done wrong against the bank—in the words of this letter, that “the cashier had put his hand into the till of the bank,” and yet such statement might most materially affect the credit of the bank, but no action would lie. That principle applied here, where all that was said was that certain individuals had abused their position as bank officials, for the purpose of helping themselves to bank money.

The pursuers pleaded;—That the bank was represented by the directors or committee of management, and it was no compensation to the individual partners of the bank that the directors individually got a solatium for injury done to them.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I do not feel much difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the bank have set forth a sufficient case to go to trial. I see the distinction taken by the defender that the slander was only against the individual members of the committee of management of the bank, who as such were alleged to have abused their trust by appropriating to themselves the funds of the bank, for the purpose of promoting another scheme in which they were personally concerned. That may be true, and the slander may involve all that. But the question we have to deal with is, whether this libel also involves slander against the bank. I see no incompatibility in that. I can understand that slander against the bank may also be slander against certain individuals, and that the injury sustained by the bank is over and above the injury sustained by these individuals, who may not be partners of the bank at all, but only office-bearers. But this action is to be viewed as an action for slander. Article 7 of the pursuers' condescendence, and their plea in law, express the meaning which they attach to the letter founded on. In cases of slander, except in very extravagant cases, we are as a general rule to take the pursuer's construction of the inuendo or libel. I can figure cases so extravagant that we would not. But in ordinary cases the pursuer is entitled to have an opportunity of establishing that the meaning of the libel is such as he alleges it to be. In a question of this kind, it is of importance to look to the nature of the body that pursues the action. Here it is a corporate body acting through certain office-bearers and its committee of management. That is the only way in which it does act; and when it is alleged that that committee of management conducts the business of the bank in the way that is said in article 7 to be meant in this letter, I cannot 1816, F. Coll.; and Sheerlock v. Beardsworth, 20th December 1816, 1 Mur. Rep. 176,—there seems to be sufficient authority for sustaining action by a corporate body, or the party properly representing the corporate body, for reparation of injury by slander affecting the corporation: And in England, the case of Cook v. Bachelor, 3 B. and P. 150; Forster v. Lawson, 11 Moore, 360; Haythorn v. Lawson, 3 Car. and P. 196; and Williams v. Beaumont, 10 Bing. 260,—support the same view.”

avoid the conclusion, that if the pursuers establish all that they here aver, they establish a case of slander against the bank. It is not necessary, in order to make out a case of slander against the bank, that it be alleged that all the partners concurred in the thing done. The question is, whether we are to allow the pursuers an opportunity of proving their allegations. They must make an innuendo which contains matter in its nature slanderous as against them. I think they have here done so, and I also think that they should have an opportunity of proving their allegations.

Co. v. Duncan.

LORD IVORY.—I am substantially of the same opinion. I should have liked the innuendo to be set out in more precise terms; but upon the whole, I think that your Lordship has put the right construction upon it. "The committee" is a form of words for representing the body whose officers they are, and therefore I do not read the phrase as meaning the individual members of the committee, but the committee in its official capacity, which is in other words the bank itself. The four individuals named are not the whole members of the board; and therefore, when the generic word "committee" is used, it means more than the four members named. It is therefore plain that what is meant is the official body, and not merely the individual members of that body; and I am confirmed in this by the construction put on the matter by the defender himself in article 5 of his defence.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I concur. Although the alleged libel admits of different meanings, the pursuers, in article 7, put such a meaning upon it as I think entitles them to an opportunity of proving it.

LORD DEAS.—The question here is one of novelty and difficulty, which I should have been glad to have had time to consider. But called upon as I am to give my opinion upon it now, I regret that I cannot concur with your Lordships. There are two classes of cases, which appear to me to be quite different,—cases in which the party slandered is the party seeking reparation, and cases in which reparation is sought by a party who says he is injured in consequence of another party having been slandered. In the former it is enough to prove that the slanderous words of and concerning the pursuer were uttered—the falsehood and malice being presumed. In the latter it is necessary, I think, to aver and to prove malice, or, what is substantially the same thing, an intent to injure the pursuer. It is quite easy to conceive that one party may be injured by a slander directed against another. For instance, if it were spread abroad that my factor or agent had defrauded me and absconded with all my funds, this might seriously injure my credit, but I could have no action of damages for the slander, without alleging that it had been uttered with intent to injure me. A slander against one member of a family may injure the other members—for instance, to attack the character of one daughter may deeply injure another daughter, but unless the latter alleges that the slander was intended to injure her she cannot claim damages. As it is with individuals so it is with a company or corporation, which is a separate person in law. I do not say a company or corporation may not be slandered so as to entitle the company or corporate body to demand reparation. If it be blazoned abroad that a bank is insolvent or bankrupt, or equivalent expressions used, as in the English case of Foster, or that the whole policy of a life assurance company is to elude their obligations by taking advantage of captious and unfair objections to void their policies, as in the English case of Williams, it may very well be that the bank and the insurance company can, respectively, sue for damages. But there the defamatory and injurious language is directed solely against the body, and not against individual members or office-bearers, so that if the body could not sue for damages no damages could be sued for at all. It may very well be, also, that the slander is so directed both against the body and individuals as to entitle both to damages. But, if the slander be directed solely and exclusively against the individuals, and consists in an accusation that they are cheating the body, this is not a slander of the body; and if the body can claim damages in respect of injury resulting from it, this must be precisely on the same footing that one individual can claim damages for a slander directed against another.

In the present case, the libel quoted in the record is directed solely against the members of the committee of management now in office, who are stated to be five in number—four of them being named, and the fifth, of course, just as well known, and equally entitled to complain, as if he had been named. The pursuers do not

No. 194. June 26, 1857. Alexander. allege that the committee of management consists of more than these five members, nor that there was any other slander except the slander directed against the committee of management, which consisted of these five members. The only allegation as to the libel being applicable to the bank is that contained in article 7th of the condescendence, in which the usual words are inserted,—that the libel is “of and concerning the pursuers.” But these words are immediately followed by an explanatory statement, that the defender did thereby falsely and calumniously represent “that, through the fraudulent, or at least reckless and improper, connivance of the committee of management of the bank, some of their number had been allowed to put their hands into the bank till,” and to transfer money, without security, to the railway company in which they were interested, which was substantially a transfer to some of themselves, and a juggle like what had occurred in 1846, “thereby meaning and intending that it should be understood that the present committee of management indulged in the same description of malpractices which had caused so great loss to the bank shareholders” in 1846, and so on.

Now this article, which is said to contain the inuendo, does not set forth that the libel, although of and concerning the present members of the committee of management, was meant and intended to apply to, and to be of and concerning the bank. Still less does it intelligibly explain how it was or could have been so. No doubt the article commences by saying that the statements are of and concerning the pursuers, but in place of adding anything to make this either consistent or intelligible, the words which immediately follow bear, explicitly, that what the libel did was to calumniate the present committee of management,—that is to say, the members of that committee referred to in the libel;—and in place of winding up by saying that it was thereby meant and intended to slander and calumniate the bank, the only inuendo inserted, bears—“thereby meaning and intending that the present committee of management indulged in the same description of malpractices” which had caused the loss of 1846. It is impossible for me to take this as an inuendo which applies the slander to the bank. If it was meant to be so, it is extravagant, and inconsistent on the face of it. I think the true character of the wrong complained of (if wrong there was), is injury to the bank by slandering the individual members of the present committee; but, to support action on this ground, an intent to injure the bank ought to have been libelled. But the action is not maintained in this view. It is admitted to be laid and insisted in exclusively as an action for slandering the bank; and, taking it upon this footing, I am humbly of opinion that it is an action which cannot be maintained.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—“Refuse the desire of the said reclaiming note, and adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against: Find the defender liable to the pursuers in the expenses of process incurred by them since the date of the Lord Ordinary’s interlocutor reclaimed against: Remit the whole process, including the proposed issue for the pursuers, to the Lord Ordinary, with power to his Lordship to decern for the expenses hereby found due, as the same shall be taxed by the Auditor.”

1ST DIVISION. L.d. Mackenzie C. THE petitioner was the only brother-german and heir-at-law of Major Henderson, now insane, to whom, in November 1856, he was appointed curator. He applied to the Court for special powers in the following cir-circumstances:—The village—now the watering-place of Bridge of Allan No. 195. was situated chiefly on the estate of Westerton, which belonged to Major Henderson. From its attractions and popularity as a watering-place, the estate was capable of being feued to great advantage, and the proprietor devoted himself with great energy to that object. After some time, when he saw that his plans were progressing successfully, with the view of extending his feuing operations, and obtaining the command of very desirable ground, he purchased the adjoining small estate of Coneyhill at a large price. He prepared conditions of feu, under which he offered his lands to the public, and prescribed for his feuars certain modes of building and laying out their feus. He also got a plan for feuing out his lands, including the estate of Coneyhill.
